It is always difficult to discuss peace terms during the progress of a war. Those who suggest methods of achieving a peaceable solution are always liable to the accusation of faltering and faintheartedness. Those who hold that all wars must sooner or later end in peace and that no reasonable opportunity for reaching that end should be neglected are apt to be treated as shivering pacifists.

Naturally everyone shrinks from incurring such a suspicion at a time when courage is the supreme virtue, but courage which rushes on to its doom with its tail up and its head down is not of the highest quality. It is pure bullheadedness and may end in a crash against concrete walls.

WARNS AGAINST HASTY ANSWER

After the Fuehrer's speech, I still repeat my appeal to the British Government that it should not rush into a defiant answer which will alienate opinion at home and abroad that is sincerely anxious to avoid the immeasurable calamity of a World War, which may last for years and irrevocably destroy the fabric of our present civilization. A furious, precipitate answer will alienate opinion which it is essential we should conciliate and win to our end in any struggle that may ensue, whether it be diplomatic or military.

When Hitler talks peace, it is described as a "peace offensive"; when a British speaker talks peace, it is "surrender." What nonsense. Peace talk is one of Hitler's weapons on the war front and on the important neutral front. Hitler is not afraid of cheap taunts of cowardice being hurled at his head by ranting patriots because he pleads for peace. Nor is Goering. They know that their own people have to be satisfied, so they seek to create the impression that a solid peace is the real aim of their policy, and that the real peace breakers are English politicians whose sole desire is to encircle and destroy Germany.

Nations will not long endure the horror and sacrifice of war at the bidding of warmongers in any country. Hitler knows that well, and he uses the whole of his oratorical art to rally peace sentiment on the side of war. The strength of Mr. Chamberlain's position when he led us into war lay in the universal conviction that he honestly shudders at the thought of war. The people in all countries are praying for peace. Every time a peace offer is thrust aside by a belligerent, it strengthens the resolve of the peoples whose leader makes the offer of peace to wage war to the bitter end. But rejection of peace tends gradually to undermine the morale of the nation whose leaders are responsible for refusing to enter into an international conference with a view to bringing hostilities to an end.

FERVOR LATER COOLS

As casualties pile up into ghastly pyramids of carnage, and as not only the horrors, but the strain and irksomeness of war conditions fray the nerves of a people, the refusal of their government to enter into discussion on peace cools the nation's zeal and weaken's the nation's will. A peace offensive by the enemy is therefore a dangerous weapon, which must be countered not alone by dogged and angry refusals but by a subtler, more sapient and sincere counter offensive.

It would be a mistake to compare the conditions of the present war with those of the last. You could then demand the restoration of the whole of Belgium as a preliminary condition of peace. You cannot put forward the same demand with regard to Poland. It would be a challenge to Russia, who has annexed the White Russian and Ukrainian provinces of Poland which are not Polish by race, language, or religion.

If we had to deal with Germany alone, we might with reason plead the experience which has taught us to distrust the good faith of Nazi leaders. But in this case we have to take into account the fact that two powerful neutrals are involved in the peace discussions and that a mishandling of the situation may drive them into active unfriendliness, if not into actual hostility.

Russia is certainly implicated in any Polish settlement, and no general or permanent peace is possible without a consideration of Italian claims in Africa and the Mediterranean. If we antagonize Russia by our reply to Hitler, we must face the stern prospect that an offensive and defensive alliance between Russia and Germany could not be overthrown by 3 years of war. I dare not contemplate all the possibilities of such a tremendous combination of strength against us.

RUSSIA COULD BREAK BLOCKADE

Even without Russia entering the war, an understanding by which Russia undertook, with German expert aid, to mobilize her inexhaustible material resources to supply German deficiencies would effectually break the blockade, which is our only reliable weapon. It is obvious to every one who considers the leisurely measures we are taking to increase our armies in the field that we are no longer depending on hurling our young manhood, and that of France, against masses of reinforced concrete bristling with weapons of slaughter.

If Russia is anxious for a peace talk now, it would be a sad mistake to refuse. We surely ought to know by now that snubbing Russia is a costly piece of insolence. Do not let us repeat that diplomatic gaucherie.

It may be said that Russia cannot produce certain raw materials essential to war. But she and Italy can buy them elsewhere, and if they can buy them they can also sell them elsewhere. We could not prevent these purchases without sinking their ships and making war upon them. Do let us look around all the hazards of our policy, and not always assume that all chances and eventualities of fortune must necessarily come our way.

No man who cares for the good name of Britain would urge us to append her signature to any pact which would stain her honor. But any man who believes in the beneficence of the British Empire as an agent in the advancement of a free, humane civilization, would deplore a policy which would impair its might—and, therefore, its influence—by the reckless addition to its task of enterprisings which are beyond its great strength to accomplish.

A quarrel with Russia was not an obligation of honor for Britain. The Ukrainians are not Poles—neither are the White Russians. We are not, therefore, in honor bound to sacrifice hundreds of thousands of British lives to restore these provinces to Poland. Liberation of the true Poland is another matter. To that we are pledged.

HITLER AGREEABLE TO CONFERENCE

Why not propose a conference of the leading powers of the world to review the whole situation? Hitler seems agreeable to that idea. Russia could hardly refuse to agree, inasmuch as she was the first to propose it some months ago. Our objection to it then was simply on the grounds that it was premature. All parties could enter into such a conference without prejudice to the attitude they have adopted on the questions in dispute.

It is essential that America should be induced, if possible, to take part in such a congress. She is the only completely disinterested power. The fact that the United States of America has consistently refused to get mixed up in the controversies that have led to this war will give her a position of incalculable value in helping the warring powers to come to a fair decision on the issues which have been raised. If the President of the American Republic were to summon such a conference, it would be impossible for any of the belligerents to reject such an invitation without laying themselves open to the condemnation of all the neutral powers of the world.

No topic which is likely to provoke an international disturbance should be excluded from the discussions. Herr Hitler has indicated some of these matters—disarmament, colonies, a Polish state. We are free to propose others which are equally vital to an enduring peace settlement. The presence of neutrals will insure a disinterested consideration of these problems. The fact that each of these contending parties will appeal for neutral support would tend to discourage extreme demands. Nothing would be lost and everything might be gained by such a conference.

The Refugee Problem

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HAMILTON FISH
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, October 9, 1939

SPEECH OF HON. HAMILTON FISH, PRESIDENT OF THE AMERICAN GROUP, THE INTERPARLIAMENTARY UNION, AT THE ANNUAL CONFERENCE OF THE UNION, HELD AT OSLO, NORWAY, ON AUGUST 16, 1939

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted me to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following speech delivered by me at the Interparliamentary Union's Conference, held at Oslo on August 16, 1939:

I propose to speak briefly this morning on the refugee problem, but before doing so I want to give notice that tomorrow, if I am able to obtain the time in the discussion on the peaceful settlement of international disputes, I propose to offer a resolution, which I would like the delegates to consider beforehand, asking for a 30-day armistice between the great European nations in order that they may settle their difficulties by arbitration, conciliation, and peaceful methods rather than by war. I cannot conceive how any democratic nation could refuse to submit these great problems of peace and war to arbitration and conciliation because that at least is consistent with the very existence of the Interparliamentary Union.

The matter that I am about to speak on has already been referred to by the honorable gentleman, Mr. Bellenger, representing the British Parliament, as well as by others. I propose to present to the delegates briefly a plan, or possibly a vision, on a large scale, backed by prominent and wealthy Americans, providing for the settlement of refugees in the undeveloped and sparsely populated but healthy uplands of central Africa. The African continent is the only place left in the world where there are vast territories, rich in natural resources, and where overpopulation is not yet a problem.

This proposal may sound visionary, but it is not half as daring as the founding of a new nation in North America 300 years ago. There is an old saying, "Where there is no vision the people perish." Certainly it must be true that if there is no vision in solving the refugee problem the refugees themselves must perish.

This problem of the refugees is inseparably connected with the preservation of peace. The largest and richest nations with undeveloped territories and natural resources cannot shut their eyes to these deplorable conditions without feeling themselves partially responsible for the prolongation of economic unrest and uncertainty that exists throughout the world. The problem is by no means a Jewish or a racial problem; it involves Catholics and Protestants as well, and people from many nations.

It is essential to discover a new homeland for these unfortunate refugees, driven out by dictatorial governments, where they can find peace, security, employment, and civil liberty. The question that I propose to the delegates from the representative and parliamentary governments of the world is whether there is not still within the boundaries of Africa a vast undeveloped territory capable of supplying the need and of furnishing the livelihood of large numbers of European refugees. I believe in plain speaking. I doubt whether Great Britain, France, or the United States will accept any more refugees in their already over-populated countries where the unemployment of their own people has become a serious and continuous problem. I am not giving away any diplomatic secrets when I tell you, my colleagues, that I discussed the refugee problem with both Lord Halifax, the British Foreign Secretary, and M. Bonnet, the French Foreign Minister, both of whom expressed a definite desire to cooperate in ascertaining if there were any sparsely inhabited but livable lands within their colonial possessions that could be developed by modern science, engineering, irrigation, and medical research and supervision. I also had the honor of discussing the refugee problem with M. Mendel, the French Colonial Minister, who volunteered to have an immediate survey made in the French colonial possessions in Africa and particularly that section to the south and east of Lake Tschad, and invited me to meet him early in September in Paris after his survey had been completed. Both the two foreign ministers of Great Britain and France showed genuine interest in the project, and without making any commitment plainly stated that they were vitally interested in opening up any undeveloped but healthy sections of their colonial possessions for use of Europe's refugees.

I speak for a group of wealthy Americans who are prepared to subscribe a very large sum, up to $100,000,000, to establish a homeland for refugees, regardless of race or religion, in the high lands of Africa. If vast sections of Africa can be made useful to mankind the nations that possess them cannot sit idly by and refuse to open them up for the overpopulated parts of Europe and for the refugees. It is no answer to say that they may be temporarily uninhabitable. The country that I represent today is one of the greatest and richest nations in the world, but it was totally undeveloped 300 years ago. Other nations to the south of us, Cuba, Mexico, Panama, Venezuela, Colombia, and Brazil, nearer the Equator, have been made not only livable, but great, rich, and populous, even without the aid of modern science, medicine, and engineering.

I plead with my fellow delegates to consider this problem. There is no resolution as yet before you, but I ask you to consider the matter and take it back to your Parliaments for further discussion and for inquiry to see whether there is not land available somewhere in this world of ours so that we can, with the help of American money contributed by philanthropists, place these refugees in a homeland of their own where they will have security and peace. I plead with my fellow delegates to cooperate in solving the refugee problem by providing a new homeland for these people where they may have plenty of elbow room and an opportunity to provide for themselves in peace and security free institutions of their own making. It must be a democratic state under representative or parliamentary forms of government, with freedom and liberty for all. [Loud applause.]

Let Congress Join Forces on Neutrality

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. MARTIN J. KENNEDY
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, October 9, 1939

LETTER TO VICE PRESIDENT JOHN N. GARNER DATED OCTOBER 5, 1939, AND REPLY DATED OCTOBER 6, 1939

Mr. MARTIN J. KENNEDY. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following letter of invitation to the Vice President, and his reply, as appended:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., October 5, 1939.

Hon. JOHN NANCE GARNER,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: The eyes of the Nation are on the Senate of the United States, because every citizen is actively and vitally interested in the speeches and the proceedings of the Senate on the neutrality bill. The Members of the House of Representatives are also closely following the proceedings by reading the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, because it is physically impossible for the 435 Representatives to find space in the Senate Chamber so that they may personally listen to the debate.

The proposed neutrality legislation is deeply controversial, and it is therefore important that both branches of Congress have all available information on the subject to assist us to cast an intelligent vote. I believe that it would greatly aid the House Members to be able to be present during the present sessions of the Senate.

The capacity of the Senate Chamber cannot accommodate the House Members, but the capacity of the House Chamber can accommodate both the Senators and the Representatives. May I suggest that arrangements be made for the Senate to hold its sessions in the House Chamber during the special session so that the Members of the House would have the privilege of being in attendance and listening to both sides on the question. I am sure that the House will be delighted to cooperate by making the necessary change in the rules which cover the use of the House Chamber.

In addition to the enlarged facilities offered by the House Chamber, there is also the loud speaker system which would be a convenience for the speakers and the listeners.

With my kind regards, I am,

Sincerely yours,

MARTIN J. KENNEDY.

THE VICE PRESIDENT'S CHAMBER,
Washington, October 6, 1939.

Hon. MARTIN J. KENNEDY,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. KENNEDY: Your favor of the 5th received this morning and I am taking the privilege of referring it to the Rules Committee of the Senate which would have jurisdiction of the matter referred to.

Senator MATTHEW NEELY is chairman of the committee. May I suggest that you and others interested get in touch with him and members of the committee for further consideration of the matter.

With great respect, I am,

Very cordially yours,

JNO. N. GARNER.

Mr. Speaker, should the Senate act upon my invitation, I am quite sure that you and the Committee on Rules will make the necessary arrangements.

War Is Over—Says Shaw

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN E. RANKIN

OF MISSISSIPPI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, October 9, 1939

STATEMENT BY GEORGE BERNARD SHAW

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, under permission granted me to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I am inserting a statement by George Bernard Shaw, world-famous publisher and playwright.

The matter referred to follows:

WAR IS OVER—STALIN WON IT, SAYS SHAW—WRITER ASSERTS FRANCE, BRITAIN, AND REICH "BACKED OUT"

(By George Bernard Shaw)

LONDON, October 6.—The war is over.

Every person in the country capable of seeing three moves ahead in the game of military chess has known this from the moment when the first Russian soldier stepped across the Polish frontier.

But it was obvious before this to the subtler observers when we, to our eternal credit, threw our thoughtless pledge to Poland to the winds.

That pledge was categorical and undeniable.

THREE-YEAR WAR NEEDED

The Poles knew and we knew that we could not put a single soldier into Poland or a single ship into the Baltic until we had conquered Germany.

That conquest we admitted would take at least 3 years. The conquest of Poland by Germany would take 3 weeks.

Poland's only hope was our air force.

The Poles must have pressed for a pledge on this point specifically, for Prime Minister Chamberlain and Foreign Secretary Halifax had declared that if Hitler laid a finger on Poland we should attack Germany "with all our resources."

SMASHING ATTACK INDICATED

This was understood by the Poles to mean exactly what it did mean: That at 11 o'clock on the 3d of September we should dispatch all our bombers to smash up the Rhine cities and Berlin, as Madrid and Warsaw had been smashed up, but with the all-important difference, that though Madrid and Warsaw could no more retaliate than the Abyssinians or the Northwest hill tribes, Germany could immediately play a hailstone chorus on London and all of our provincial centers, the game going on as long as there was a gallon of petrol left in either country to keep it up.

It is, I repeat, to our eternal credit that when it came to this point and we were faced with the responsibility of initiating such a suicidal climax of human villany, we funked it. (Ed. note—Scotch slang for "backed out.")

HUMAN LIVES DON'T MATTER

The French funked it. The Germans funked it.

It was not human lives that mattered: For we bombed German battleships in the Kiel Canal and the Germans torpedoed the Athenia with its hundreds of passengers without remorse.

Our announced methods of blockade had mothers and children as their first victim for, in a siege, fighters must have their bully beef as long as there is a bone in the cupboard and noncombatants must starve first.

It was the cities that mattered. We are not sufficiently good Europeans to feel, as I feel, that the slaughtering of a hundred German boys was just as great a loss to all parties as the slaughter of a hundred thousand English lads, but the reduction of London, Paris, Berlin, to say nothing of dozens of provincial cities and seaports, to heaps of rubbish would bury the belligerent governments under rubbish, and this they were all ready to bar though they blacked out all the same—just in case.

In vain Poland called on us to treat German cities as Warsaw was being treated; our only reply was to drop a packet of tracts on them.

Thus betrayed, Poland has surrendered and laid herself at Hitler's feet. He was able to say that, as Poland's cause is lost, we have no further excuse for continuing the war.

Whereupon, we threw off the mask of knight errantry and avowed flatly that we didn't care two hoots about Poland and were out on our old balance of power lines to disable Germany, which we now called abolishing Hitlerism.

This left Der Fuehrer in a very dangerous position. The axis had broken in his hands from the beginning, Italy and Spain having promptly deserted him. The anticomintern pact had become a danger to him; Turkey was definitely against him; Rumania and the Balkans generally were mortally afraid of him.

UNITED STATES STAND PRO-BRITISH

America's neutrality was pro-British, just as our nonintervention policy in the Spanish Civil War was pro-Franco.

The year 1918 has proved that Germany though unconquerable and even victorious here and there, in the field, could be starved into complete demoralization and defeat by the Allies.

The situation was not pleasant even for a leader drunk with success. Encirclement was fairly complete. Except on one side, where Russia stood with an army of 6,000,000 men eating their heads off.

Those of us who were intelligent and knowledgeable enough to see that the balance of power was in the hands of Stalin had forced our government to make overtures to Russia, and Alfred Duff Cooper (former first lord of the admiralty who resigned in protest after the Munich surrender), a very favorable specimen of our reigning oligarchy, loosened his old-school tie so far as to plead in the London Evening Standard that Stalin, though, of course, a bloodthirsty scoundrel, was perhaps not quite so villainous as Hitler.

Hitler, having the tremendous advantage over Duff Cooper of being a proletarian, and knowing something about the world he was living in, courted Russia more sensibly.

Stalin, 500 percent or so abler and quicker at the uptake than all the dictators, including the Westminster Cabinet, rolled into one, had nothing to consider except which of them he should take by the scruff of the neck.

Before deciding, he sent a handfull of his 6,000,000 men to take possession of the White Russian Ukraine and a substantial bit of Poland.

Hitler at once capitulated unconditionally and was duly taken by the scruff of the neck; for Stalin could use Hitler to keep Duff-Cooperism out of the rest of Poland.

He informed us, in effect, that since we couldn't even be civil to Russia we should not make Poland a gun emplacement for the obvious ultimate aim of our rulers (as far as they are capable of aims) of restoring the Romanoff czardom and once more dining happily with the Benkendorys in Chester Square.

COMMUNIST DRIVE INOPPORTUNE

And so the diplomatic situation stands.

Nothing has happened since except that the French, whether after consulting with us or not I do not know, have most inopportunely started prosecuting their Communists.

Meanwhile, we are all enduring all the vagaries of ineptest military communism from mere discomfort to financial ruin and breaking up of our homes.

Powers, which no Plantagenet king or Fascist dictator would dream of claiming, have been granted to any unqualified person who offered to assume them, including an enterprising burglar.

Whatever our work in life may be, we have been ordered to stop doing it and stand by. Wherever our wives and children are, they have been transported to somewhere else, with or without the mothers.

Our theaters and cinemas have been closed, and our schools, colleges, and public libraries occupied by the military bureaucracy. We have been bundled out of our hotels into the street, neck and crop, and our own houses simultaneously made into nests of billeted little evacuees, often unofficially described at little Hooligans.

HITS WAR BUDGET

Our bungalow, bought by us after careful calculation of our ability to pay the mortgage interest and get to our place of business in a baby auto, have been put "beyond our means" by an appalling budget and by rationing of petrol which aims at our complete immobilization, just as blacking out aims at our being completely blindfolded from sunset to sunrise.

When the bungalows and suburbs raised a bitter cry that they cannot pay the new taxes, Sir John Simon replied frankly that if they don't the government will be forced to resort to inflation, thus reminding us that in Germany, when we forced the Reich to resort to it, two penny postage stamps cost 12,000 marks and the postman's wage rose to a king's ransom, on which you could barely live, whilst the annuities and insurances on which our unmarried daughters and retired folk used to live in decency and some comfort would become worthless.

PRICES UP, INCOME OFF

Our incomes depreciate from week to week through the rise in prices, which the Government is pledged to prevent and cannot.

Such (and much more) is military communism in inexperienced hands, often the hands of fools who come to the top in wartime by their self-satisfied folly, though nobody would trust them to walk a puppy in peacetime.

When we complain we are told we must all make sacrifices and we had better buy white overcoats, carry our gas masks everywhere, and take impracticable precautions against high explosives, blasts, and poison gas.

Naturally we cry, "Sacrifice! Yes. But what for?"

WHAT IS IT ALL ABOUT?

You tell us to be resolute and determined, but we cannot be resolute and determined in the air about nothing. What are we suffering for? Upon what are we resolved? What have we determined? What in the devil's name is it all about, now that we have let Poland go?

Chamberlain in reply states our aim in peroration.

Winston Churchill echoes it in a broadcast with a certain sense of absurdity which the microphone betrays. Our aim is first to deliver Europe from the threat and fear of war. And our remedy is to promise them 3 years more war (!) next, to abolish Hitlerism root and branch.

Well, what about beginning by abolishing Churchillism, a proposition not less nonsensical and more easily within our reach?

But we are told that if we don't send Hitler to St. Helena he will proceed to annex Switzerland, Holland, Belgium, England, Scotland, Ireland, Australia, New Zealand, Canada, Africa, and finally the entire universe, and Stalin will help him.

WHY NOT WAIT FOR GRAB?

I must reply that men like this are frightened out of their wits. Stalin will see to it that nobody, not even our noble selves, will do anything of the sort. Had we not better wait until Hitler tries to do it and then stop him with Stalin and Roosevelt at our back?

The Archbishop of York in the next broadcast finally rose to the occasion as became a great Christian prelate. Unfortunately, he began not as a Christian prelate but as a righteously angry, hotheaded Englishman, by giving his blessing to our troops as "dedicated" to the supreme and immediate duty of lynching Hitler and his associates.

RAKING UP HISTORY

Now, I cannot go into the question of whether Hitler deserves to be lynched without raising awkward analogies between his case and those of Mussolini, Franco, Stalin and his associates, and raking up events in India and Ireland which unfriendly pens have represented as somewhat dictatorial on our part.

I simply remind the archbishop that although we can easily kill a hundred thousand quite innocent German men, women, and children in our determination to get at Hitler, we should not finally succeed in lynching him, and the killing of Germans and our own losses in the process would produce a state of mind on both sides which would operate as a complete blackout of Christianity and make the archbishop's sane, final solution impossible.

VERSAILLES ALL OVER AGAIN

If we won, it would be Versailles all over again, only worse—with another war even less than 20 years off. And if, as is desperately possible, we drove Russia and Germany into a combination against us to avert that catastrophe, which is just what our Stalinphobe old school ties and trade unionists are recklessly trying to do, then we shall indeed need God's help and not deserve it.

BALDERDASH ABOUT DEMOCRACY

No; it will not do, however thickly we butter it with bunk and balderdash about liberty, democracy, and everything that we have just abolished at home.

As the archbishop nobly confesses, we made all the mischief—we and the French—when we were drunk with our victory at Versailles. And if that mischief had not been there for him to undo, Adolf Hitler would have now been a struggling artist and of no political account.

He actually owes his eminence to us; so let's cease railing at our own creation and recognize the ability with which he has undone our wicked work and the debt the German nation owes him for it.

BUSINESS NOW TO MAKE PEACE

Our business now is to make peace with him and with all the world instead of making more mischief and ruining our people in the process.

I wrote without responsibility because I represent nobody but myself and a handful of despised and political powerless intellectuals capable of taking a catholic view of the situation.

One of these unhappy outcasts is my friend H. G. Wells. He has written a vitally important letter to the Times, of which nobody has taken the smallest notice. I disagree with him on one point and would feign to comfort him on it.

He warns us that we are risking not only a military defeat but the existence of civilization and even of the human race. Dear H. G.: Let us not flatter ourselves. The utmost we can do is to kill, say, 25 millions of one another and make ruins of all our great cities and show places for Maori tourists.

Well, let us. In a few months we shall matter no more than last summer's flies.

As two of the flies, we naturally deprecate such an event; but the world will get on without us, and the world will have had an immense gratification of the primitive instinct that is at the bottom of all this mischief and that we never mention, to wit: Pugnacity, sheer pugnacity for its own sake, that much-admired quality of which an example has just been so strikingly set us by the Irish Republican army.

The Neutrality Bill

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. W. O. BURGIN

OF NORTH CAROLINA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, October 9, 1939

EDITORIAL FROM BEASLEY'S FARM AND HOME WEEKLY, OF CHARLOTTE, N. C.

Mr. BURGIN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from Beasley's Farm and Home Weekly, published at Charlotte, N. C.:

[From Beasley's Farm and Home Weekly, Charlotte, N. C.]

SHOULD NOT LOSE OUR SOULS STRIVING TO SAVE OUR SKINS

In their fear lest we get into this war the people of this country have been imposed upon rather brazenly by those who have been busily whipping up an antiwar hysteria. This imposition runs all the way down from the speeches of Senator BORAH and Colonel Lindbergh to the propaganda of Father Coughlin and the crass efforts of the Russian and German mouthpieces in the country. By twisting the issue now before Congress by declaring unequivocally that to change the Embargo Act certainly means war and to make no change means no war, these people have been able so to frighten the less thoughtful people that they are blindly besieging Congress not to make any move.

"Do you want to get into this war? Are you willing for your son to go?" And the terrified people shout, "No!" "Then demand that there be no change in the neutrality law." This process has so whipped up the hysteria that the people are unable to weigh the argument and listen with sense and calmness to the President when he tells them that he is striving with might and main to keep out of the war and is showing them the best way to do so. In this melee we are about to lose our self-respect and the respect of the world, including Hitler's crowd, who already take delight in telling us that we are only a set of boobs, anyway. That is what they really mean when they tell us that we were pulled into the last war by British lies.

Certainly the people of this country do not wish to get into the European war, and there is no reason for us to do so. But while holding to that purpose we should not sink so low as to forget all human values nor become so drunk with fear that nothing but staying out will count. We can stay out with dignity without sacrificing all our rights, without losing all perspective or sacrificing our sense of right and wrong, and, above all, failing to comprehend what the struggle is about. So far as rights go, we are willing to surrender many rather than to get into war.

Thus the new neutrality bill in Congress surrenders nearly all the rights of an independent and neutral nation. It surrenders our right to come and go upon the high seas, our right to trade with belligerents and to a considerable extent our rights to continue our peaceful trade with other peaceful nations. As a neutral we are surrendering important rights which Italy as a neutral will hold to and profit by. But that is all right. Our people wish it so. We can afford to surrender much.

But we cannot surrender our right to help the side which is staggering under the burden of defending all that we hold dear from the assaults and the possible triumph of what we hate and condemn. To claim to be neutral in thought in this struggle would by hypocritical. We are not neutral. No good man is neutral when he sees vice and virtue struggling. Not being neutral, we should refuse to pose as neutral. Legally we can be neutral, and under that legal neutrality we can help our friends. Let us boldly say that we shall sell them arms and munitions and anything else they need because we have both the legal and moral right to do so and because we wish to do so. Any other course would be taken by Hitler's cutthroats simply as cowardice. We shall have their contempt as well as the ill will which we already have.

Let us not be driven into the cynical attitude of passing up the agony and suffering of Europe as something that does not concern us, merely a rivalry of governments in which all are equally to blame. To fall into that callousness would simply show that we are unworthy of our position in the world, unfit to assume those duties of help after the war which are rather vaguely spoken of among those who fear that we may do something now.

If we lose our understanding now we shall be slow to regain it when the war is over. We should never forget for a moment that the English and the French, neither their people nor their Governments, wanted to go to war. For 7 years they were so opposed to going to war that they gave up, step by step, whatever a drunken and wreckless leader demanded. They could not believe that any nation could allow itself to be rushed headlong into a war whatever the cause. We should not forget that this very forebearance, this dread of war, kept the English and French from being prepared for war till the very last. Their desire to keep out of war gave Hitler the great start he had in building up the machine that ran over and crushed without pity a helpless neighbor and would so crush whatever stands in its way.

We cannot accuse the French and British people of bringing on this war. Their desire to have no war has cost them dearly in unpreparedness. "Herr Hitler," says David Lawrence, "came in recent months to have a contempt for the British and French. He felt that they had been cowed into submission by fear of the horrors of war. He misjudged the spirit of liberty-loving people, even as some of his coleaders or successors may some day misjudge American indifference and aloofness as cowardice.

"The stoicism of the Briton and the stolidity of the Frenchman are easy to misjudge. These characteristics are not ostentatious or passionate nor do they connote bluster or bluff or threat. They are merely the qualities of a people who know liberty and know how to fight to retain it.

"War means regimentation and, for the time being, a loss of liberty, but it means a swing back to freedom afterward. A democracy understands when to impose and when to relax restrictions.

"But the greatest of all forces in a war-engaged democracy is its spirit. This is a collective emotion hardly to be dismissed with the single word patriotism. It is a spirit rather of united brotherhood, crusading for a principle that is bigger than life itself.

"To the extent that materialism and selfishness, indulgence and fondness for worldly pleasures have crept into the postwar life of the two decades since 1918, we see on almost every side in America an indifference to the higher compensations. We see a love of self, of individual power, of profits and possessions. Death, the inevitable end of mortal man, decreed for everybody at sometime, becomes an illogical, distant contingency. Anything, anything to live; yes, even peace at any price!"

Banshees

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. MARTIN L. SWEENEY
OF OHIO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, October 9, 1939

LETTER OF THE HONORABLE JOHN J. O'CONNOR

Mr. SWEENEY. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include an amusing and enlightening letter by our former colleague the Honorable John J. O'Connor, of New York, on the subject of banshees.

NEW YORK, September 16, 1939.

Mr. FRANK M. O'BRIEN,
Editor, The New York Sun,
280 Broadway, New York.

DEAR MR. O'BRIEN: Because I was out of town surveying the 1940 situation in New England, your editorial, A Double-Headed Banshee? in your paper of September 14, has just come to my attention.

In the editorial you refer to the President's complaint that the newspaper correspondents had created a double-headed banshee of Corcoran and Cohen, and the editorial mentions my name as one who could have a banshee. You go on to say, "More education about banshees is needed." It surely is—from the President down.

Being totally and proudly of Irish extraction, with the strain never crossed since the days of the last king of Ireland, Roderick (the Red) O'Connor, permit me to keep the record straight.

Banshees were of the female sex, so Corcoran and Cohen could not, apparently, qualify in that historic category. No banshee ever played the accordion or the stock market in utilities, etc. Truly, they were women of the fairies, according to Irish and general Celtic folklore. They were accustomed to screaming or keening at night to foretell the death of some member of the household. There were similar ghostly informers in both British and Welsh folklore.

The confusion into which the newspapermen fell must have been due, not alone to the confusion of sex or the screaming of the accordion in the White House at night but to the keening of this pair, bearing ominous bodings to business, the utilities and investors generally. The banshee always brought sad news—never encouraging words.

Back in the nineties—gay or otherwise—I lived in a small city in Massachusetts. On the same street with the O'Connors was a family named Fields, who were professional keeners. They hired themselves out for wakes and chanted dolefully and long over the departed one. To keep in trim, they practiced day and night. Time and again we stood outside their house and listened to the odd chants and moanings, so far removed from the new world.

A few miles away, in Pawtucket, Corcoran lived on the other side of the railroad tracks. But the outstanding distinction of the Irish banshee was that she only attended on families of pure Milesian descent. There may have been keeners in Pawtucket but there were few Milesians. However, outside of sex, Cohen could not have been a banshee or be bothered by any.

Sincerely yours,

JOHN O'CONNOR,
Former Congressman.

Pastorius Day Dinner

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. FRED C. GARTNER
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, October 9, 1939

RADIO ADDRESS OF THEODORE H. HOFFMANN, NATIONAL CHAIRMAN OF THE STEUBEN SOCIETY OF AMERICA

Mr. GARTNER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD the address of Theodore H. Hoffmann, national chairman of Steuben Society of America, over station WGBI, Scranton Pa., and delivered on the occasion of the Pastorius dinner of the German-American Federation of Lackawanna County on October 5, 1939, at the Hotel Jermyn:

He is a traitor to his race,
Who, lured by power, or awed by place,
Makes compromise with wrong;
Upon the gibbet of his lie
His soul shall shrivel, rot, and die,
And minstrelry shall pass him by Without the mockery of song.

He is immortal—only he—
Who stands for right unflinchingly,
On watch from dark till dawn;
By God's eternal stars he steers,
Nor stays for storms, nor fails for fears,
For truth is truth a thousand years;
God's heroes march forever on.

Mr. Chairman, guests of honor, fellow Americans, tonight, on the eve of Pastorius Day, it is my privilege to be with you in the important city of Scranton, situated in a State that is so replete with German culture, folklore, and history. Therefore, I appreciate having been given this opportunity, and to be able to convey at the outset the thanks of the Steuben Society of America for the honor of having its national chairman address you today.

You men and women of Germanic extraction assembled here will be called upon to assist in working out a program whereby we can support our country and its institutions, and whereby we may be allowed to contribute our bit to preserve the principles as laid down by the founders of this Republic, and to cherish its traditions.

The history of the achievements of men and women of our race and their contributions to this our country need repetition upon such occasions as these.

On October 6, 1683, the ship Concord sailed up the Delaware River and landed near the newly founded village of Philadelphia to discharge her passengers, who forthwith established themselves at Germantown under the leadership of Franz Daniel Pastorius. They were Germans; the first considerable group of immigrants from the country from which a continuous stream of newcomers has since that time arrived in America to become a part of the American people and to contribute to the building of the great Nation of which we are proud today.

Like the landing of the Mayflower at Plymouth, the landing of the Concord is symbolic of the future history of America. It should be one of the sacred memories of every true American. The coming of the Pilgrim Fathers of Plymouth foreshadowed one aspect of the character of the American Nation, and the arrival of the Pennsylvania pilgrims foretold another aspect. Neither of these events can be understood if it is to be taken as something of value only to those who are of the same European stock as the men and women who stepped ashore on these memorable occasions. They are not true Americans who cannot grasp the common national significance of both these events as well as of similar occurrences during the infancy of the American Nation.

We of German extraction are glad to share with our friends who claim descent from other nations of Europe the veneration, love, and affection we owe and give to this, our country. For after all, we are all extensions of European stock, some of our parents stepping off the immigrant ship a year or two ahead or behind the parents of other men and women who have blended, fused, and merged so that the native-born American is or will be a composite in a very large measure of Irish, English, Scotch, Italian, German, and other blood. To that composition Germany has contributed courage, loyalty, industry, and a love for freedom. German blood has been spilled on every battlefield ever since the existence of the United States. Its crimson trail may be traced from Valley Forge and on through the history of our country.

Firm as a wall of iron the Germans have ever stood in defense of true Americanism. Like Steuben at Valley Forge and Yorktown, like De Kalb at Camden, like Armistead at Fort McHenry, like Kichlein at Long Island, like Herkimer at Oriskany, like Quitman at Chapultepec, like Osterhaus on Lookout Mountain, like Schurz and Steinwehr on Cemetery Ridge, like Custer on the Little Big Horn, like Schley at Santiago, like Barbara Fritchie at Frederick, like Muhlenberg in his pulpit, and thousands of others, the Germans will be on the firing line in any crisis—not watchfully waiting but striking hard blows for the priceless heritage of liberty, the radiant hope of humanity—that government of the people, by the people, and for the people shall not perish from the face of the earth.

Today the dark clouds of war are over Europe and have already opened up, pouring death and destruction over many countries, threatening to engulf the entire world.

Today in our country we are faced with the same sinister and insidious war propaganda which drove our country into the World War, a war which it is now conceded we ought never to have entered.

As Americans, interested in American institutions and principles, we do not consider it to be within our province to presume to prescribe to any other country what form of government its people shall adopt. We do not deny to peoples in this country their right to express themselves, if they feel justified in doing so; but we emphatically deny the right of organized groups and men in public life and office to carry on a high-pressure propaganda in this country for the purpose of stampeding it into actions which are contrary to the public welfare, and a menace to its peaceful relations between friendly nations.

This is a question which affects all Americans.

Ours is a Nation composed of citizens of all countries, and no one has a place in our ranks whose allegiance is not wholly to the United States of America.

We deprecate and disapprove of any exhibition of foreign politics on our shores which can have no other result than to create a feeling of hostility against those who exhibit it and the country which they claim to represent.

We resent it as in conflict with the principles on which our country is founded. Our problems are different from those of any other country. Whereas there is homogeneity of population in England, France, and Germany, we here have representations of all the races and nationalities of the world within our borders and we have a right to demand of them that when they leave their respective countries they also leave behind the differences which separated them at home. They must learn to consider and study all questions and problems from the American perspective and none other. As Americans we cannot tolerate any attempts made to be influenced by any of the many factions in European countries, and for the sake of the continued peace of our people we must frown down any attempt to spread among them the seeds of dissention which if allowed to germinate will cause them to forget and disregard their oath of allegiance to the country of their choice and adoption and thus be guided in their conduct by foreign-born prejudices and not by what should be their first and only consideration—the welfare of America.

The terrible and almost irremediable conditions existing in Europe and in our country are nothing but the fruits of that document of superhate, greed, and avarice, the Treaty of Versailles. To call it a peace document is the superlative of hypocrisy.

At Versailles the Allies imposed upon Germany those terms of humiliation and degredation which that people now insist they will remove at all hazards. To anyone who should question our right as American citizens to enter into this subject at all, I make the reply that this is an American question on all points. An American President laid down certain 14 points, the same American President, when Germany sued for peace, put to it the question, "Will you consent to make peace on the strength of my 14 points?" and received the reply: "On the basis of those 14 points we will lay down our arms." And be it said to our eternal shame that our representatives broke faith with the vanquished foe. Outwitted by the most clever and the shrewdest of European diplomats, we assisted in forging the fetters which the world must break if peace and happiness shall once more gladden the face of the earth. The Versailles Treaty crucified the 14 points. It made the world safe, not for democracy, but for English and French imperialism, militarism, and the dictatorships

The great justification for the last war was that it was to end war; but what a consummation of that devout wish! The world has not only gained nothing, but has lost almost everything, even its soul. It has violated its pledges to the quick and the dead, has dishonored its signatures under solemn treaties, has defiled its past and jeopardized its future. The sacred tenets of old have been cast to the winds, the manly fight between foemen was distorted into a deviltry of madmen with pen in hand and sacrilege on tongue.

Whoever felt proud of this so-called treaty has no cause to feel proud today in looking backward 20 years. I need not dwell upon these past events and do not need to pass judgment on them. Others have done that in whose favor it may be said that they hail from the victorious countries, although their condemnation of the insanity of Versailles has been carefully hidden from the American people. Such news is still not fit to print.

There is no parallel in history, the destruction of Carthage excluded, where victors defied every law of God and man and reason and decency, as during and after that war that was to be a holy war, a veritable crusade.

So I say, let's mind our own business and attend to our own serious problems and we will have plenty to do.

"The true patriot benefits his own country without diminishing the welfare of other nations."

In order that our country may never again be drawn into another conflict on foreign soil and our boys again needlessly slaughtered, it is our solemn duty to insist that our Congress does not change the provisions of the present Neutrality Act. There is one thing certain, and that is that Congress is the last chance for our country and our people to keep out of war.

We hear a great deal about possible invasions by foreign powers. We need have no fear of invasion, because it would mean economic, financial, military, and naval suicide for any nation that would try it.

Various groups and some important individuals in this country are assiduously working through propaganda and organized influence to get the United States once more to join openly in the dangerous game that leads to war. They are beginning to spread the crusade idea that this great, powerful, Christian Nation must join the intrigue and military debauchery of the Old World to save democracy.

These are beautiful and inspiring phrases. The fact of the matter is these idealists are putting themselves in the unenviable position of becoming selling agents for the warmongers and the international munitions profiteers. The United States may well prepare again to be the dupe of Europe to supply money, credit, and munitions and spill the life-blood of thousands of American boys on foreign soil unless the "save the world for democracy" farce is unmasked and the play stopped.

Not so long ago our Ambassador to France, William C. Bullitt, at Bordeaux, delivered a speech partly devoted to a eulogy of Bordeaux wines to which no objection can be made as far as good salesmanship is concerned, but when beyond that he endeavored to again sell the United States to France, as Herrick did, we certainly protest that the people of this country disavow every promise he may have made in that direction.

It is praiseworthy for our ambassadors to foreign countries to cultivate pleasant relationships with them; but it is to be regretted that the adulation which they in return receive as being representative of a great and powerful country makes them forget their own homeland.

Ambassador Page, who "misrepresented" the United States in London during the World War, was a glaring instance of that failing. It was said of him that he was the best "Englishman" in the United Kingdom.

The most important admonition to the citizens of the United States who are appointed to diplomatic posts in foreign countries should be, Don't forget that you are an American!

The people of the United States themselves—they who will be called upon to sacrifice the lives of their sons on the battlefield, they who must bear the financial burden of conducting such a war, they who will be called upon to tax themselves for the support of thousands of invalids who may have escaped total annihilation, they who must assume the burden of paying pensions to those who have returned unscathed from scenes of carnage on foreign soil—shall be the sole judges to decree that such sacrifices and burdens shall hereafter be assumed.

The people have a right to learn through the proper committees of the Senate and House what the foreign policy of the administration is, and this information must be given before we become involved. After the administration has secretly engineered us into a position out of which we cannot extricate ourselves, when the cry goes up, "Stand by the President," it will be too late to save us from war; the hands of Congress will have been fettered.

Events of the last few months have plainly shown the determination of the international warmongers to bring about a vast world conflict. Thousands of propagandists in papers throughout the country forced war scares into headlines that were never justified by facts and wrote lurid hate fictions disguised as news.

You can be sure that every effort will be made by internationalists, by interventionists, and by warmongers to drag us into foreign wars.

Let us live up to the slogan not of any President, who as history has shown, may forget, but of our own Uncle Sam, who has nailed his flag to the masthead with the command which those in and out of power dare not disregard, "No more foreign wars for me!"

We are passing through an era of stress, restlessness, and great uncertainty, both economic and political; the basis and fundamentals of our democracy are being assailed by undeserved privation on the one hand, and on the other they are fiercely attacked by political demagogues who make so-called practical politics their slimy trade.

If we are to maintain the ideals of our democracy, it is necessary that we think of these things seriously. Each generation and each period has its problems. For present-day Americans perhaps nothing is more important than the constant and vigilant resistance to the domination of selfish and private interests in the affairs of government in order that liberty and justice may still be secure and the public welfare may still be supreme.

And so my message to you in this hour of great need, in this crisis, is to fight together shoulder to shoulder for our objectives.

According to statistics there are over 32,000,000 souls in this country of ours who are of German origin. History is replete with accounts of the devotion, sacrifices, and achievements of the German element in the founding and upbuilding of the United States. History also records, in a black chapter, the unwarranted persecution of this same element during the period of the World War.

So let us make it clear that we will not tolerate any attempt made by any group in any way to attack our race and blood, and that we intend to fight with all honorable means at our disposal any and all propaganda and race discrimination aimed at our good name and splendid record of contribution which materially helped to make this country great and powerful.

That we will fight with all honorable means at our disposal any and all attempts on the part of any and all persons in public office or any and all groups who will attempt to drag this country into foreign entanglements or bring us into foreign wars.

That we will fight hand in hand with other patriotic Americans to prevent the flower of our manhood from being slaughtered on foreign soil, because we believe that the future of American youth is on top of American soil, not underneath European dirt.

Americans of Germanic extraction do not want communism, fascism, nazi-ism, or any other foreign "isms" in this country.

But we ask the Government and the Dies committee to also investigate French and British propaganda prevalent in our land.

Let's get the truth about the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace, the Rockefeller Foundation, and the Foreign Policy Association.

Let's get the truth about the Alliance Francaise. Have we forgotten that France some years ago set aside a huge fund for propaganda to be used in the United States of America?

I ask every American citizen of Germanic extraction to continue to live up to the traditions of this country.

I ask every American citizen of Germanic extraction to be neutral in word and deed.

I ask all American citizens of Germanic extraction to stand together to protest and fight against all attempts to entangle our country with foreign alliances or to break down our neutrality, all of which would jeopardize the independence of our country and our democratic form of government.

And, in conclusion, let us remember the words of Abraham Lincoln:

"The people of the United States are the rightful masters of both Congress and courts; not to overthrow the Constitution, but to overthrow the men who pervert the Constitution.

"The struggle of today is not altogether for today—it is for a vast future. If destruction be our lot, we must ourselves be its author and finisher. * * * As a nation of freemen, we must live for all time—or die by suicide."

There must be no repetition of 1914 to 1918, resulting in more than a hundred thousand American boys dead, hundreds of thousands maimed or gasping out a miserable existence from shell shock and gas poisoning. The record of the war debts of our dear Allies to the tune of $13,000,000,000 which we will never get—a war that cost us $50,000,000,000 for which we are paying today and for which our children will continue to pay.

And we are now asked to approve a credit-and-carry plan, a plan which would circumvent the Johnson Act, which prohibits the granting of credits to any nation that defaulted on its war loans. Our answer is, unalterably and definitely, "No!"

We must not become involved in war.

Opposing Repeal of the Arms Embargo

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HAMILTON FISH

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, October 9, 1939

LETTER OF HON. HAMILTON FISH, OF NEW YORK, IN REPLY TO COMMUNICATIONS RECEIVED IN BEHALF OF THE ARMS-EMBARGO REPEAL

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted me to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following letter I forwarded to those of my constituents who favor repeal of the arms embargo and setting forth my views on the cash-and-carry plan:

For more than 12 years I have opposed in the Congress the sale of arms and ammunitions, both in time of peace as well as in war, for blood money and war profits to kill people with whom we are at peace. I regard the traffic in arms as being immoral and un-Christian, and tending to drag us into wars throughout the world.

I do not believe the real controversy is between the arms embargo and the credit-and-carry plan, but rather between war and peace. I am willing at all times to accept any amendments to the neutrality law that will help perfect it and keep America out of war; I don't care what the name of the plan is. I would favor an amendment that American ships enter the war zones at their own risk, or even a cash-and-carry plan, if the arms embargo is maintained.

I agree with President Roosevelt's statement at Chautauqua in 1936 that "if war should break out again in another continent, let us not blink the fact that we would find in this country thousands of Americans who, seeking immediate riches—fool's gold—would attempt to break down or evade our neutrality. * * * To resist the clamor of that greed, if war should come, would require the unswerving support of all Americans who love peace. * * * If we face the choice of profits or peace, the Nation will answer—must answer—'We choose peace.'"

Although I have always opposed the arms traffic, I shall keep an open mind as to any amendments or proposals, from whatever source, that will promote peace and keep us out of war.

Thanking you for your letter, I am,

Sincerely yours,

HAMILTON FISH.

Proposed Argentine Trade Agreement Hits at Northwest

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN G. ALEXANDER

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, October 9, 1939

LETTER FROM THE ST. PAUL (MINN.) ASSOCIATION OF COMMERCE, AND AFFIDAVIT OF ATTILIO CASTIGLIANO

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, among the many resolutions and letters received by me in relation to the Government's proposed reciprocal trade agreement with Argentina, none better express the situation regarding the damage its adoption will cause Northwest agriculture than the following messages which I have just received from St. Paul:

ST. PAUL ASSOCIATION OF COMMERCE,
St. Paul, Minn., October 3, 1939.

Hon. JOHN G. ALEXANDER,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. ALEXANDER: Farmers and businessmen of the Northwest are deeply concerned with the untoward results which might accrue to Northwest agricultural and business interests as a result of negotiations now pending between the United States Department of State and representatives of Argentina in the matter of reciprocal-trade agreements.

There is, we fear, a tendency to overlook the importance of Argentina as an agricultural competitor and to minimize the agricultural importance of some 20 other South and Central American countries which may come to us for concessions on competitive agricultural products.

Argentina in area is about equal to our 11 Mountain and Pacific States with about 700,000,000 acres of land, of which 223,000,000 acres are adapted to stock raising, 210,000,000 acres of land for crop production, and 180,000,000 acres to orchards and forests.

Wheat, corn, flax, and oats are leading crops with production in sugar, wine, cotton, fruit, casein, cheese, other dairy products, and poultry making rapid progress.

The livestock census of 1930 enumerates 32,211,855 head of cattle, 44,413,200 head of sheep, 3,768,738 head of hogs.

Packing houses have been established at Buenos Aires and the export of the beef and mutton has become a great industry. The largest refrigerating plant in the world is located there. Argentina now supplies more than half of the hides imported by the United States. Flour milling is a second largest industry.

Argentina has about 25,000 miles of railroad and 57,600 registered trucks plying over 178,000 miles of highway.

In 1936 Argentina sold to us about $77,000,000 while our sales to her were about $56,000,000. Her exports to the United Kingdom in 1937 were about $99,000,000; to Germany (1938), $50,000,000; to Belgium, about $23,000,000 in 1938; to France and Italy, about $21,000,000 each. The figures for 1935 and 1936 show that we bought much more from her than we sold to her.

A study of her industrial development shows that she now has more than 40,000 industrial plants employing more than 500,000 persons. This industrial development would tend to discourage high hopes for increases in our sales to her of manufactured commodities.

With these facts in mind, with more which might be set out here, the board of directors of the St. Paul Association of Commerce and the agricultural committee of the association feel impelled to submit the following resolution:

"Resolution

"The board of directors of the St. Paul Association of Commerce concurs in the following resolutions adopted by the agricultural committee:

" 'The agricultural committee of the St. Paul Association of Commerce, in session duly called, views with concern reported negotiations now pending between the United States Department of State and representatives of Argentina in matters of trade agreements between these two countries.

" 'Argentina is a strong, rapidly growing agricultural state comparative to agricultural United States in climate, crops, soil, machinery equipment, and farming technique, as well as in livestock, poultry, and dairy production.

" 'Argentina is a direct competitor in beef, mutton, pork, poultry, wheat, corn, oats, barley, rye, and flax production with our Northwest farmers.

" 'We oppose tariff concessions to Argentina at the expense of our Northwest agricultural welfare.

" 'We suggest that our agricultural interests be definitely safeguarded against unfavorable and arbitrary exchange rates.

" 'We submit exchange on New York should be on a most-favored-nation basis.

" 'We authorize the selection of a representative to file a brief and appear at hearings at Washington, D. C., that Minnesota and Northwest agricultural interests may be fully protected and safeguarded, not only in relation to Argentina but in relation to any other competitive markets for which trade agreements are proposed.' "

Hearings are to be held October 16 in Washington. We urge you to attend this hearing. The St. Paul Association of Commerce will have a representative at this hearing.

Very truly yours,

ROLAND J. FARICY, President.

STATE OF MINNESOTA,
County of Ramsey, ss:

Attilio Castigliano, being first duly sworn, under oath deposes and states:

1. That he is the vice president and treasurer of the Stella Cheese Co., a $300,000 Wisconsin corporation, organized and incorporated in 1917 and that his address is Metropolitan Bank Building, St. Paul, Minn.

2. That the Stella Cheese Co. has been engaged in the production of cheese of Italian types since its organization, and that at the present time said company produces annually about 10,000,000 pounds of cheese of the following varieties: Reggiano, Parmesan, Romano, Modena, Asiago, Provolone, and Gorgonzola.

3. That in the production of said volume of cheese the Stella Cheese Co. is utilizing approximately 120,000,000 pounds of milk, equivalent to 6,000,000 pounds of butter, and that it operates cheese factories and curing warehouses at the following points: Baltic, Mass, Ewen and Baraga, in the Upper Peninsula of Michigan; Campbellsport, Le Roy, Clayton, Cumberland, and Baronett, Wis.

4. That, with the operation of said plants, it furnishes steady employment during the entire year to about 300 persons, earning salaries running from $60 to $350 per month, and is utilizing the year around the entire milk production of 2,500 farmers.

5. That in the distribution of the cheese of its production the Stella Cheese Co. maintains distributing warehouses in Boston, New York, Newark, Philadelphia, Buffalo, and Chicago.

6. That the affiant has been advised that the Department of State intends to negotiate a reciprocal-trade agreement with Argentina involving certain concessions to be granted to Argentina, among them a reduction on the present tariff rate on cheese imported from said country.

7. That the Stella Cheese Co., is interested in this matter particularly, because all the types of cheese imported into the United States from Argentina, whether known under the names above mentioned or not, are made with a process identical to the process used in producing the Italian types of cheese above mentioned and produced in the United States.

8. And that, being desirous of collecting data and information valuable to the Committee for Reciprocity Information, the affiant respectfully prays said Committee for Reciprocity Information and the Department of State to advise him of the nature and the extent of said intended concession, and particularly of the types and varieties of cheese affected by said intended concession.

Now, therefore, the affiant respectfully serves notice to the Department of State and to the Committee for Reciprocity Information of the intention of the Stella Cheese Co. to appear officially at the hearing to be held October 16 at 10 a. m., before the Committee for Reciprocity Information in Washington, D. C., and kindly requests said committee to furnish him with copy of the rules and regulations governing said hearings.

ATTILIO CASTIGLIANO,
Vice President.

Subscribed and sworn to before me this 27th day of September, A. D. 1939.

T. F. QUINN,
Notary Public, Ramsey County, Minn.

My commission expires April 23, 1943.

Address of Hon. Aubrey Williams Before National Conference of Catholic Youth Organizations

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FRANK W. FRIES

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, October 9, 1939

ADDRESS BY HON. AUBREY WILLIAMS

Mr. FRIES. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address delivered by Administrator Aubrey Williams before the National Conference of Catholic Youth Organizations, Cincinnati, Ohio, Tuesday, October 3, 1939:

I am very happy to participate in this meeting. I am happy to be here with my friend and fellow worker, Mr. Burns Weston, and I am happy to be here because of my friend, Monsignor Wagner.

All people of good will today are shocked and saddened by the catastrophe which has finally come to pass in Europe. The thing that we had hoped and prayed for 20 years would not happen, has happened and all our values seem to be knocked awry. The most tragic part of this conflict lies in that very fact—that all the people of the world are shocked and confused by the seeming disappearance overnight of the values of peace and progress toward which their efforts had been directed. They stand still in their tracks, sensing a loss of the familiar landmarks by which they had been accustomed to mark their way and they say, "Where now?"

I am not here today to talk about Europe but about America. My job is concerned with America and American youth. Others wiser in world affairs than myself will have to interpret the tragedy of Europe's battlefields. But I am concerned that the overwhelming impact of that tragedy should not blind us to our task here at home, the task at which this Nation has been working for 164 years, the perfecting of our democracy.

We have seen democracy disappear in country after country and it has strengthened our determination to make democracy in our own land so strong and so effective that it could withstand all attack. Democracy is not an ideal that can be destroyed with gunboats and armies; it is destroyed only when the people themselves lose faith in its effectiveness. It is that faith which we in this country must defend and strengthen; that is our first task in a confused and tragic world.

Everywhere the people of the world are taking stock. We ought to do likewise. We will do well these days to look frankly at the conditions under which our people live in order to estimate the strength of their faith in democracy. Let us look behind the words "democracy," "freedom," and "opportunity," to see the extent to which they have reality and meaning for our people. Let us look at our Government to see what is being done to bring about for all people a life worth living and defending instead of a life futilely thrown away on a battlefield. These are the battles which we in this country are fighting, battles against conditions which undermine faith in our own democratic institutions.

There is much talk today at home and abroad about democracy. At the moment to prate of democracy is all the rage. Whatever anyone wants to do, it is the fashion to clothe it in the mantle of democracy. The discerning know that this is all too often the merest pretense and that it is the veriest lip service to a dominant word or vogue.

But those who live and practice the ways of democratic living know better. They know that democracy is a product of action—that it is a way of life. Not something talked into being, not something repressed into existence, not a thing born of fear, but a free, vigorous, unafraid existence born from inner strength developed through the give and take of a society of free men, women, and children.

We speak of winning freedom, and this is right. It has to be won; won each day. It has to be lived into existence with each new day. What was possessed last year—10 years ago—may not exist today—will not exist, we may be sure, unless it is rewon again or held against those forces that seek everlastingly to thwart and deprive man of his own personality and of his freedom.

Our gains even have not been too impressive, and when the world is taking stock of itself it might be well for us to do a bit of checking and stock taking of what we have in the way of democracy here at home.

One of the predicates of democracy is a reasonable degree of equality of opportunity—social, economic, and political. Looking at the facts, no honest man can claim that this country offers anything like equal opportunity for all. We know that it never has. It has striven to do so, and this is one major point of difference between us and the totalitarian states. We may judge ourselves not by what we have accomplished but by what we would like to do—by our objectives—granted that we have not been able to attain the objectives. We live in the faith and with the hope that we shall come nearer and nearer to their realization.

What is important here is to keep in mind what our objectives are and to what degree we are achieving them.

I have little hope that I can add anything to the discussions that have already taken place at your conference and which will take place tomorrow. You have discussed how adversely the difficulty of finding a job affects youth. You undoubtedly have been told many times that this is our biggest and most serious problem—this problem of unemployment. I can only emphasize and underscore that statement.

There are some 21,000,000 young people between the ages of 16 and 24. Seven million of these are privately employed in industry, agriculture, and other occupations; 5,000,000 are in secondary schools and colleges; 9,000,000 are at home or looking for work. Based upon the Biggers' report and other studies, it is safe to say that almost 6,000,000 of these are in the labor market looking for work, and most of these are desperately in need. Add to these the millions of adults unemployed, and you have the gist of the Nation's most difficult and vital problem.

It is becoming almost trite to say the Nation must soon find a way to include all of these millions in its going economy. For 6 years this has been the burden of the work before the New Deal. Practically all its efforts have been directed toward the solving of this problem. First, was the effort to do something about the banking system. It was recognized that before you could do anything about unemployment you had to do something about the banking system of the Nation. In 1933, when the Roosevelt administration came into power it found the banking houses of the Nation closed Twenty-two hundred of them had closed their doors during the year. There was in progress a mixing of investment banking with deposit and savings banking. One of the first and most important steps which this administration took was to put a floor under the banking structure of the Nation and guarantee the safety and security of deposits. The next step it took was to arrange for the separation of investment and deposit banking. This was a recognition of the great importance of money and what happens to money in the national economy. Now banking has been stabilized and arrangements made whereby people can do business with money, regularized and divested of previous hazards. This has had and will have far-reaching effects on stabilizing employment and reducing unempoyment. The problem of money, its propensity to flow into the hands of those who already have more than they can profitably use, its tendency to jam and jell and freeze are part of this problem of unemployment; and anybody to understand the problem of unemployment, the problems of youth seeking to get employment, will do mighty well to study money and what happens to it.

The next thing this administration undertook was a wide series of Government interventions to implement and increase business activity. First, it was the establishment of the C. C. C., then the F. E. R. A., then the W. P. A., then the Public Works Administration, then the A. A. A., then the Surplus Commodity Corporation, then the Farm Security Administration, then the National Youth Administration, then the Federal Housing Administration, the Home Owners' Loan Corporation, the Farm Credit Administration, the United States Housing Authority, and the Rural Electrification Administration. These all had a multiple purpose. They were born of the necessity caused by the depression, to give employment to unemployed workers, and next they were designed to increase the total purchasing power. They all had also a corollary purpose; in that each served the people by adding to the public wealth; the Rural Electrification Administration to provide rural people with electric power, etc. In the same category are those things such as old-age assistance, old-age annuities, unemployment compensation.

These are all of a piece and represent the democratic form of intervention and implementation of industry. They are the modern way of aiding business and industry. Specifically, the F. E. R. A., W. P. A., N. Y. A., and P. W. A. may be said to be required because of the dislocations in industry due to our power to overproduce; or, conversely, our lack of purchasing power, which in turn creates unemployment. The F. H. A. and U. S. H. A. may be said to be caused by trends in the field of housing. It is increasingly evident that low-cost housing is no longer a profitable investment for private capital. Old-age annuities, old-age security, and old-age pensions may be said to be caused by employment trends in private industry where it is increasingly the employment policy of industry to have younger and younger people.

The National Youth Administration and the Civilian Conservation Corps may be said to be caused by the increase in population and the reduction of industrial population as caused by the trend of industrial technology whereby industry can produce more with fewer people. These moves and similar moves have been the result of a great demand throughout the Nation and have been subjected to wide public discussion. This is right and proper and is very desirable, because there can be no question but that some such measures are here for a long time, how long no man can say; possibly some of them are here permanently, such as old-age annuities, unemployment compensation, public expenditures for youth. In inaugurating these measures the administration has necessarily employed new techniques and new methods. It has, however, a strong precedence for such intervention by the Government in assisting business. I refer to the Government's having given private corporations every other section of land across the continent as a means of aiding them in the development of railroads. I refer to the tariffs which have been assessed against the consumers all these years. I refer to the subsidies that have been granted to the shipbuilders, to the airplane industry, to the communications industry, and so forth. I have not the slightest quarrel with this. I think it was proper. I only regret that some who are strongest in their advocacy of Government intervention in private industry through direct subsidies to business are most severe in condemning the Government's intervention in seeking to aid industry through increasing the purchasing power of the whole people.

These things are destined to play an important part in the future of America. They have, on the whole, been organized and administered in such a way as to make them fit easily within the framework of the American way of life. They provide for the continued individualization of living. They are designed to protect and stabilize home ownership, as for example the H. O. L. C., F. H. A., U. S. H. A., and thereby stabilize the family as the continued basic unit of our society. They provide for the continued individualization of the worker, offering him opportunities to continue to work in his chosen profession; the artist to paint, the musician to play, the writer to write, the brick mason to lay brick, a carpenter to build, a painter to paint, and further, they provide for the continuation of competitive industry through using the traditional form of payment to workers which enables them to go to stores of their choice and buy the goods they individually desire. These are the very antithesis of measures taken in antidemocratic states where mass feeding, mass housing, mass control of all aspects of production reverse the process and make the state the supreme unit.

The third approach this administration has made toward the development of a more stable and prosperous economy has been in the form of regulatory and supervisory legislation:

(1) I refer to the wages and hours legislation in which a law was placed on the Federal statutes saying that a man shall not work for less than a wage stipulated through joint government and industrial action, and that he shall not work more than a fixed maximum number of hours.

(2) I refer to the National Labor Relations Board set-up to strengthen and support collective bargaining in which the Government places alongside of that legislation, long in existence, for the protection of corporations and property and banking, legislation for the protection of the workers.

(3) I refer to the securities exchange law established to insist upon honesty and integrity in the marketing of bonds and stocks.

(4) I refer to the monopoly investigation—the T. N. E. C.

(5) I refer to the T. V. A. for this is also essentially a regulatory structure in that it establishes, by its influence, practices, and conditions, for kindred and similar industries under private control.

These measures and similar measures have been the center of heated controversy and they have produced a Nation-wide clash of ideas. What they are really designed to do is strengthen the arms of those people in those industries who are trying to work along the traditional and promised American way of life. They represent the necessity of the average man for protection against the overpowering industrial and financial oligarchy which has come into existence on the back of the technological leviathan, born in recent years. They represent means to save the competitive elements in industry, to aid the worker in his efforts to secure a reasonable share of the products of his labor. They represent protection for the investor to secure a reasonable return at not too great a risk of losing all his capital. No reasonable person can deny the necessity for these and similar measures.

Every informed person knows that increasingly a few giant corporations in the hands of fewer and fewer individuals control more and more of the means of production in America. Every informed person in America knows that in a large segment of American industry, competition has all but disappeared, and that what you have is industries acting as if there were competition. Every informed person knows that the individual acting as an individual worker, pitting his strength against these giant corporations as a worker is helpless and that only through organization and collective bargaining has he got any chance at all to secure a reasonable return for his labor. These too, along with the money question, along with the intervention of government for the aid of business, and the increase of the national income, will constitute a future and continuing part of those measures designed to increase employment and produce enduring prosperity.

But this cannot be all. These are things which the Government must do. But they are only part of the total picture. Granting the desirability and necessity of everything that has been said, which of course as you and I know, large portions of the population do not do, I want to say that I recognize that these do not constitute the complete answer. As a matter of fact, they do not properly constitute a most important part of the answer, for after all is said and done, the problem of unemployment is the problem of industry, and first in line with this principle it should be put down as a primary postulate that the American people and youth included, look to private industry for its future. It accepts Government intervention, it agrees to and finds desirable the moves that have been made with respect to the controlled supervision, the protection and supervision of certain aspects of industry by the Government, but it looks to private industry as the regular way of making a living. It is the economic industrial pattern. It is accepted with the same faith and loyalty and devotion that goes to the Government, the church, baseball, or what have you.

It is a part of American life. It is the way we want to make our living. This being true, what this means is that by some means we must make it possible for private industry to include the whole people in its economy. At the moment it is not being done. Millions of workers find the doors of industry closed to them. Millions of trained and competent workers find the places where they formerly made their living closed to them—closed for no good reason that they can understand. Millions of young people coming of age are denied the opportunity of work. Many of them going for years without ever having had a single job. We are told that we are in a contracting economy. We are told that production quickly outruns consumption. Undoubtedly this is all true, but I for one hold that we must everlastingly put the problem of unemployment back in the laps of industry. We must put the problems of unemployed youth on the desk of industry. We must say to industry, here are millions of unemployed people, many of them trained adults, many are competent youths, young and eager. What are you going to do about it? The conservatives have been right in saying that Government could not keep on going into debt forever in giving work to the unemployed—partly right, at least—but they have been wrong in not saying that industry had to find ways to give work to all of the people who wanted to work; they are right in holding that no government can forever spend more money than it takes in, but they are not logical or sound when they fail to accept the full meaning of their attitude and do nothing to force industry to meet its responsibility. A nation lives by large major patterns. In America we have the democratic form of government as our pattern in government, and this form of government should live out and up to the meaning of that form of government. We have in this country freedom of religious worship that are patterns for worship, and we should see to it that that pattern works, and allow nothing to interfere with it.

We have industrial democracy—that is the pattern that we have decided on as the way of making our living. Now that pattern is obligated to provide all men with the necessary opportunities to make a living. It must do so if it is to continue to be the pattern. We cannot, we will not, go on adhering to an industrial pattern which fails one out of every four people in the country. There are too many people left out. If it is to continue to be the way of making a living, then it must provide all men, or nearly all men, who are willing to work, a chance to earn a living and no amount of excusing, no amount of alibi is going to be a satisfactory answer to the millions denied opportunity in the going economy.

There is a curious philosophy going around in America these days, one that is difficult to understand, having been what we have for the last 200 years—having held steadfastly to the faith that there was a good life for everybody here, that there was plenty to go around so that all might share abundantly. Having believed all these years that if one would work hard, that the day would come when the fruits of that labor would be a home to live in, clothes to wear, food to eat, and a bit of pleasure, some travel, education for one's children, but long after these 200 years we hear this sort of philosophy preached—that we have got to tighten our belt, that we have got to get over the idea of such things as wages of $2 an hour for brick masons, that we have got to cut out all of this extravagance of the Government paying men $50 a month as a stop-gap during the time industry fails them. This is a curious philosophy and for me it simply doesn't make sense. It doesn't fit with facts, for everywhere on all fronts we have learned how to produce with almost miraculous abundance. The farmer can grow so much that he makes himself poor by the very abundance of his success. We have so much corn we don't know what to do with it. We have so much wheat that our wealth becomes our poverty.

We have so much cotton that it makes us poor to pay the storage on it. Whatever may be wrong with the farmer, it is not his lack of power to produce abundantly, and yet we are told that we must tighten our belts. We are told that we are living extravagantly on a national average income of $125 a month, and the same is true of production of material and commodities. We can produce so many chairs that there are no people to sit in them, so many cups, so many saucers, tablecloths, so many sheets, so much glass. We know how now to produce everything in such abundant quantity that no man, no family, need ever again want for anything. The hard central truth is that we have found out how to produce the abundant life, but we don't know how to distribute it. We need never again be poor. No child need ever again be hungry. No person, boy, girl, man, or woman need ever again be cold for lack of clothing. There was a time when our ignorance of the means of production did make it impossible for everyone to have enough clothing, to have food—it did not exist. That time has gone forever.

Now, that all being true, the last valid reason for destitution, for want, for poverty has been done away with and it becomes merely a question of the organization—organization of our forces that we have created—organization of the means of distribution of income so that all people shall have a purchasing power sufficient to have the things they need to have—the things made possible by our greater knowledge of farming, of soil, of steel, of land, of textiles, of communications, of travel, of pleasures. Now, we want this distribution of income and we want this participation of the good things now made possible by our industrial geniuses, but we want them within the framework of our democratic way of living.

We want them under the traditional way of life which we call the American way of life. We want them under our present form of government, with its elected Congress, an elected President. We want them under a free and open system of industry where merit and worth are the means of advancement. We want them under arrangements in which the American home is the unit of our society, where the individual and his personality are the inviolate sovereigns of our political and economic social order.

These things, I believe, are possible. It will take time—it will take patience. What is most essential is that we shall preserve our basic rights and our traditional liberties and allow no infringement of these. And we must develop a courage to match our power and we must study to inform ourselves of the effects of this power on our political and economic and social situations. We must study to enlighten, to inform, to educate ourselves of these basic parts of our economy—money, ownership, organization of industry, collective bargaining, Government protection and supervision, Government intervention for the aid of business, the national income, its tendency to contract and expand, and, above all, the individual in his collective and corporate relationships—these constitute the keys to the future.

I could have spoken here tonight on some of the special problems of youth and of the National Youth Administration, but this whole social and economic problem which I have discussed is really the basic problem of young people. The National Youth Administration—indeed, the Federal Government itself—could not solve this youth problem. It is up to the people of the whole country. Young people are more vitally concerned in having the problem solved, and in the democratic way, than the rest of us. They have longer to live. But it is a job for everybody, and I hope that young people will consider the whole question in its broadest implication as affecting directly the solution of the social and economic problems confronting each of them as individuals.

A Reply to an Article by Westbrook Pegler in the Washington Post and Other Newspapers

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HAMILTON FISH

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, October 9, 1939

LETTER FROM HON. HAMILTON FISH, OF NEW YORK, TO WESTBROOK PEGLER IN REPLY TO AN ARTICLE PUBLISHED BY HIM IN THE WASHINGTON POST AND OTHER NEWSPAPERS

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted me to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following letter in reply to an article by Westbrook Pegler in the Washington Post and other newspapers:

SEPTEMBER 28, 1939.

Mr. WESTBROOK PEGLER,

The Washington Post, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. PEGLER: I was amazed and astonished to read your article published under date of September 27 in the Washington Post and other newspapers, taking me to task for "carelessness regarding the source and truth of information." I am afraid, after 2 years, your memory is not as infallible as you would indicate.

I remember a pleasant visit from you, with no outbursts by you as you indicated, and I also remember that you were gathering information to be used against the Roosevelts in your columns.

It is true that I showed you several letters that had just come to me from constituents and others alleging that Mrs. James Roosevelt, for whom I have a high regard, received $35,000 from the Federal Government for the repair and maintenance of her home at Hyde Park while President Roosevelt used it as a summer White House. If your memory had been a little better, you would have recalled that I said at that time that I did not believe these charges, but would investigate and ascertain the facts.

The same applies to your statement that the President's father in his will provided that his son should have no hand in the management of his estate. I have repeatedly replied to inquiries that I knew nothing about it and did not believe it.

The only basis of truth in your column is that I showed you some letters that were on my desk, that had reached me that day, requesting me to look into these charges. I asked the Ways and Means Committee for this information.

If my memory serves me correctly, after 2 years' time, the only compensation the Roosevelt family received for the House at Hyde Park during the President's occupancy was for actual cost of construction and changes made to accommodate his secretaries and staff. I do not remember the amount.

I pride myself on the fact that I do not make statements carelessly, and check every detail carefully before accepting them as facts, as I know that anything that I might say that cannot be substantiated would weaken the balance of my argument.

It seems to me that some of the columnists are much more careless with facts than men in public life, who know that the slightest deviation from the facts defeats the cause which they are upholding.

With kind regards, I am,

Sincerely yours,

HAMILTON FISH.

Address Before American Jewish Congress

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN D. DINGELL

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, October 9, 1939

ADDRESS BY HON. JOHN D. DINGELL, OF MICHIGAN

Mr. DINGELL. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD, I include a speech delivered by me on Monday, October 2, at the American Jewish Congress in the city of New York, as follows:

Mr. Chairman, members of the American Jewish Congress, and friends, I come before you today as a friend who understands your trials and your great sorrows and as one who is sympathetic and anxious to find a solution for them. In extending the invitation your illustrious and scholarly president, Dr. Wise, conferred upon me a singular honor and I want to express my thanks and appreciation to the Congress for this opportunity to discuss the tragic events which concern all humanity and which have burdened the hearts of all liberty lovers throughout the world.

In presenting my credentials to this distinguished audience I want to say that I am proud of the fact that I am free from bigotry, intolerance, and the hydra-headed hatreds which divide and destroy mankind. Whatever I may ever accomplish or build as a monument in my service in Congress I hope the greatest, in fact the only one, might be the reputation for waging a consistent and relentless war against bigotry, intolerance, and hatred whenever their presence is detected or even suspected.

I refer you to the membership of the New York delegation in Congress; particularly, to my distinguished and beloved colleague, SOL BLOOM, and to my confrere and very distinguished ranking member of the Judiciary Committee, EMANUEL CELLER, and to the energetic, aggressive, and indomitable SAMUEL DICKSTEIN, or to my scholarly humanitarian friend, Dr. SIROVICH. They will vouch for me—of that I am certain.

Because of its complexity and the cross-current of vicious and unsupported propaganda it is most difficult to discuss the many phases of the tragic events in Europe at the present time which burst without warning. Through the haze, however, there are visible certain and unmistakable evidences of planned destruction, pillage, and flagrant error which threatens civilization and the free government of nations.

In recent months the map of Europe was transformed to suit the ideas of a combination of madmen led by Hitler, who first destroyed the post-war democratic form of government in Germany and then proceeded to persecute all churches including the Catholic and Protestant communions; destroyed the trade-union movement; ruthlessly suppressed Free Masonry and in a fiendish merciless campaign of extermination vented his spleen upon the unfortunate and hapless citizens of the Jewish faith. Every vestige of democracy and freedom which the people of Germany enjoyed under the republic was obliterated. Compromise with opposition changed to blood purges, secret murder, and the establishment of concentration camps. The spying tentacles of the merciless and hated Gestapo were fastened upon the peoples of Germany, Austria, Czechoslovakia, and now, to accomplish complete destruction, upon prostrate Poland.

The Treaty of Versailles, so it is claimed by nazi-ism, was unjust and oppressive. Therefore, it became necessary for Germany to subjugate and destroy her neighbors. This hypocritic wail about the Versailles Treaty is the most brazen insult sponsored by nazi-ism ever to gain hearing by a civilized world. Can anyone express any sympathy for Hitlerized Germany over the terms of the Versailles Treaty when an examination is made of the treaty of Brest-Litovsk and Bucharest which imposed conditions upon vanquished Russia and unfortunate Rumania so severe and burdensome as to perpetuate the enslavement of their peoples? The German militarist aggressor ran amuck five times in the past 75 years, attacking and sacking Denmark, Austria, Belgium, France, and reborn Poland, in addition to the recent cold-blooded and premeditated rape of Czechoslovakia. Germany having lost the World War, the Nazis claim she should have had the privilege of writing her own terms of surrender and to exercise the rights of the conqueror. The Versailles Treaty was not the beginning of any wrong; it was the culminating climax of a crime perpetrated upon her own, as well as other people, by the war lords of Germany. Having conspired with Russia and ungrateful Austria, the militarists of Germany once before partitioned the ancient kingdom of Poland which, according to history, was the bulwark of Christendom and on several occasions the savior of western civilization.

Poland, once the refuge of the oppressed peoples, in its growth and progress became the envy of her neighbors then, as now, and therefore had to be destroyed. The western boundaries of Poland created by the Treaty of Versailles were far inside the ethnic and ancient domain of what was always Polish, not German terrain. The recreated Republic of Poland was but 40 percent as large in area as it once had been. Yet, in spite of the fact that her boundaries at one time extended to the west as far as the Oder River, the brazen and unscrupulous Nazi propagandists are trying to mislead the world, and America in particular, by stating that the western provinces of Poland and the so-called corridor are ancient German crown lands. Similar and baseless propaganda was spread in justification of the conquest of Czechoslovakia. The rankest insult to American intelligence and hospitality is to be found in the official expressions of the Chargé d'Affairs of the Nazi Embassy at Washington which were branded as brazen lies and effrontery by Colonel Hurban, the Minister of the Republic of Czechoslovakia.

An example of recent Nazi generosity is the complete destruction and enslavement of Poland. There is not even a treaty such as the Brest-Litovsk, to say nothing of a comparatively mild Versailles Treaty for Poland to sign. She has been sunk without trace in a sea of despondency and hopelessness, and a flood of blood spilled by the hundreds of thousands of young Polish patriots who fought to maintain their independence and culture against Nazi enslavement as prescribed in a typical Nazi German action. The Versailles Treaty has been shortsighted and unfair, grossly unfair to Poland whose boundaries were contracted to the point of strangulation and so arranged as to make her an easy prey for her treacherous and rapacious neighbor. Over a million eight hundred thousand Poles were damned up within the Reich on soil that was always Polish and never should have been German. Even Danzig, the feigned object of nazi-ism's agression was under Polish jurisdiction and control for 850 of the 1,000 years of its existence. Danzig always lived and could not exist without Polish commerce and trade. Another yipping blatherskite and faker who is responsible for the present war which threatens England's very existence today, rushes into print as a highly paid columnist, critic, and commentator, condemning Poland's leadership and lack of preparedness, demanding to know what was wrong, when as a matter of fact he who did not know, "where is Teschen and what is Teschen," should at least recognize his own handiwork and the strangle hold which he had given Germany over Poland through the establishment of the East Prussian littoral, a boundary within a boundary, and the bastardy of Danzig which were responsible for the plight of Britain's eastern ally.

Were it not for the far-sightedness and persistence of other statesmen who insisted that Poland must repossess in part her ancient coal, iron, and mineral territories, she would not have maintained herself as long as she did. In the second treaty of Versailles statesmen and not ignoramuses must write terms and establish boundaries. The bunglers of the Polish and Palestinian problems should not be permitted to inject themselves where intelligence and fairness should be the guide.

Much propaganda intended to mislead the people and the Congress of the United States and to influence the action of our lawmakers as regards the embargo is being disseminated throughout the United States. Let me here and now declare my position, free from any sentiment, though like the great majority of my fellow Americans, I, too, am naturally inclined toward the democracies, yet, I solemnly state that I am uncompromisingly and unequivocally opposed to America's entry into the war on either side. We must remain neutral, we must treat both sides without favoritism, reserving the right to sell our products of the mine, mill, and factory, as well as of the farm, to any and all nations, neutral or belligerent, for cash in cold-rolled American money to be carried away in their own bottoms and at their own risk. I refuse to be allied with communism and nazi-ism and to be a party to the murder of Dolfuss, the torture of Schusnigg, and the brigandage and destruction visited upon Austria, Czechoslovakia, and Poland, to say naught of offering assistance to commu-nazi-ism which seeks to enslave France and Britain, and which subsequently will reach out to destroy the United States.

Recent events in Poland with the ultimate distintegration and collapse of the armed forces of the Republic brought about expressions of wonderment and speculation as to the real and underlying causes for the ineffective resistance to the admittedly superior and mechanized Nazi forces. According to my best information, the sudden and complete collapse was brought about by Nazi German spies who infested Poland in numbers estimated at from seven hundred thousand to a million. These Nazi spies, supposedly loyal citizens of Poland, were as a matter of fact, with rare exception, each and every one of them, spies and saboteurs. When the undeclared war broke out these spies were obliged to follow out their orders by appropriately marking all objectives, cutting lines of communication, and destroying Polish railroads and bridges.

We in America who have been so extremely tolerant toward these un-American and subversive organizations had better recognize the menace and, without temporizing or in any sense compromising, undertake to destroy them before this grave menace shall turn upon America and bring about results which are only too tragically evident in Poland. However deficient Poland may have been in her war equipment or her system of transportation, this had nothing to do with her sudden and complete collapse. The work of the Nazi spy and the saboteur, the traitor within the boundaries of Poland was responsible for her destruction and resultant temporary enslavement.

This problem of Nazi and Communist propaganda is vital, pressing, and one which the Congress of the United States must solve permanently. In the meantime, however, the Department of Justice must very carefully analyze the situation and apply such remedial force as will safeguard the well-being of the Nation.

Knowing something of the knightly chivalry of nazi-ism, I can easily understand why the venerable scientist, President Ignace Moscicki, Marshal Smigly-Rydz, and Chancelor Beck, of Poland, were forced to flee to Rumania. Anyone ought to understand the fate that awaited these patriots. Had they followed the Schusnigg example, they would have been tortured and murdered as were the hapless rulers of Austria. I will not subscribe to any criticism of their actions, as I know only too well what happened to others.

The Catholic Church, of which I am a proud and regular communicant, and my basic American training, have taught me to despise communism and nazi-ism and all for which these stand—godlessness, free love, persecution, and regimentation; the combination of which brings about depravity of the mind, and shriveling of the heart, and the ultimate loss of the soul. Yet, in America today we find men and women of supposedly sound mind following the advice of fakers and Nazi and Communist propagandists—in nearly every instance the paid mouthpieces of their respective masters. The unholy wedlock which created communazi-ism should dispel any and all semblance of doubt regarding the duplicity and downright bestiality of this unholy alliance, for what is lacking in meanness in one is to be found in the other. This same communism which was created, financed, and implanted in Russia by a war-mad and desperate imperialistic German regime will for a certainty destroy the madness of naziism if in the meantime it does not submerge civilization.

The American people are being led to believe by the propagandists that the repeal of the embargo on arms, munitions, and airplanes means American involvement in the European war. The attitude and pronouncements of the President of the United States are a clear indication that the reverse is true. Recent pronouncements by the Pope and such stalwarts of the Catholic Church in America as Father Sheehy and Al Smith confirm my confidence in the President of the United States, whom I propose in this instance to follow.

A large element of misguided Christians, both Catholic and Protestant, has followed, blindly and faithfully, biased pro-Hitler radio champions. A reversal of sentiment, or, as we say, a turn-about-face, will surely follow when the entrenched Nazis and Communists, each in their respective fields of influence in subjugated Poland, begin the organized campaign of suppressing the activities and teachings of the churches of Poland, chiefly of the Roman Catholic Church. In its stead will come the pagan doctrine of the states' mastery over the church, the family, and people. The Society of the Propagation of the Faith will be superseded by the League of the Godless, teaching atheism, free love, and communism; religious communities and various Catholic orders will be dissolved and their properties seized. The fundamental and central ritual of the Holy Mass so essential to Catholic spiritual well-being will be gradually suppressed, and a scandalized and demoralized youth will be taught to laugh at the ancient ceremonial. The militant priesthood, with the primate of Poland at their head, will protest, yea, they will wage war, with the result that churchmen will be sent to concentration camps and even to the block.

The stoning of Cardinal Innitzer's palace followed the occupation of Austria by a fortnight, as I recall. Cardinal Hlond, of Poland, is returning from a pilgrimage to Rome. On his arrival at Warsaw the Nazis may give him a stoning reception such as Innitzer and Faulhaber are already familiar with.

Strange that the American Catholics who shouted long and loud about an internal war between Communists and Nazis in Spain, even to the point where they gave tacit support to the Nazis and Fascists, now assume an attitude of total indifference toward invaded Catholic Poland, that stalwart of the Church of Rome, the buffer against communism and oriental savagery which stood for centuries like a rock unshaken and unafraid. Today not a voice is raised in her behalf among the churchmen even as she lies prostrate and bleeding, crushed by the spiked heels of nazi-ism and communism, which in Spain were at least treading in opposite directions. Where are the voices which cried out in horror over Spain and Mexico; they are silent, inaudible. An exaggerated and sudden conscicusness of involvement based on pure sophistry militates against Poland when but a short time ago the same radio voices were raised to a screaming crescendo in behalf of an embargo and subsequently its maintenance in order to aid the same church in another country. That was in Spain; however, this is Poland. I cannot see the difference; and if there be any, it is in favor of the church in Poland, which is in far more danger than it was in Spain.

I shall not be found in the ranks of the false prophets, Roosevelt haters, and windbags yet to be deflated, who knew better than the President and the State Department that there would be no war. I will not subscribe to any plan which will permit the sale and export of metals, crude oil, and minerals used in war or foodstuffs and grain produced in Idaho while shutting off the sale and export of the factory-made products which can be turned out in the city of Detroit, the State of Michigan, and other parts of the country, which will give employment and prosperity to American workmen and businessmen. I favor the sale of our products in this instance, provided the customers will pay cash, come and get their orders, and carry them away in their own vessels at their own risk.

As far as I can foresee, we in America are certain to antagonize one side or the other, depending on what the action of Congress might be. If the embargo is lifted and we choose to exercise our traditional American right of carrying on our commerce and trade with any and all nations, we will offend whom? Soviet Russia and Nazi Germany—a combination which does no business to speak of with America, and which has destroyed our business with Austria, Czechoslovakia, and now for a certainty wiped out our trade with another cash customer—Poland. If we fail to repeal our self-imposed embargo, as recommended by President Roosevelt, we alienate the good will of France, England, and their powerful, high-living-standard dominions, populous territories and colonies, among which we must list Canada as the first, most consistent, and best customer of the United States.

Insofar as I am concerned, if my vote in Congress is to cause Hitler and Stalin to go stark mad, I should prefer that to bringing about the final gasp of Britain, France, and democracy.

The inhuman, barbaric war of the Nazis has projected and accentuated the problem of added hundreds of thousands of refugees in war-torn Poland. Acute as was this same problem affecting the unfortunates of Germany, I can only say now that it has grown in tragic extremity as much as it has increased in numbers.

We in America must unite, must join hands, figuratively and actually, to give such relief as might be possible. We must do this without the loss of a single precious moment. There are countless thousands in blood-drenched, bomb-scarred and charred Poland who thus far survived "nazi-ism's protection" who are doomed to perish of starvation, disease, or exposure to the cold winter blasts unless we in America extend our hands and give substantial aid.

I know you will agree with me when I say that this is no time to make distinctions of any kind as regards relief. It is my philosophy, and I know it to be yours, that the sole and only consideration is humanity, crushed, bleeding, starving, in tragic need of immediate assistance.

And while we dwell upon the question of refugees, a subject that has always been near and dear to my heart, let me call your attention to the fact that the Twenty-fifth Interparliamentary Conference at Oslo, which I attended as a delegate, has taken cognizance of the refugee problem which existed in Germany before the outbreak of the present war. I was privileged to discuss this problem with various members of the social and ethnic committees who sat jointly on Saturday, August 19, discussing the problem of refugees. A motion proposed by a delegate from Great Britain named Bellenger, to the effect that the interparliamentary conference urge upon all governments to take immediate and concerted action to settle the refugee problem by governmental action on a basis of equality between all classes of refugees, was acted upon favorably. It is my belief that the United States Government should take the initiative in this problem and accordingly should bring about the calling together in conference the representatives of the interested and affected governments in order to bring about the earliest possible and complete solution of this problem. I should be very happy to discuss further this idea with members of the American Jewish Congress, for I want to make known that it is my intention to introduce a resolution in Congress calling upon the President of the United States to call such a conference; and I believe it would be desirable to have some expressions of your seasoned and well-considered opinions before I undertake to draft the instrument.

I regret, my friends, that I was obliged to hurriedly sketch for delivery a rambling discourse upon a subject that has such a varied and many-sided perspective. I feel that I have scarcely rendered justice to this important subject. However, I am grateful for the opportunity to present my views and I want to thank Dr. Stephen S. Wise and the American Jewish Congress.

Repeal the Embargo

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN KEE

OF WEST VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, October 9, 1939

LETTER FROM HON. JOHN KEE, OF WEST VIRGINIA

Mr. KEE. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to me to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include a letter recently addressed by myself to Mr. K. B. Thomas, of Bluefield, W. Va., in reference to the Neutrality Act now pending before the Congress.

After receiving my letter, Mr. Thomas called me by telephone and requested permission, which was granted, to read it before a meeting of the Rotary Club in our home city. As the letter briefly expresses my views touching the matter of the proposed repeal of the embargo clause in the present so-called neutrality law, it will serve to make that position clear to other inquirers. The communication is as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., September 30, 1939.

Mr. K. B. THOMAS,
Secretary-Treasurer, Community Savings & Loan Co.,
Bluefield, W. Va.

MY DEAR MR. THOMAS: I was very happy to receive your recent letter and to note your views upon the all-important legislation that is now being considered by the Congress.

That America should stay out of the war is a settled proposition. No one disputes this fact. All of us want to remain free from entanglement or involvement in the conflict. The only vital issue is the problem of what we ought to do or not to do in order to keep out.

It is my most earnest conviction that our present so-called neutrality law is entirely unneutral. By this law we are violating every national precedent, abrogating a principle of international law, penalizing innocent nations, handcuffing our own people and industries, and lending our aid to the dictators and aggressors. We are denying to the defenseless nations of the world the means of defense against complete destruction.

I am firmly convinced that the embargo clause should be repealed and the cash-and-carry principle established. The carriage, however, of ammunition, munitions of war, and other commodities to belligerent nations upon American ships should be barred. We can then say to these nations that we will loan them no money; we will give them no credit; we will furnish them no soldiers; but, if they will come with the cash, we will sell them our commodities, to be carried away by them on their own ships and at their own risk.

Can anybody point out just how this policy could get us into war? It cannot possibly work that way. During the last war Norway, Sweden, Denmark, and the Netherlands remained neutral—none became involved. And yet none of these states had any embargo on sales and shipments. All of them had a cash-and-carry system similar to that we propose. They even went so far as to let their own ships carry the commodities. They stayed out, and we can stay out.

That our present policy—that is, our embargo upon the shipment of arms and ammunition—is aiding the aggressor nations cannot be disputed. That its repeal will aid the nations which are on the defensive may be true. But which is the more unneutral, to knowingly leave upon our statutes a provision that aids the aggressors, or to do a lawful thing that may help the weak nations in their fight against annihilation?

This will likely be a long war. During its progress the world must be fed and clothed and otherwise supplied. There is no reason on earth why we should bar the peoples of the earth from coming to our doors, buying what they need, and taking it away. It is far better that we thus let our farms, our mills, our mines, and our factories give our people employment than it would be to stop all of our activities and let our unemployed possibly seek to go to war rather than to remain idle.

With my very kindest wishes, I am,

Sincerely yours,

JOHN KEE, M. C.,
Fifth West Virginia District.

Biennial Convention of the National Federation of Post Office Clerks at Houston, Tex., September 6

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ALBERT THOMAS
OF TEXAS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, October 9, 1939

ADDRESS BY HON. JENNINGS RANDOLPH, OF WEST VIRGINIA

Mr. THOMAS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address delivered by Hon. JENNINGS RANDOLPH, of West Virginia, at the biennial convention of the National Federation of Post Office Clerks, held at Houston, Tex., on September 6, 1939:

Mr. White, Mr. House, Third Assistant Postmaster General Black, Mr. Martin L. Sweeney, of Ohio, Deputy First Assistant Postmaster General Donaldson, Mr. Lambert, Clerk of the House Committee on Post Office and Post Roads, the officers and members of the National Federation of Post Office Clerks, and ladies and gentlemen, that is a long introduction, but I am sure I didn't miss anyone that I thought might be called in the list of speakers later. I am so sorry that of necessity I will have to leave this convention banquet early this evening. I appreciate the very gracious spirit of cooperation of those who are in charge of tonight's proceedings. They have given me the opportunity to speak first so that I may get away as soon as possible, to board a plane northward.

May I say at the outset that I feel that this organization can feel justly proud of your "big four" at the National Capital. [Applause.] I mean Mr. Otte, Mr. Torka, Mr. Horner, and Mr. George [applause]—and as a Member of the House Civil Service Committee, I should like to speak what is in my heart of hearts, when I say that it is so refreshing for a Member of Congress to deal with representatives of an organization like yours in Washington, men who don't want to drive you into something, but who desire to counsel with you on legislation, and that is what I appreciate, Mr. George, of you and your colleagues. [Applause.]

MERIT SYSTEM GAINS

Of course, there are real gains that are being made from the standpoint of extension of the merit system in the governmental agencies of the United States, gains which should have been made perhaps years ago, but gains nevertheless that are now being carried forward.

Perhaps many of you will not agree with me, but I feel that there should be a court of appeals and a place where your grievances [applause] might be listened to carefully by those with independent judgment, and I have introduced such legislation—just one of many measures dealing with this subject in a way that will bring it to solution.

I am happy to tell you that at this last session of the Seventy-sixth Congress it was found possible to extend the benefits to substitute postal workers in that 15 days' annual vacation was given and 10 days' sick leave, and that is right and proper, and I do feel that the substitutes have this need and I know that they appreciate such help.

I could go into the many phases of merit-system legislation, but, of course, those who are here from the Post Office Department and your own officers have during the earlier session today discussed these matters in detail; other speakers will do likewise. So, if I may have the opportunity for the next few minutes, I would like to talk frankly about some problems that I believe face not only those individuals who are members of the Postal Service of the United States but face all individuals, be they workers in public or in private life. Before I speak just a few moments on one or two subjects of that type, I should like to say this: I believe that in the Government of the United States, in the various agencies, that there is no more loyal or efficient group of workers than are the postal clerks of this Republic. [Applause.] I am not trying, when I make that statement, to say something that is pleasant to your ears, but I do believe—I say this as a member of the House Labor Committee—that I know that the postal clerks of the United States Government will never engage in a sit-down strike against the Government of the United States. [Applause.] I know that of this one branch. As Federal employees, you will recognize not only your opportunity for service in the community where you labor but you understand full well the responsibilities that are upon each and every one of you, and you have and will, I know, continue to discharge those duties in the highest possible American way. [Applause.]

DEMOCRACY VERSUS DICTATORSHIP

Now, let us see for just a moment if we may think just about a problem or two that are perhaps closest to your hearts. It was Sam Houston who was talking to Andy Jackson—Old Hickory, they called the President. Sam Houston was a rather—should I say pioneering, virile type of man, so history tells us, and Sam was saying to Andy that there were a lot of folks who think that in this country we should have more power vested in the President. Then he pointed out that across the waters there were strong men—we call them dictators today—who were in charge of affairs over there and, he said, perhaps we needed a little more of the iron hand. Andy Jackson is supposed to have replied: "Now Sam, after all, there are a lot of browbeaten people in Europe who would be happy to exchange places with those who think that in this country we are not governed properly." Then he went on to say that perhaps it is best that the laws are made by a bunch of ornery Congressmen and administered and carried forward by just the sort of middle-of-the-road President like him. He said, "America is the only land in which you can cuss the President and all the President can do is to cuss back or go fishing." [Laughter.]

That is what Sam Houston and Andy Jackson were talking about 100 years ago, and the people of the world are talking about that same subject today. Contrasting the Old World dictatorship with the New World democracy, men and women throughout the Republic are attempting these days to keep their feet on the ground and at the same time look into the realities of the situation which faces us.

Now, as for myself—and I know that Congressman SWEENEY will agree with me on this one item—I feel that the United States of America must remain neutral in the conflict which is now raging 3,000 miles across the sea. [Great applause.]

This land of yours and mine is a peace-promoting country, and I believe that, by and large, the men and women of this Nation have certain definite feelings about democracy in its fight against dictatorship, and individually and collectively they express that. I want to reiterate that the Government of the United States, a great democratic Government, with republican institutions which have been fostered here, which have made this Nation great—that this Government of yours and mine has a responsibility to work out its problems here at home and not attempt to be an international police force for the rest of the world. [Great applause.]

PLANES BRING DEATH

War is so much different today than it was even in the last world conflict. The devastation, the destruction, and the damage which will be wrought in this war is not comprehensible to all of us who think of the dire trouble which will beset those people directly engaged. It is but about 2 hours and 45 minutes in a bomber from London to Berlin or vice versa, and only about 2 hours from Paris to Berlin or a return trip. And so in these days wars are not being fought in the front-line trenches between soldiers in uniform, but wars are being fought behind the lines as well, where the noncombatants are faced with a real destructive force of a foe, and women and children and older individuals in the country, whose churches, homes, and schools are in the industrial centers, these are the prey of a war of the present day. And so, when we sit here tonight as men and women who have come together in the land where tolerance prevails, let us not feel so unkindly about any group of individuals in any country participating in this war. I hold no brief, of course, for a single individual who is attempting an aggressive war, but I do say to you tonight that, somehow or other, I believe that if the German people had the right to speak individually at the ballot box, as we have the right, that they wouldn't have voted to enter into a war at this time. [Applause.]

In Washington, not so many days ago, I talked with a Japanese, and I asked him very honestly if he felt that if the people of Japan had the right to say, individually, whether they would be at war with China. He replied: "We would never be in China today if the people of Japan actually held the destiny of our country within their own hands." Tonight, as we meet here and go about our ways, unobstructed by the Government of the United States, with the freedom of press and the freedom of religious worship and expression, and the freedom of speech and a well-rounded working and developing democracy, we should be considerate of what certain people of the world are subjected to at the present time. But let's remember sometimes men and women are forced into conditions where they cannot turn about. And I do feel that in certain sections of Europe tonight, those who lead the people into war are selling their own country short. And somehow or other, perhaps within weeks, perhaps not for months, the people of those countries will revolt and perhaps that will bring about the conclusion of the war, even though the aggressor nation seems to be winning at the present hour.

And now, ladies and gentleman, as I conclude these brief remarks, I believe that in Russia there is dictatorship; in Germany there is dictatorship; in Spain there is dictatorship; in Italy there is dictatorship. And contrasted with these dictatorships we have the democracy of the United States. I really believe that if Hitler were to pass away tonight, there would be a break-up in Germany tomorrow, and in the other countries that I have just named. But, if in the United States of America a tragedy should befall us tonight, in that the President of the United States would pass away, the Vice President of this country would take his place. If he were not there to take the position, the Secretary of State would fill the position, and so on to the rest of the Cabinet members. Although there would be a heavy sadness and sense of loss among the American people, yet this plan of yours and mine, because it does work under a democracy and under republican institutions of government, would continue, and there would be no lag whatsoever in the forward looking progress of our Nation.

PEOPLE SHOULD SPEAK

Now, I have this to say; many of you may not agree with me, but tonight, as we view this world scene of action, see the curtain rise and fall on the various episodes and acts, I believe that the United States of America should not leave to the President of this Republic the right to declare a foreign war; shouldn't even leave it to the Congress of the United States to declare a foreign war. MARTIN SWEENEY, I hope you will agree with me about this—maybe you won't—I believe that the American people, by referendum, should speak their minds about participation in a foreign war to be fought on foreign soil. [Applause and cheers.] Yes, there are enemies from without; enemies that sometimes seem to press close to America. But, my friends, there are enemies within our land who are perhaps even more real tonight than the foes who might attack us from without. I don't want to be misunderstood. Naturalized Americans are just as important to this country as the native-born citizens. We are all descendants of those that came to these shores either at an early or late date. But, we find in the United States today, between 4,000,000 and 6,000,000 individuals who are aliens through and through, and I mean just that. They accept the privileges, they accept the profits, they accept the protection of America and at the same time they do not accept the responsibilities of citizenship in the land in which they live. [Applause.] They hold, by the hundreds of thousands, jobs in industry, commerce, and business, and every one of those jobs should go to American citizens. [Applause.] They bore from within the labor organizations of this country and spread discord and cause unnecessary strikes and with lying tongue and false prophecy they try to tear down institutions of home and church and school, which, if some may call them old-fashioned, are nevertheless the foundation stones upon which America has been built. I don't want to talk drastically just for the minute or two that I have remaining but, ladies and gentlemen, I am firmly convinced that we in the United States of America today must increasingly square our shoulders against the evils within. We must say to these men and women, "If you don't desire to become American citizens, then America should rid itself of you." [Applause.]

BUND IS UN-AMERICAN

Not so many months ago, in New York City on George Washington's birthday, there were some 18,000 men and women who gathered in Madison Square Garden under the auspices of the German-American Bund. They came ostensibly to pay tribute to the Father of His Country, yet what they came for was to denounce this country and all its institutions. I looked up the name of the organization—the meaning of the word "bund," and I found in Webster's dictionary that it meant "bound," and I said to myself—I hope I express your thoughts in this statement—"I would like to see each and everyone of those individuals bound for the country from whence they came." [Applause.]

Now, my friends, it was 150 years ago that George Washington said, "Citizens of a common country by birth or choice, that country has a right to consecrate your fullest affections." He told the truth, a truth which grows with every year. I have introduced in the Congress of the United States legislation which is being considered now by the House Committee on Immigration and Naturalization—not a drastic piece of legislation, but as I conceive it very proper piece of legislation, and it is simply this: We will pass a law which will be enforced, and it will say in effect to each and every individual who is not a citizen of the United States, but who lives in this country, "We give you 365 days in which to declare your intention of becoming a citizen of this country, and if at the end of that period you have not so signified, this land will take you into custody and deport you to the country from which you came." [Applause.] [Cheers.]

Mr. House and Mr. George, and all those who are officers of this organization, to everyone here, I am deeply appreciative of this opportunity which you have given me tonight to participate thus briefly in what I know is to be a very fine, pleasant, and profitable convention. It is my first visit in Houston, where my good colleague, ALBERT THOMAS lives, and I only wish that I might have the time to remain here and meet with you in your gatherings, listen to the splendid addresses that I know will follow tonight, tomorrow, and on the days of the week until you have closed your convention. I won't be taking my seat because I will have to leave.

Good luck; God bless you all. [Convention rose with great applause.]

Thomas S. McMillan

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WALTER CHANDLER

OF TENNESSEE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, October 9, 1939

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. Speaker, THOMAS S. MCMILLAN was one of the most useful and valuable Members of Congress, and, by his passing away, his colleagues in the House of Representatives have lost an able and conscientious associate, and the people of South Carolina and the United States a faithful and distinguished public servant.

Representative MCMILLAN brought to the House of Representatives in 1925 extensive experience as a teacher, lawyer, agriculturist, and legislator, and applied his training, his talents, his keen mind, and active body very effectively to his duties. A skillful parliamentarian and debater, it was exceedingly difficult, if not well-nigh impossible, to defeat him on the floor whenever he opposed an amendment to an appropriation bill. He was direct, frank, and unafraid in the discussion of legislation, his manner was persuasive, and his reasons cogent.

Personally, TOM MCMILLAN was genial, courteous, and affable. His death in the meridian of life deprives us of a friend, but it is always consoling to know that life does not consist primarily in the number of years that we live. Representative MCMILLAN crowded into half a century a record of abundant accomplishment and generous service to his fellow man.

There Should Be No Politics or Partisanship in Connection With Pending Neutrality Legislation—Cash-and-Carry Plan Is Practical

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JENNINGS RANDOLPH

OF WEST VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, October 9, 1939

CORRESPONDENCE CONCERNING PENDING NEUTRALITY LEGISLATION

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following correspondence between the managing editor of the United States News and myself, and also a letter I have written to a constituent on the subject of the pending neutrality legislation:

THE UNITED STATES NEWS,
Washington, D. C., September 11, 1939.

Hon. JENNINGS RANDOLPH,
United States Representative,
Elkins, W. Va.

DEAR MR. RANDOLPH: As you know, President Roosevelt has canceled a proposed radio address on Democratic Women's Day on the ground that national unity must come before political or partisan considerations.

At the same time the White House has indicated the imminence of a call for a special session of Congress at which it is apparently hoped to limit debate in order to drive through revision of the Neutrality Act which would remove the embargo on arms to belligerents.

Because the issue is of immediate importance and because it is one whose ramifications embrace all shades of political philosophy, the United States News has addressed to national political leaders and statesmen the following question:

"Are you, or are you not, of the opinion that under present conditions 'politics should be adjourned' while the administration attempts to discharge its grave responsibility to the people?"

Because we believe your views are authoritative, we ask you this question. We would appreciate, therefore, a letter of 300 to 500 words, by air mail or otherwise, by or before Friday, September 15, for publication in our issue of September 18. We will take pleasure in sending you a copy of the issue in which your answer appears.

Sincerely yours,

E. WORTH HIGGINS,
Managing Editor.

ELKINS, W. VA., September 14, 1939.

Mr. E. WORTH HIGGINS,
Managing Editor, The United States News,
Twenty-second and M Streets NW., Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. HIGGINS: Replying to your letter of September 11, and answering specifically your question, I am pleased to state as follows:

Under the present conditions I am strongly convinced that there should be an adjournment of so-called politics, and that the full strength of the national administration be directed toward its realistic responsibilities to the American people. It will be recalled, and I believe there is rather general agreement on this subject, that President Roosevelt met in 1933 a most grave national crisis. Through his leadership and courageous action he carried through those dark days splendidly, and there was a united citizenship behind him. The country responded, and there was a minimum of partisanship. We were a united people.

On the eve of a special session it is my considered opinion that the President once again has indicated that there must be unity prior to any political considerations. I sincerely believe that the President means to do everything possible to keep the United States out of this foreign war. In my individual capacity as a Member of the House of Representatives, it shall be my purpose to cooperate toward that desired end. I feel that belief is shared by the great majority of my colleagues, regardless of their party affiliations.

It has been gratifying to me to know that the President on September 20 will meet the congressional key men from both major political parties of the present administration. I feel that such conferences can be most valuable, and there must be in these coming crucial days the fullest cooperation between the major sections of our Congress. Individually, I am of the feeling that the cash-and-carry proposal is needed. I voted for such a provision during the first session of the Seventy-sixth Congress.

The American people desire fervently to stay out of the present European conflict. There can be no doubt of that. We must have a united front. Let us avoid war. Let us promote peace.

Very sincerely yours,

JENNINGS RANDOLPH.

SEPTEMBER 28, 1939.

I have your good letter of September 26 and deeply appreciate your writing me as you have on this vital question of neutrality.

I believe we all have a single objective at this time, and that is to keep the United States out of war. In my individual capacity as a Member of the House of Representatives it shall be my purpose to cooperate in every way humanly possible toward that desired end. I feel this is also the purpose of the great majority of my colleagues, regardless of their party affiliations.

It is only natural that public opinion should differ as to the best means to accomplish this, and we are all able to hear and read free and unbiased discussion on the question of peace and neutrality. It is my purpose as your Representative to see that we have true neutrality, and I am of the honest and sincere belief that the cash-and-carry proposal is the logical way to accomplish this. I voted for such a provision during the first session of the Seventy-sixth Congress, prior to the present crisis. I sincerely believe that the present arms-embargo provision is neither a guarantee of peace nor a means of enforcing true neutrality, since it may easily operate in such a way as to be entirely nonneutral in its effect.

The American people desire fervently to stay out of the present conflict and I consider it my solemn duty to see that the best possible legislative action is taken in an effort to prevent this country from becoming involved. I know that the people, the Congress, and the President are united in this earnest endeavor.

Most sincerely,

JENNINGS RANDOLPH.

Neutrality

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM J. MILLER

OF CONNECTICUT

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, October 9, 1939

RADIO ADDRESS BY WILLIAM J. MILLER, OF CONNECTICUT

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address delivered by me yesterday over the radio:

A week before the convening of the present special session of Congress I had the pleasure of talking to you over these facilities on the subject of neutrality and the proposed repeal of the existing arms embargo.

Since that evening the special session has been convened. A joint session of the Senate and House of Representatives heard President Roosevelt deliver an important message. This joint session was noticeably different from the joint session that listened to the President last January. It was a subdued gathering. The President's voice sounded serious, and one could have heard a pin drop in that huge House Chamber as the President read his message. The Members of the Senate and House listened attentively, realizing that the decision they would soon be called upon to make might well decide the question of peace or war.

The President made two important recommendations: (1) That Congress repeal the existing embargo on arms, ammunition, and implements of war, and, as he expressed it, go back to international law; (2) that our neutrality law be amended so as to prevent American ships and nationals from entering a war zone. As I listened to the reading of these two recommendations I was startled by the inconsistency of suggesting repeal of the arms embargo and a return to international law, while in the next breath it was suggested that we waive our unquestioned rights under international law and keep our ships and citizens out of war zones. While it may be inconsistent, I agree, however, that in an effort to prevent our becoming involved in a foreign war we should waive our rights and keep out of combat areas.

The President assured the country that it was his intention to do all in his power to prevent our entering into the war now raging in Europe. He asked for suspension of partisanship. It is apparent now that partisanship will not enter into this neutrality debate. Party lines are split wide open as they should be. Suspending partisanship does not mean, however, that debate will or should be limited. Now is the time for full, free, and frank discussion of all phases of this difficult problem. I have already given you my word, and I repeat it today, I will not be influenced by partisanship nor will I be influenced by the effect of my position or vote may have on my chances of reelection next year, and most certainly I will not be influenced by any possible dollar profits that may come to anyone as a result of any action taken by Congress.

At the outset you may be interested in a brief explanation of the parliamentary situation that exists in Congress on this important subject. You will recall that last June the House of Representatives finally passed the so-called Bloom neutrality bill. As passed by the House this bill continued the arms-embargo provision but did not include any restriction on American ships nor American citizens going into a war zone or combat area. I will explain why that provision was left out in a few minutes. The approved Bloom bill was then sent over to the Senate where the Senate Foreign Relations Committee voted not to report the bill out to the Senate at that time. Following the opening of the present special session, the Senate Foreign Relations Committee decided to use this bill as the vehicle to enact into law the President's recommendations. They did, however, strike out all of the provisions of the Bloom bill except its title and started all over to write a new bill. Because of that situation the new neutrality measure is now before the Senate. Following action by the Senate, the bill will probably be returned to the House where, in all probability, it will then be referred to a conference committee to iron out the differences between the bills as they passed the House and Senate. If that procedure is followed, the matter may come before the House on the question of accepting or rejecting the conference report and under the rules of the House debate would be limited to but 1 hour—30 minutes for each side. In that way the House would be gagged. Leaders in the House are now studying the rules to see if some way cannot be found whereby the whole question of neutrality and repeal of the arms embargo cannot be debated at least for a reasonable time by a motion to instruct the House conferees to insist on certain provisions. I am hopeful that adequate debate will not be prevented and that we can get a record vote in the House as they will soon have in the Senate. I will oppose any effort to gag the House.

In my last broadcast I summarized the provisions of the existing neutrality law section by section. It might be interesting for my listeners to have the resolution now being debated in the Senate summarized at this point. The proposed law written by the Senate Foreign Relations Committee is known as House Joint Resolution 306. Section 1, paragraph A, provides that whenever the President, or the Congress, by concurrent resolution, shall find that there exists a state of war between foreign states and that it is necessary to promote the security or preserve the peace of the United States, or to protect the lives of citizens of the United States, the President shall issue a proclamation naming the states involved and he shall later add other states if they become involved. Paragraph B provides simply that when the war that caused the issuing of the proclamation ends, the President shall so proclaim the fact. Section 2 provides that after the President shall have proclaimed a state of war to exist as provided in section 1, it shall be unlawful for any American vessel to carry any passengers or any articles or materials to any state named in the proclamation. Paragraph B provides a penalty of $50,000 fine or 5 years in prison, or both. Paragraph C makes it illegal to export anything to a belligerent until title has been transferred to the belligerent.

Another paragraph provides that it shall be legal for American vessels to transport anything at all on or over lakes, rivers, and inland waters bordering on the United States, or to transport by aircraft on or over lands bordering on the United States. This section simply means that anything at all—arms, munitions, wheat, and whatnot—could be shipped into Canada via the Great Lakes or even on or over the Rio Grande into Mexico.

Section 3 relates to combat areas and provides that after the issuing of a proclamation under section 1 the President shall by proclamation define combat areas, and thereafter it shall be unlawful for any American vessel or any American citizen to proceed into or through such combat areas. A penalty of $50,000 fine or 5 years in prison, or both, shall be imposed on any shipowner, and $10,000 fine, or 2 years, or both, shall be imposed on any citizen who violates this provision. Section 4 excepts vessels chartered by the American Red Cross. Section 5 makes it unlawful for an American citizen to travel on a belligerent ship. Section 6 prohibits the arming of American vessels. Section 7 makes it unlawful to purchase or sell the bonds of a belligerent, except that the President can make an exception in the case of ordinary commercial credits and short-time obligations in aid of legal transactions. Any exceptions made by the President shall be reported to Congress every 6 months. Section 8 prohibits the raising of funds within the United States except under regulations issued by the President, where the funds are to be used for medical aid or for food and clothing to relieve human suffering. Section 9 provides that the act shall not apply in the case of American republics in war against non-American states. Section 10 prohibits any vessel leaving an American port to carry men, fuel, supplies, or dispatches to a belligerent warship. Section 11 makes it unlawful for a belligerent submarine or armed merchant vessel to enter a United States port. Section 12 continues the existing National Munitions Control Board with very broad powers to control the munitions industry. The balance of the resolution relates to regulations, definitions, and so forth. You will recall that many sections of the proposed new law are similar to the existing neutrality law.

The important changes are the repeal of the embargo on arms, ammunition, and implements of war; the setting up of a cash-and-carry, or, to be truthful, a limited credit-and-carry provision on all shipments to nations at war; and the preventing of American vessels or American citizens from entering a combat area to be defined by the President. There is nothing in the new proposal preventing neutrals from transshipping to belligerents. There is bound to be much debate on this latter restriction, for while it undoubtedly will go a long way toward preventing us from becoming involved in a war, it will be a difficult section to write in such a way that it will not work undue hardship on American shipowners. Under this section, for example, New England fishing vessels will be unable to even go to Newfoundland to dry their codfish while Great Lakes vessels will be permitted to take anything and everything into Canada. So much for the provisions of the new bill.

During the past 10 days several Member of the Senate, in addition to speaking in the Senate, have broadcast on the subject of neutrality. I have listened to many of these broadcasts and it seems to me that an effort is being made by those who favor repealing the arms embargo to accuse those who would continue that embargo with being opposed to any change of the neutrality law. Such is not the case as I will show later. Anyone familiar with the situation that prevailed in Congress during the last regular session will agree that the cash-and-carry provision relating to commodities not covered in the arms-embargo section could have been reenacted with little or no opposition. The cash-and-carry provision expired, under the terms of the act in May 1939, and the administration made no effort to reenact that section. It is interesting to refer to the debate on the floor of the House, when the so-called Bloom bill was being considered. I would like to quote to you from page 7990 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of June 27, 1939, which covers the remarks made by Hon. LUTHER A. JOHNSON, ranking Democratic member of the House Foreign Affairs Committee. I quote: "Mr. Speaker, for the information of the House, I am authorized to announce, in order to eliminate certain features of the bill which are objectionable to some Members of the House, the acting chairman of the committee [Mr. BLOOM], after consulting with a majority of the Democratic members of the committee, and with their concurrence and support will offer amendments to change the bill as reported, in the following particulars: (1) In section 2 of the bill strike out the provision making it unlawful for citizens of the United States to travel on vessels of belligerent nations and substitute in lieu thereof 'that no citizen of the United States shall travel upon vessels of belligerent nations except at his own risk'; (2) strike out all of section 3 relating to areas of combat operations." Section 3, which was referred to by Mr. JOHNSON, would have made it unlawful for citizens of the United States or vessels flying the flag of the United States to proceed through any areas defined from time to time by the President to be areas of combat operations and so specified in his proclamation.

This quotation certainly makes it clear that the responsibility for taking that provision out of the Bloom bill rests definitely with the administration. When it came to the final vote on the Bloom bill I voted, first, to recommit the bill to the Foreign Affairs Committee, but when that motion failed I voted against adoption of the bill. I voted against the Bloom bill in spite of the fact that it contained an arms-embargo provision, partly because it did not prohibit American vessels and American citizens from entering the war zone. This certainly refutes the accusation of my friend Reader, that those who voted against the Bloom bill favored allowing American citizens and American vessels to enter war zones. Previous addresses have made my stand clear on this point.

The country, and I think the Congress, approves of most of the recommendations made by the President. If it were not for the controversy over the repeal of the arms embargo, I am sure the balance of the President's recommendations could be enacted into law almost over night. We are willing to keep our ships and our citizens out of the war zones but it is going to be difficult to adequately define war zones or combat areas in a way that will not work unnecessary hardship on our normal commerce. There will be very little opposition to adopting a cash-and-carry provision as to commodities not covered by the arms, ammunition, and implements of war embargo section. There will be opposition, however, to the extending of even 90 days' credit on these commodities. During my last broadcast I expressed a fear that the terms of cash and carry could not and would not be lived up to very long. I said at that time that it would not be very long after the adoption of cash and carry until we would have a request for limited credit and soon after that for unlimited credit. We have already reached the limited credit request, even before adoption of cash and carry. We are asked to approve "limited credit and carry."

Last Tuesday evening Senator NORRIS, who favors repeal of the arms embargo, said during an address over the radio that it is so clear to him that the President's proposed Neutrality Act revisions improve the present law "that it is difficult for him to understand the attitude of those who are opposed to any change." Personally I do not know of a single Member of Congress who is opposed to any change, but I ask, in the name of all that is reasonable, why it is necessary to repeal the arms embargo in order to strengthen our Neutrality Act by further restricting our citizens by keeping them, along with American ships, out of war zones. I repeat, Why is it necessary to repeal the arms embargo and make of this country an arsenal for one combatant in order to enact new provisions that have been proposed to strengthen our neutrality? The question is not shall we repeal the embargo or keep the law as it is. We can keep the embargo and otherwise improve the present law.

During the opening debate in the Senate Senator BORAH asked just who was asking for the repeal of our arms embargo and where the demand was coming from. Was it from our farmers? Was it from labor? Was it from World War veterans? Was it from our clergy or those seated in our church pews? Was it from young men of war age, or was it from fathers and mothers of America? This question has not as yet been answered on the floor of the Senate.

It might be well for us to pause and reflect as to what the demands may be that require the repeal of the arms embargo at this time. The most frequently stated argument is the rather empty one that the embargo should be repealed because it has not "worked." This argument can, of course, be easily refuted in reference to the application of the embargo in the Spanish civil war or the Ethopian war, and the fact that its functioning did not threaten our neutrality in any way. There seems to be no other argument left, other than the one which holds that retaining the embargo will react to the benefit of Germany. This is undoubtedly a valid argument and, as such, must be weighed against the stronger argument for continuance, in that repeal would be an unneutral act. Almost without exception, those persons with whom I have discussed the subject and who favor repeal, have, at some point in the argument, made the statement that we must stop Hitler. Such motives, insofar as they color the argument and reasoning of these advocates of repeal, are not neutral and I repeat, neutrality is what we have told the world we would maintain.

It has been said that it would be impossible to prevent neutral countries such as Italy and Russia, from securing munitions here and shipping them into Germany. In an aside I might add that it now appears that the partnership of Italy and Germany has been dissolved. We had an opportunity to see how that worked out during the war in Spain. We found that certain munitions which had been shipped to a neutral found their way into Spain. I am told that it was not too difficult for our representatives abroad to trace such shipments. In fact, some such shipments were traced to Spain. Even under the existing law, it is my understanding that the section of the law relating to the munitions control board is broad enough to allow them to refuse a license to ship further munitions to a given neutral if the board had reason to believe that they were to be shipped to a belligerent or used in place of munitions that the neutral had shipped to a belligerent.

Before I go on with the discussion of the question of repealing our arms embargo, I would like to briefly refer to some of the mail I have received since the opening of the special session. Certain columnists have said that the letters being received by Members of the House and Senate are inspired by Moscow and Berlin. I deplore that statement. It seems to me that such a statement is an insult to those sincere men and women who are honestly disturbed at the possibility of our being drawn into another war. The first 10 days of this special session brought me 2,380 letters, telegrams, and postal cards, of which only 204 favored repealing the arms embargo. Undoubtedly many of these letters were inspired by radio appeals but, on the whole, I am convinced that the vast majority of them were written by citizens who were only making use of their right of petition and who desired only to make known their views as to whether the arms embargo should or should not be repealed. In the mail I have received are letters from some of our leading manufacturers in Connecticut; from executives in some of our largest insurance companies; from two of our largest brokers; from numerous business and professional men, and from priests and ministers. Many of these letters were far from being expressions of other people's ideas; they were carefully thought out, and presented very convincing arguments in support of the position they were taking. I think I am being truthful when I say that I have read every letter which has come into the office and I am convinced that, with few exceptions, they are from constituents whose sincerity or Americanism cannot be questioned. Certainly there is room for honest difference of opinion when we discuss such a far-reaching subject as revision of our neutrality legislation. I have tried to answer every communication but in some cases the address was insufficient so may I again urge those who write to me to make sure the full name and address is given.

In the remaining time available I will try to confine myself to a discussion of some of the pros and cons of the arms-embargo-repeal dispute, but before I go on, it might be well to repeat what I said a month ago—the existing neutrality law containing the embargo provision was enacted in 1935 and reenacted in 1937 by an almost unanimous vote of both the Senate and House, it was approved by the President and to a large extent by the press, and the people of the United States. It was enacted for but one purpose—not to prevent wars in Europe but to lessen the likelihood of our becoming involved in some future foreign war. Thus far, wherever applied, it has worked as intended. The adoption of the existing law served as notice to the world that henceforth it was to be our policy during a war period. It was notice that we would not supply arms, ammunition, or implements of war to any nations that in the future found themselves involved in a war. Its adoption was accepted as a step toward peace.

During a recent debate on the radio I have heard it said that we cannot alter our neutrality law now that war has broken out because it would be unneutral to change the law. That is not exactly a correct statement. I do not contend that there may not be changes made upon the part of neutrals during the progress of war but there cannot be changes which would effect, unequally, the belligerent nations or which do not respect the interest of the belligerent nations as they prevailed at the time the original law was established. To change a neutrality law or rule with the motive of affecting or aiding certain belligerents is a distinct violation of international law. Changes may be made in neutrality during war but only in the direction of tightening or safeguarding a country's neutrality and not in the direction of relaxing it. This fact is supported by some of the most outstanding authorities in the United States on international law.

A few weeks ago I inquired of our State Department as to what persons they considered outstanding authorities on this subject of international law and neutrality in the United States. I have communicated with some of these persons whose names were given to me and, without exception, they all agree that to repeal the arms embargo, under existing circumstances, would be unneutral and illegal. The opinions come from such authorities as Professors Philip C. Jessup and Charles Cheney Hyde, of Columbia University; Professors Samuel F. Bemis and Dr. A. Whitney Griswold, of Yale. I quote, in part, from a statement made by Professors Jessup and Hyde: "To be more precise, if the Congress, in order to strengthen the sinews of France and England, removes the present embargo so as to enable those powers to gain a distinct advantage over their enemy, the United States makes itself in fact the ally of those who secure its sustenance. But, more than that, such conduct is illegal as well as unneutral and may, if resorted to, place the Nation in a most embarrassing and even hypocritical position when it undertakes to assert its neutral rights, which Secretary Hull recently announced we had not abandoned." It certainly seems to me that it would be presumptuous on the part of a freshman Congressman to ignore the opinions of such men—men who, in the past have acted as counselors to our State Department and men whose Americanism, ability, and honesty cannot be questioned.

In talking this matter over with my colleagues I have come to the conclusion that there are three schools of thought on this subject of repealing the arms embargo: (1) There are those who honestly feel that the embargo should be repealed as a step toward peace; (2) there are those who feel that the embargo should be continued as an aid to continued peace; and (3) there are those who feel we should repeal the arms embargo and openly aid our former Allies, regardless of neutrality. The third group is frankly honest. With respect to the group interested in aid to Britain and France and abandonment of neutrality, it might be interesting to note here that in the past few days printed cards have been coming into the office with the message "Help the Allies now to win so our men will never be necessary. Cash and carry." This, I think all will agree, is not neutrality or any semblance of neutrality. I am sure that the overwhelming majority of our citizens are in favor of keeping out of war and, while our sympathies may lie with one side or the other and we may have strong feelings against those who brought about the existing war, certainly the Congress should ignore its personal feelings and legislate in such a way that we will not become involved in the present war.

During the present session I received a letter from one of my constituents who claimed that France and Britain were helpless victims of a cruel aggressor. Let's consider that situation for a moment. It is hard to visualize Britain and France as helpless victims. After all, Great Britain is a huge empire. In India alone they have a population of more than 350,000,000. Britain has huge natural resources in Canada and other parts of the Empire. France is also a far-flung empire, and I cannot believe that they are in dire need of any material help from the United States, even if we were in a position to aid them; certainly not for some time to come. Assuming for the moment that those who contend it is our duty to aid the Allies are correct, is it right to say this is also our fight but we will aid you only if you pay us in cash? I have said before to those who favor our intervention, that if that is the desire of the American people we should forget neutrality and openly and frankly say we are taking sides in the dispute; that we are going to aid our former Allies with munitions and airplanes; and that if they need loans, we will grant them loans. And, if manpower is needed, we stand ready to provide manpower. There may be some who would take that position at this time, but I am confident that they are in the minority. Several who advocate repeal of our neutrality legislation and a return to international law argue that the present law does not make sense inasmuch as wheat and oil may be as essential to a warring nation as munitions and airplanes. However, it is well to recall that international law has always made a difference between arms, ammunition, and implements of war and other nonmilitary commodities. The term "materials of war" is sufficiently broad so that the embargo could be extended to include any and all materials used by military or naval forces of countries at war. Those who advocate a return to international law are overlooking the fact that the question of international law and of what use could be made of it was thoroughly discussed at the time Congress framed the existing embargo statute. It was all considered and debated and the opinion was almost unanimous that while international law had its place in the whole scheme for peace, there were other things which individual nations ought to do and had to do in order to advance the cause of peace and especially there were things that should be done but could not be done under international law alone. During the Senate hearings on the embargo section of our law in 1937, our

State Department, speaking through its counsel, said to the committee: "I do not see how you can expect to keep out of war if you are going to place your reliance on international law."

The enactment of the law against the sale of arms and ammunition has ample precedent in the laws of other countries. The most distinguished authorities on international law have stated that the right to do so is clear. Such a celebrated authority as John Bassett Moore says: "There are already various countries which, in accordance with their laws, impose such a ban"—that is, a ban on the sale of arms and munitions. Professor Jessup, one of the most distinguished authorities on international law, to whom I referred a moment ago, said that there is nothing novel in a neutral's assuming the duty not imposed by international law of prohibiting its nationals from engaging in the contraband trade.

I have been able to find no citation under international law or no practice which denies the right of a nation to prohibit the sale of arms and munitions. Belgium and Switzerland placed an embargo on munitions during the Franco-Prussian War; during the Spanish war, the Netherlands placed an embargo on arms; during the Russo-Japanese War, Sweden did likewise. Then we followed the same practice during the Ethiopian war and in the recent Spanish war, this Government especially endorsed the enactment of this principle. I have been informed by our State Department that there are 10 other neutral nations who have an arms-embargo law or who restrict the sales of arms and ammunition by refusal to grant licenses for their export. I have been informed by the Swedish Legation that, contrary to many statements published in our newspapers, Sweden refused to export arms, ammunition, and war matériel to either side during the World War. The Norwegian Legation has also advised me that arms and ammunition are included in a general embargo provision in that country. Other countries which are operating under an embargo provision are the Netherlands, Switzerland, Denmark, Finland, Brazil, Haiti, Honduras, and El Salvador.

It is claimed by some that by placing an Arms Embargo Act we departed from the principle of international law and denied to those who desired to purchase arms a right which they had under international law. It would certainly be difficult to support the contention that the embargo on arms denies any nation any right they possessed under international law.

If time permitted, I could go on presenting reasons that cause me to oppose the repeal of the embargo on arms, ammunition, and implements of war. During the campaign I promised you I would work for a strengthening of our national defense, that I would suport legislation that would maintain this country as a neutral nation in any future foreign war.

Because I am honestly convinced that it would be an unneutral act to repeal our embargo law and that such repeal might well prove to be but a step toward war, I shall, when given the opportunity, vote against repeal of the embargo on arms, ammunition, and implements of war.

If we refrain from committing what many authorities contend would be an unneutral act, if we maintain an honest neutrality, what nation on the face of the earth will commit an overt act or bring about an incident that will cause us to go to war? What nations, if any, have indicated any hostility toward us? I pray that we may continue at peace and remain friendly with all nations for all time.

I Am Proud of My Membership in Committee To Keep America Out of War

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. PAUL W. SHAFER

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, October 9, 1939

Mr. SHAFER of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I am a member of the National Committee To Keep America Out of War and I am proud of it.

I became a member of this committee because I believe its objective to be a worthy and important one. Its founders, officers, and members are individuals of unquestionable patriotism, integrity, and responsibility.

I am certain that no one can justly criticize the methods pursued by the National Committee to Keep America Out of War to achieve its objective.

I do not assume, of course, that anyone expects or anticipates an apology from any Member for holding membership in this committee because I cannot for a moment conceive that any member of such a committee would feel called upon to apologize for or defend his connection and activities with an organization such as this, and composed of such individuals who make up this committee working for the objective to which this committee is devoted.

It would be difficult for any fair-minded person to find a valid reason why any good American citizen should attack the National Committee To Keep America Out of War or any of its officers or members.

Instead of its officers or members having to defend themselves for their connection with the National Committee To Keep America Out of War it would rather appear that anyone who attacks the committee or its activities should explain their real reasons therefore.

Who Starts the War Machine

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. J. THORKELSON

OF MONTANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, October 9, 1939

Mr. THORKELSON. Mr. Speaker, as I read statements on neutrality by private and public correspondents and writers on that subject, I become more impressed with the confusion that exists in the minds of those who write. The Neutrality Act is highly controversial because it is impractical. Neutrality, on the other hand, is not.

Those who, in 1935, constructed the neutrality legislation did not design an arbor for neutrality, but paved a highway to war. They drafted legislation to destroy foreign trade and to persecute business. They set up another board for the invisible government at the expense of the taxpayers. The only neutral part of the act is the word "neutrality." The rest of it is similar to other New Deal legislation, for it is cockeyed.

I shall now digress from this subject to discuss, paragraph by paragraph, a statement by the Secretary of State, which was released on September 14, but received by me on October 4, 1939:

CHANGE OF NEUTRALITY POLICY IN TIME OF WAR

(Statement by the Secretary of State)

The Secretary of State made the following statement at the press conference on September 14 regarding neutrality:

"The Government of the United States has not abandoned any of its rights as a neutral under international law. It has, however, for the time being prescribed, by domestic legislation, certain restrictions for its nationals which have the effect of requiring them to refrain from the exercise of privileges which but for such legislation they would have the right to exercise under international law, such as the right to travel on belligerent vessels, to make loans and extend credits to belligerent governments, et cetera. These restrictive measures do not and cannot constitute a modification of the principles of international law but rather they require nationals of the United States to forego, until the Congress shall decide otherwise, the exercise of certain rights under those principles. Furthermore, this Government gives the widest possible notice to American shipping regarding danger areas as the information is acquired by it. This Government also warns American nationals and American shipping against actual danger in any other respect as situations involving such danger are brought to its attention, whether those situations result from lawful or unlawful activities of the belligerents. It endeavors to exercise all due diligence in the protection of American lives and property and, of course, must expect American nationals likewise to exercise due diligence in keeping clear of danger—actual or potential."

It occurs to me that other nations do not care if we abandon international law, for it is our loss. What they object to is an attempt by us to enforce our neutrality legislation outside the 3-mile limit.

Domestic legislation is purely a local matter, and should not be confused with international law. However, when we attempt to enforce our own rules outside of the 3-mile limit, we challenge the right of every power in the world. We do exactly that in the Neutrality Act, and if an attempt is made to enforce the act, it means war, with such powers as object to our enforcement.

In the letters which I addressed to Senator PITTMAN and Representative BLOOM on May 27, 1939, I stated the situation as follows:

"The rights of our nationals under international law may properly be restricted by our own legislation along certain lines for the purpose of avoiding incidents which might involve us in a conflict.

In indicating certain restrictions upon the exercise of our rights as a neutral I do not wish to be considered as advocating the abandonment of these, or, indeed, of any, neutral rights; but there is reasonable ground for restricting at this time the exercise of these rights."

It is not our nationals that provoke incidents or cause for war. It is, instead, the administration itself. It is even ridiculous for the Secretary to intimate that anyone except the administration and agents of interested powers are responsible for provoking incidents that will lead us into war.

The principles of international law as regards neutrals and belligerents have been evolved through the centuries. While belligerents have frequently departed from these principles on one pretext or another, and have endeavored to justify their action on various grounds, the principles still subsist.

The Secretary is correct that "the principles of international law as regards neutrals and belligerents have been evolved through the centuries." The question may now be asked, Why did this administration depart from such principles in 1935, and why is the administration interested in enacting legislation at this time that is contrary to such principles? It is statements such as the Secretary of State released that bring about confusion and suspicion of Federal departments and bureaus.

This Government, adhering as it does to these principles, reserves all rights of the United States and its nationals under international law and will adopt such measures as may seem most practical and prudent when those rights are violated by any of the belligerents.

In this paragraph, the Secretary of State appears to be threatening a mythical enemy. What nation has he in mind? If he knows, why not say so? If the State Department is so concerned over our nationals, why did the Department submit to the treatment they received in Mexico and some South American republics? Why did the State Department fail to object to Japan's attitude in China, particularly after the sinking of one of our ships? After these rebuffs, why did the State Department sell the DC–4?

JAPANESE LINE BUYS AMERICA'S LARGEST LAND PLANE

SANTA MONICA, CALIF., August 15.—America's largest land plane, the Douglas DC–4, has been sold to the Japan Air Transport Line.

A Douglas Aircraft Co. announcement said both United States military and State Department officials favored the sale as a move to build up America's production capacity. They added it would not hamper national defense.

The DC–4 weighs 65,000 pounds and carries 42 passengers. Sale price for the ship and drawings for its assembly abroad was given as $725,000.

Over a hundred million dollars has been spent directly or indirectly through Government contracts in developing the power plant of this ship, and in addition to that, scores of fine instruments and accessories were also included in the sale of the ship. It is not that a private concern has no right to sell its merchandise, but why allow a ship of this type to be sold to any nation when it may furnish engineering plans, and why include blueprints for construction? It is not difficult to knock the ship down and build machinery to reproduce the same ship on commercial scale. This ship was developed by the air lines of this country at a reputed prototype cost of $2,000,000 over a period of 3 years. It was finally tested on June 7, 1938.

By taking out the commercial equipment and substituting the necessary bomb racks and armament, it would be possible to place aboard 10 of the 1,100-pound bombs—more bomb tonnage than was dropped on the metropolitan area of London during the whole World War—and start out on a trip, and imagine what might happen if the ship is found somewhere along the California coast.

The DC–4 left Burbank May 22 last and flew to Oakland, to Salt Lake City, to Cheyenne, with block-to-block cruising speed of 207 miles per hour. On June 1 it left Chicago and flew to New York at a speed of 207 miles per hour.

I mention this because it is along the line with the remarks I inserted in the Appendix of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, page 173. I said:

Why peep around corners for spies when secrets of this sort can be obtained under cash-and-carry basis?

I believe it is high time that we forget to help other nations in military preparedness, for it is quite possible that we might need all of it for our own use and protection of the American Continent and adjacent islands.

Europe owes the United States thirteen or fourteen billion dollars, an obligation which should be paid. Why would it not be good business to settle this debt by buying islands along our coast and in the Caribbean Sea with this credit? Such islands would be valuable for protection of the Panama Canal and for our coast line. It is a proposition that we may consider now as we prepare the United States defenses for the future.

The strategic value of colonies is now evident not only on the Atlantic seaboard but on the Pacific coast as well. It was with this in view that I early in the year proposed that we prepare the islands in the Pacific for future use.

To better understand the value of colonies, let us use Germany for an illustration. Germany, not having colonies, has no place where her raiders can take on supplies or obtain repairs. Her naval and merchant ships are constantly in jeopardy of an attack by the enemy. Suppose, on the other hand, that Germany had colonies in the Pacific and Atlantic. The picture would be entirely different, for such places could be used for military bases and harbors for warcraft and merchant vessels. Naval patrol vessels could use the harbors for repairs, refueling, and for protection. What is the picture today? German merchant and naval ships are like the Flying Dutchman, ocean ghosts, mentioned at times in the press for propaganda purposes to swing public sympathy. These ships without ports furnish an ever-valuable subject for those who spin yarns on the dogwatch.

When our colonies are gone we will have ghost ships about which future generations may spin yarns as they wait for attack from bases we had but lost, while our statesmen were playing politics and our Army fighting for our destroyers, the "invisible government," instead of the Stars and Stripes.

Let us look at this from a business angle. During any war we can always trade with our own colonies. Commercial and war supplies may even be stored in such places—say, Manila. If foreign war breaks out, such commercial and military bases may always be used, not only as harbors and repair stations for our Navy and merchant marine but also as potential reserve depots for dwindling military and commercial stock. It was with this thought in mind that I supported a bill that was to provide sufficient money to establish a harbor at Guam.

The Philippines are the most valuable colonial possessions we have, and if the islands are properly fortified they will be equal to 10 navies and may be maintained, if properly administered, without any cost to us.

It is important that we visualize the future, and, as war is now conducted, no fleet would dare to leave these islands astern for the purpose of attacking any part of the United States. The nation with the greatest number of well-spotted colonies is in an enviable position in the event that war breaks out, for a nation with such colonies is a constant hazard to the enemy's fleets and commerce. I hope for 1946 that our statesmen in looking into the future will visualize the United States of America as a world power, with colonies upon which the sun will always rise.

In this digression I drifted off on a subject that is close to my heart, but I shall now return to topics more pertinent at this time.

In general discussion and debate the question arises as to the rights of our citizens, but such discussion is often confusing, because it speaks of the rights of citizens under international law, which in reality is not concerned with individuals. The rights of our citizens are guaranteed under the Constitution of the United States; and while the Federal Government's constant reference to the protection of our nationals may appear all right, the Federal Government should bear in mind that the people in the United States have reserved the rights of the States and their own rights to themselves. It is a nice gesture on the part of the Federal Government to express apprehension for the people, and a few people may appreciate such attempted Federal guardianship, but a great majority believe the procedure should be reversed.

The Federal Government's continuous alarm that some of our nationals may bring about an incident provocative of war is, if nothing else, extremely ridiculous. Wars are not brought about by the people any more than the murder of Francis Ferdinand caused the World War. Such incident is the excuse which is used by those who do not have the courage or the decency to assume responsibility for their own acts. As I look back, before the World War I do not recall anyone harboring antipathy or even interest in European nations and their affairs. I am certain there was none in the locality in which I lived. In spite of our indifference, we were constantly bombarded with pro-Entente propaganda. We had the "invisible government's" propagandized news of war horrors for breakfast, lunch, and dinner.

After the war was over we discovered there was no foundation of fact in these news. What was the purpose of this? It was to keep that subject constantly before us, so we would be receptive to the final commitment. This continued in ever-increasing intensity until peace and war became an issue in the 1916 campaign.

After the people had been worked up to the point where they began to look for Germans under their beds and good Americans with German names fell victim to suspicion, the climax arrived in the sinking of American ships, and finally in the loss of the steamship Lusitania.

In the midst of this propaganda, and as we approached the 1916 campaign, Colonel House and Mr. Baruch, the advisers to Wilson's administration, swung the slogan "He kept us out of war" to the campaign masthead. On the strength of the predominating public desire for peace, Wilson was elected for the second term—to declare war. We know more about it now than we did at that time.

The point I wish to emphasize is that the administration knew we were just about to embark in the World War, and it was not an incident brought about by our nationals, but was, instead, a deliberate agreement of Wilson's administration to render service to the Entente in the World War.

My reason for having called your attention to the past is to compare it with the present. None of the rank and file of real Americans today has the slightest desire for war, and no incident will be brought about by those citizens as cause for war. Incidents will come from higher up in the administration.

The problem which confronts those whose greatest desire is to see us involved in the present war is to provide an incident for war which may be employed without leaving the culprits responsible. It would be unfortunate for the warmongers to be held responsible for causing war, and to pay war's penalty, for they are too smart for that. But this time, however, it is our business to put them on the spot, so that, if they try something, they may be held answerable for their crime. The invisible government is not going to lead the American people by the nose this time, as it did in 1917. The procedure will, I hope, be reversed.

Let us now glance over our "rights" to which various Government representatives constantly refer.

Under international law we may sell and ship merchandise to nations at war without involving our neutrality, but in doing so we must take chances with other neutrals and not bellyache when our ships are captured or sunk by the power at war. We know the danger and we must take the consequences, but whatever happens such losses are no cause for war and should not be used by the administration for the purpose of agitating public sympathy. It is instead a part of the game and we ought to be good sportsmen and take the losses we sustain in such traffic. It is poor satisfaction to bury 30,000 of our young men in foreign cemeteries because a few of our citizens are overcurious or so acquisitive that they cannot refrain from jeopardizing their lives by traveling on ships of belligerents in war zones. It should be understood that neutral ships trading with nations at war are looked upon by such nations as if they were enemy ships and are treated accordingly.

Many people, however, do not understand why ships trading with neutral nations may also meet with disaster at the hands of warring powers. For example, Holland and Denmark are both neutral nations bordering on a nation at war, Germany. Suppose we clear a ship with cargo to either one of those nations. May we expect unhindered entry and departure? I think not, unless the manifest of the ship shows that the cargo is the property of the nation to which it is consigned and of ordinary peacetime requirements. If it should happen to be war material or contraband, and a reasonable doubt as to its final destination exists, such ship will be returned to the ports of the nation that conducts the blockade, where the cargo will be confiscated. Has the blockading power this right? Of course it has. It is a matter of life and death to such nation to prevent all war material and contraband from reaching its enemy. It is because of such blockade that nations adjoining enemy boundaries endeavor to remain strictly neutral. You can readily understand that while we have a legal right to ship to such neutrals, the nation that conducts the blockade also has the right to examine such ship so as to prevent war material from reaching ports where it may be transshipped for enemy use.

For a better understanding, suppose a nation adjoining enemy territory normally imports 1,000 tons of iron ore per year. The record of the amount of such imports is generally known. Let us now assume that this same country, after war is declared, increases iron imports to 10,000 or more tons per year. The nation operating the blockade may in such instance, and does, assume that such excess importation of iron ore is for transshipment, and it is therefore within the right of the blockading nation to commandeer ships and cargoes that might reach their enemies.

Let us bear in mind that nations which are not at war may trade with each other without the slightest fear of attack by nations that are engaged in war. It is, of course, possible that a ship might be sunk even when engaged in trade with nations at peace, but in such event the owners are usually compensated.

In pursuing trade with peaceful nations we eliminate incidents that may furnish excuse for war, such as the sinking of the Athenia and Lusitania. There is no one that disputes the rights of our citizens to travel on belligerent ships, but when they do, it must be at their own risk.

This special session, while launched as an emergency and set to martial music, did not start a war dance. I believe the more sensible citizens are tiring of the administration's jitterbugs and megalomaniacs. Schizophrenics should be replaced by sound-minded businessmen and the balmy should be sent to a nut house.

While Britain and France are stewing over our indifference to the second celebration for the international financiers, Lorelei is singing to the Poilus. No backers, no show; so it looks like the war is stranded somewhere in France until Uncle Sammy makes up his mind to sign the check. The war fever did not rise in America in spite of the money spent to grease the old war buggy of the invisible government. As a matter of fact, there is as little enthusiasm for war in Europe as there is here, since the boys across the pond have identified the owners of the blooming war chariot.

Neutrality

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM J. MILLER

OF CONNECTICUT

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, October 9, 1939

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Speaker, in this unsettled period, when we are being deluged with propaganda of all kinds, it is refreshing and helpful to read calm, unemotional articles by recognized authorities on international law and neutrality.

Such are the letters written by Prof. Charles Cheney Hyde and Prof. Philip C. Jessup appearing first in the New York Times. Professor Hyde is the author of the volume entitled "International Law—Chiefly as Interpreted and Applied by the United States." He has also prepared monographs on international law printed by our Department of State for confidential use of our delegation at the Peace Conference in 1918–19. During President Harding's administration Professor Hyde was appointed Solicitor for the Department of State.

Professor Jessup has been professor of international law at Columbia University since 1935. He has served as Assistant Solicitor of the Department of State and served with the American Expeditionary Forces in the World War. He is the author of the volumes American Neutrality and International Police and Neutrality, Its History, Economics, and Law.

Letters by these authorities have been inserted in the Appendix of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, one by the gentleman from New York, the Honorable HAMILTON FISH, of New York, on page 191, and the other, on page 335, by me.

It is my sincere hope that many of my constituents will take time to study the opinions of such outstanding authorities.

George Cardinal Mundelein

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CHARLES KRAMER

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, October 9, 1939

FUNERAL SERMON BY MOST REV. JOHN J. CANTWELL, D. D.

Mr. KRAMER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following funeral sermon for George Cardinal Mundelein by His Excellency Most Rev. John J. Cantwell, D. D.:

May it please your excellency, most reverend brethren of the hierarchy, right reverend, very reverend, and reverend Fathers, and dearly beloved of the laity, when a man is suddenly taken away from a work which his genius has inspired and his hands have fashioned, when the maturity of his years would assure him of a wider extension of his labors and a larger usefulness, we, who mourn his passing, feel the transitory nature of human sovereignty and the vanity of human wishes. Such feelings, however, natural as they are, disappear before the consideration that the priesthood is rooted, not in the natural, but in the supernatural order. That day a young man kneels before the bishop to receive the yoke of Christ he is warned that henceforth his chief ministry is to show forth the death of the Lord at the holy altar. So daily must he die to the world and live only unto God.

As the mothers of Sparta sent forth their sons to war and bade them return with their shields or upon them, so holy church from the beginning sends forth her priests as men destined unto death, whose only hope is that when the end comes they may be able to say with the Apostle, "I have fought the good fight. I have finished my course. I have kept the faith. Now there is laid up for me the crown which the just Judge will render me in that day."

Mighty is the sorrow that these days weigh upon the widowed church in Chicago, because he who was its good shepherd has been called away. The mourning of Chicago has found a responsive chord all over this wide land, from the rock-bound coast of Maine to where the waters break on California's silver sands. He who stood as a watchman on the walls of Zion, who represented the person of the sovereign pontiff as papal legate, who sat in conclave with the princes of the church to perpetuate the succession of Peter, has passed into the house of silence.

He has answered his Master's last summons to return home. And who would regret the mire of the market place and the dust of the dreary and lonely road when summoned to the table of the King and the company of the saints. It ill becomes us to be sorrowful in his behalf, who remain to fulfill our own unfinished tasks, or to mourn as those who have no hope. He has gone into no strange country but into his Father's house.

Such an attitude as this toward death is the very flower of that "faith which is the substance of things to be hoped for, the evidence of things unseen." And George Cardinal Mundelein was, above all things, a man of liveliest faith. His ancestors through six generations on American soil perpetuated the truths handed down from the saints, and that in many lands were budding into a second spring. His was the generation in which men and women, though weak, were made strong; though timid, became valiant unto battle. They were men and women who marched under the shadow of the cross, and would permit no man to violate the sanctity of conscience; theirs was the age that not for the first time in history forced men of iron to the gates of Canosa.

Such was the inheritance bequeathed to George Mundelein in his youthful years. Educated in the traditional manner of Catholic children, he imbibed respect for authority and that love of home characteristic of the race from which he sprang. His early education was entrusted to the Sons of St. John de la Salle, a congregation of men who have deserved well of Catholic education in the United States. A call came to him as it came of old to Samuel sleeping beside the tabernacle. His ears were early attuned to the music of choirs invisible, and his eyes were holden by a cloud of witnesses that hovered over his head. He answered a call to the priesthood, and pursued his studies under the direction of the venerable Benedictine Fathers in Beatty, Pa. He achieved the ambition of many an American boy in being permitted to continue his preparation for the priesthood in eternal Rome. It was here he said his first mass, as it was here he developed that tender love and sterling loyalty for the person of him who sits in Peter's chair, and for George Mundelein, as priest, bishop, and prince of the church, the voice of the vicar of Christ was ever the voice of the Commander in Chief.

It is the law of the church that at stated periods every bishop in the world must visit Vatican City and report to the pope on the condition of his diocese. There is, therefore, year by year, a constant procession of the governors of the church over the threshold of the Apostles. They come, like messengers hastening from the field of battle, bearing tidings to their chief of the fortunes of war. What changing pictures of hope and fear, of joy and sorrow, of victory and defeat must pass before the successor of St. Peter as he sits by the tomb of the fisherman to hear the varied messages. They tell the story of knout and of chains and of hopeless exile. They come with the tales of great churches, once free, that are now on bondage, and where no man dares to sing the songs of Zion.

From other lands come bishops in the same Roman purple with the wine of youth in their veins. They hasten as bearers of great joy—from the United States, from Canada and the Cape, from Australia, and from the lands of the rising sun. And at the head of the rank, with measured step, comes a man of keen and vigorous mind, unfolding the story of the mighty works of religion and charity wrought through God's grace in the great church in Chicago. Its cardinal archbishop is proud of his city and jealous of its honor. He tells of new parishes established, of new churches built, of schools founded. He tells the story of the founding and the development of a noble seminary where the children of the pioneers may prepare themselves under the shadow of Mary's mantle to take up the torches that day by day fall from the aged and wearied hands. The shepherd speaks of a noble clergy that perpetuates the zeal of the Apostles. Holy masses are multiplied, the sacraments are frequented, the young are instructed, the sick visited, and the poor have the gospel preached to them. What a glorious vision passes before the eyes of the Supreme Pontiff when Chicago's cardinal tells of a mighty congress that he, first among his peers, dared to invite to the United States that the church in America might have its share in the spiritual glory of the elder lands.

In that day to the hospitable gates of Chicago flocked the children of the Christian fold from every land. We view the march of priests and the long procession of mitered heads. After them, clothed in royal purple, come princes of the church sustaining the hands of him who, as the Pope's representative, was the pledge to this new land of Rome's unwearied love and a token of apostolic confidence in the faith of American Catholics.

Cardinal Mundelein ruled over a diocese to which the tribes of the earth contributed their quota. Men and women of many races and many tongues had found shelter within the hospitable gates of our country. Escaping the blood-drenched fields of Europe and abandoning the lands where their ancestors lie in death awaiting the angel's trumpet, they found here under the Constitution liberty, a kindly understanding, sympathetic interest, concord, amity, and peace. Cardinal Mundelein could assure the vicar of Christ that in his metropolitan church, as all over this land, men and women, children of races inured to strife and battle, join hand and heart under the Stars and Stripes. They and their children have become champions of peace and justice and patriotic citizens of the land of their birth or adoption.

As they advance down the years they march shoulder to shoulder and knee to knee. They bow with truly Catholic fervor before the altar of God, and all the while are they deeply conscious that the strength derived from that common table is that which binds them, though of different race and tongue, in that supernatural reality which is the mystical body of Christ. Mindful of the fratricidal conflicts of the lands they have abandoned, they are ever ready under the aegis of the church and the guaranties of the Constitution to labor with their fellow citizens in maintaining within our shores the reign of charity, justice, and peace.

It is to the glory of George Cardinal Mundelein and his flock that under his inspiration and guidance and through their cooperation

Chicago can show the world an example of that harmonious living which is so much needed in the world today and which must ever be the foundation of progress and peace.

But His Eminence of Chicago was not only a brilliant churchman and a leader of the hosts of Zion, he was a great American citizen. After the love of God comes the love of country. A man must indeed be insensible to human emotion whose heart does not beat faster at the thought of his native land. His forbears had been exiles from the fatherland, but neither they nor their children have ever been exiles from the faith. A great Catholic must be a great American. He knows that all authority comes from Almighty God; that the President of the United States and the Governor of the State rule in civil and temporal matters with the same authority that the Pope in Rome governs the church in things spiritual, for all power comes from God.

Cardinal Mundelein was not a man to confine himself to the sacristy, but exercising his franchise as a free American citizen, he played a man's part in public life. In these days that are passing he was very sad, because man of peace that he was, he would walk under the standard of the Prince of Peace. Yet he was not a weak man. Well he believed with the Apostles that the strong man armed keepeth his court. And well did he understand the words that week after week rose up before him in the vesper service: "Blessed be the Lord God of Israel, who taught my arms to fight and my fingers to battle." So he would, if needs be, lift his voice to denounce wrong and injustice, whether at home or in the chancelries of Europe.

It was a patriotic impulse too, that gave inspiration to the marvelous movement among the youth of Chicago, which has extended from the shores of the Atlantic to the Pacific.

So important did this work seem to him, that from his own household he selected one whose soul was knit to his own, that he might salvage the forgotten children in the purlieus of a great city, and the lanes and highways of the countryside. The meanest child in the most pitiable rags was for Cardinal Mundelein as one made a little less than the angels. He would use the natural talents of these youth, intellectual and physical, to bring them under the influence of Christ's Church and Christ's Commandments. But this distinguished work among the youth did not blind him to the fact that in their endeavor to perpetuate Christian teaching the Catholic people were not getting fair play from their fellow citizens.

Cardinal Mundelein recognized that the American state had committed itself to the so-called nonsectarian system of instruction. The common school has won the day in these States and has won the affection of the populace. Public money generously supports it. But such a system can never satisfy Catholics. Baptized in the name of the Trinity and incorporated in the Body of Christ, the soul of the child even before the dawn of reason, is the Temple of the Holy Ghost. Therefore, when such a child comes to learn of the world and the things about him, it is Catholic instinct that he must have access to Christ and Christ to him. A school whose windows are closed to Him, who is the light of the world, cannot be the best school. The Catholic heart revolts at the thought that Christ must stand at the door of the school while the voice of his children, bought with his blood, rings in his ears. He knocks. but the answer comes: "You cannot enter here." It was the knowledge that it was impossible to give a Catholic education to all of the children, that gave impetus to the movements that have succeeded so well among the large multitude of the less fortunate youth.

My brethren of the hierarchy would not pardon me if I failed to mention the solicitude which the Cardinal of Chicago bore for the men who are laboring under the mighty difficulties and straitened circumstances in the lands of the South and the West. He followed with keen interest the heroic struggles of many bishops, whose deeds are being written not in the sands of the desert, but in the book of life. And the same interest that he had in the missions he manifested as Chancelor of the Catholic Church Extension Society, which found in him a wise guide and a stirring influence.

America needs the Catholic Church because a great nation demands a great religion. "Not in bread alone doth man live, but in every word that proceedeth from the mouth of God."

And there is no organization that can come before the American people and speak the word of God with the authority that compels respect except that church whose sons have written their names large in the annals of the pioneers; of that church of which George Cardinal Mundelein was in these days a leader and a prince. Among the citizens of this State are many whose names will live in history, and not the least of them will be that of him whose obsequies in bitter grief we conduct this morning.

Now, dear and eminent friend, good-bye. Your brethren of the hierarchy and your priests rank after rank stand beside you and pray for your soul. May the earth rest lightly upon you and may your spirit rejoice in a peace that passeth understanding.

O solemn communion of the saints that binds us by golden chains to the feet of God, O consoling teaching of the church, that we may follow those who have gone before us with our deeds of mercy. The generous heart is stilled forever. The lips that spoke of the things of God are locked in silence. The busy hands are folded in peace and the feet that were swift in errands of mercy rest forever. Cardinal priest that he was, his request is now the common one of all mankind, the charity of our prayers, our alms, deeds, and our sacrifices. The strife of life is over. Hushed are the winds; the waves are still. May his rest be beneath the Eternal Arms in the light that shall never fail.

Relief

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. LEE E. GEYER
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, October 9, 1939

Mr. GEYER of California. Mr. Speaker, last session when we passed the W. P. A. appropriation bill there were many in this House that predicted dire results if all the people thrown off the rolls by the action of this body were forced to depend on the States for their livelihood. The State of California is probably as generous as any State in the Union with those that are upon its relief rolls. California has many thousands who have migrated there following the advice, "Go West." These people find a flooded labor market and search for work is in vain. Perhaps they think it is a little more comfortable to starve to death where the climate is mild rather than suffer, in addition to the pangs of hunger, the bitter cold of an eastern or midwestern winter. At any rate, the State of California has in addition to its own normal relief load, a part of the burden of many of the other States. This problem of relief is a national problem and may not be shifted, if we are to be fair, to the different States for solution.

If the victim happens to be along in years and has by that reason served society well, it seems that he must be penalized for that service of helping to build this richest country in the world. Industry has no place for him and the best he can do is to eke out a miserable existence until he is old enough to qualify for an old-age pension. Then he may expect a little more, but in this the Congress has been all too niggardly.

In the midst of this miserable condition it is indeed strange that the loyalty of the victims to our democracy and the things for which it stands remains unshaken. Can we expect a suffering one-third of our people to always remain so? Especially when they know that we have too much of everything according to this miserable economy of scarcity that guarantees profits and plenty of them before it cares for human needs. If there ever was a time that loyalty to our institutions was necessary, it is during this national crisis. The best defense to our Nation is a happy and contented people. This can be brought about only by guaranteeing to every man who wants to work a job at a decent living wage and to those who may be so unfortunate as to be unable to work, either an old-age pension as a right and not as charity, or if too young for that, a monthly allowance. We can do no less if we are to live up to the principles expressed in the Declaration of Independence and the Constitution of the United States. I hope at the coming session that we may pass legislation to care for our citizens who find themselves, through no fault of their own, unable to care for themselves.

I have printed below a letter from one who exemplifies the true spirit of those this Congress has wronged.

The letter follows:

LOS ANGELES, CALIF.,
September 30, 1939.

Hon. LEE E. GEYER,
Of California.

DEAR FRIEND: As I am a newcomer to your grand State, a State of one of the number of States that make up our grand United States, of which I am proud to be a voter, a resident for over 60 years. Born in Cleveland, Ohio, I came out here July 3, 1937, and have voted here ever since. Your name was handed to me with a paper that is headed with these words: "Not printed at Government expense. United States of America, CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. Proceedings and Debates of the Seventy-sixth Congress, first session.

"Politics and Relief. Eating and Starving by Shifts. Does Patriotism Feed on Hunger?"

[Speech by yourself] "in the House of Representatives, March 20, 1939."

Now, my dear friend. I just received this great speech of yours. I'm just back from receiving my grocery supply that we receive here twice per month (14th and 30th of each month). Let me state in my own words: I have to spend 14 cents carfare to get to this place at 2210 Temple Street. It is about 3 miles from where I live. On September 16 I went over there for the first time—14 cents carfare. I received 2 pounds of green beans, 2 pounds of lima beans, and two pounds of onions. That is all, to last until September 30. Today I went again (September 30). I received 2 pounds of flour, 2 pounds of corn meal, some carrots. That is all for 14 cents carfare. On my card they mark "next time October 14, full issue to October 14, 1939."

I pay $3 per week for a room where I can cook. But what have I to cook? Let's figure this out. From August 21 to October 4 (date rent is due) I have paid out to landlady $18 for rent. I received $27.96 from the State Relief Administration in cash. This leaves me $9.96 balance in cash to eat, pay carfare. I have to pay 14 cents to get my check each time, carfare; 14 cents to get groceries, 28 cents in all to receive cash, 28 cents to receive what little they give us, from the 21st of August to September 30—40 days in all to make $9.96 to stretch over these 40 days, about 25 cents per day. It cannot be done. "Yes," they say, "find a cheaper room, $2 per week." Yes there are rooms for $1.50, $2, and $2.50 per week. But, I don't wish to live where half of the house is drunk most of the time and bugs that you can't sleep. I never drank in my life and I cannot stand anything like that. Yes, this a. m. when I read I was going to write to some one about the things they give up at Temple Street I was informed that I would get cut off all together. Well, dear friend, if this letter will cause things to be better and I do get cut off, I know that it has helped some one.

Talk of democracy away from our own land. I think it is about time we clean our own front-door steps. Eight million men, women, and children on relief yet hungry, jails full, courts overworked, $12,000,000,000 in money in this State's banks. No wonder they are going out for "ham and eggs." I don't blame them, and I, for one, will state here, this condition will make me vote for "ham and eggs" November 7. I trust that this letter will help not only me but thousands of others.

Thanks. I remain,

At your service,

CHARLES H. STALKER.

Pending Neutrality Legislation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ALBEN W. BARKLEY

OF KENTUCKY

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, October 10 (legislative day of Wednesday, October 4), 1939

RADIO ADDRESS BY HON. TOM CONNALLY, OF TEXAS

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a very able address delivered on last Friday evening, over the network of the National Broadcasting Co., by the junior Senator from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY] on the subject of pending neutrality legislation.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

My countrymen, America is at peace. God grant that she may remain at peace. Twenty-two years ago Europe was drenched in blood by a terrible war. We were dragged into that war.

Today, again, great nations with millions of men with arms in their hands are reeling and struggling in modern warfare. We do not propose to be dragged into this war. The American people love peace and hate war. They want their sons to live at home. They do not want them to die on foreign battlefields.

President Roosevelt called Congress to draft and pass an act for real neutrality and a program to keep us out of war. The joint resolution now before the Senate was drawn by the Committee on Foreign Relations, of which I am a member, after conferences with the President, with the Secretary of State, with eminent authorities, and after mature and exhaustive consideration.

It is offered as giving greater assurance to keep us out of war and to preserve a legal and real neutrality than any measure which can be devised.

It repeals the Arms Embargo Act of 1937 and prohibits the shipment of arms or ammunition or supplies of any kind in American ships to any nation at war.

Our citizens, not our Government, may sell the products of our fields and factories to citizens of all nations who may come to our shores, acquire title, and transport them in foreign ships. They must come and get it.

The Embargo Act now provides that it is unlawful to export arms, munitions, or implements of war from the United States to any nation at war. There is now no limit on other supplies to nations at war.

It was passed in the mistaken hope that we might persuade militaristic powers not to bring on war. We know now how empty was that hope. There is widespread misunderstanding of the embargo. Opponents of repeal constantly and sedulously have claimed that the embargo means peace. Some have accepted that claim without analysis or examination. That false assumption has been hammered into the public mind, when the claim is wholly baseless and unsupported.

Why do we repeal it? Because, to keep it is to make the United States unneutral. We have the same right to repeal it now that we had to pass it then.

It permits our citizens to sell to warring nations, excepting arms and ammunition, all other supplies and to carry them to nations at war in American ships. Repeal of the embargo is necessary if the United States is to be neutral in fact, and neutral under international law. Why do I say that? Because, under international law, from the time of Grotius, warring nations may buy and neutral nations may sell munitions, arms, and every commodity, without distinction, to nations at war. Every other neutral that can is now selling arms, ammunition, and supplies to the warring factions. I read from article 5 of Convention No. 13, The Hague Conference of 1907. It says:

"A neutral power is not called upon to prevent the export or transport, on behalf of one or other of the belligerents, of arms, munitions of war, or, in general, of anything which can be of use to an army or a fleet."

The theory of the Arms Embargo Act is that in time of peace it is legitimate to sell arms to any nation but not to sell them in time of war. Is it right, in time of peace, to sell arms to an aggressor to prepare for war and wrong to sell them in wartime for defense against the aggressor? It encourages aggressors. It penalizes peaceful and unprepared nations.

The embargo says, "We will sell you arms in time of peace, but you cannot get any in time of war. We will sell them to you in time of peace for offense. We will sell them to you in time of peace so that you can get ready for war. We will sell them to you in time of peace when your neighbors are asleep. We will sell them to you in time of peace when your adversary is unsuspecting and unwary. We will let you arm to the teeth, aggressors. Come on, conquerors, come to our shores and buy arms and ammunition. Arm yourselves to the teeth. Get our airplanes, get our cannons, get our bayonets, get our rifles, and all the devilish machinery of war, and then start your war, and we pledge you that, when you strike, your victim shall not get such things from this great neutral power. We cannot do anything for your victim. He must suffer. He cannot secure any arms here." The aggressor fixes his own time to strike his victim. That time determines when his victim can no longer get arms. Unsuspecting an attack, the victim does not prepare. The aggressor, by his attack, shuts off our markets. That is the doctrine of the existing Embargo Act—the so-called Neutrality Act.

The embargo applied to our citizens would mean that the highwayman who plans to hold up an innocent citizen on his way home tonight can get all the arms, all the blackjacks he may desire. "Come and get them." But if the citizen, when assailed upon the highway, asks his chauffeur to borrow a weapon to defend himself, the law says, "No, you cannot do it. This aggressor has a vested right to say to the United States, 'You cannot sell anybody else, in time of war, arms to protect himself from my aggression'."

That is the doctrine of the so-called Neutrality Act. The embargo, if applied in private life, would say to the safecracker who wants to rob a bank, "Come over. We shall be glad to sell you nitroglycerin. We have good jimmies; we have good pistols; we have good instruments for burglars. Here they are." But when he goes down to the bank vault to rob and to kill, if the watchman or the owner is there, under the Embargo Act, they could not borrow a weapon from the elevator boy; they could not borrow a pistol from a bystander to defend their property and their lives. That is the doctrine. If it were wrong to sell arms in time of war for defense, it is a greater wrong to sell arms in time of peace for offense.

Hitler is buying arms and supplies from Holland, from Denmark, from Belgium, from what was Poland, from Russia, from Rumania, from what was Czechoslovakia, from Italy, from Hungary, from what was Austria, and from adjacent lands. He controls the Baltic and can buy from Sweden and Holland. If it is not unneutral for these nations to sell commodities, including arms and ammunition, to Germany, how can it be unneutral for the United States to sell supplies to any nation which may come and get them.

They say "to repeal the embargo will help Great Britain and France." Then, by the same logic, to keep the embargo helps Hitler and Stalin.

It is said that it would result to the advantage of the democracies because they dominate the sea. That is not our responsibility. In every war some nations have one advantage and others another. We are not responsible for the geography of the earth. We made not the mountains; we made not the oceans; we made not the boundaries of Europe. The nation that has one advantage has the right to enjoy it without interference, just as another nation that enjoys another advantage has a right to enjoy it.

Germany has great advantages on land. She can buy from all the nations I have named. The Allies do not have access. They cannot have access to those markets. We do not deny to either the Allies or to Germany those natural advantages—the one on the land, the other on the sea. Unless the embargo is repealed, that is exactly what we are doing. We are denying England and France their advantage, while Hitler enjoys his land advantage.

The embargo does not touch a multitude of things which go out upon the seas. If the embargo is kept on the books, American ships—not foreign ships but American ships—can carry any of these supplies to any nation at war. They may carry them right into England or right into Germany or right into France.

In the World War it was not the kind of cargo our vessels carried that brought us into war. It was the unrestricted submarine warfare of Germany when she killed our citizens and sank every kind of vessel.

Before America was dragged into the World War, while at peace and while neutral, 25 American ships were attacked or sunk on the seas. American lives were lost. Those ships did not carry arms or ammunition.

They were carrying general American commerce. The Kaiser sank them then. Hitler will sink them now. We shall then be face to face with the same issue that plunged us into the World War. The embargo will bring us to the brink of war.

German submarines are now sinking Finnish ships and Swedish and Danish ships. They are not at war. Those ships carried no arms or munitions. One had a cargo of butter.

The arms embargo offers no assurance of peace. It does not offer even a hope of peace.

How may we, then, keep out of war? The proposed act provides that no American vessel may carry any American passenger or cargo to any nation at war; no arms, no ammunition, no food, no raw materials, no clothing; no anything can leave an American port in an American ship for a nation at war. They must come and get it. No American ship or cargo can be sunk on their way to nations at war, because there will be no such ship or cargo on the sea. No American lives will be lost, because no citizen will be on such a ship. No supplies can leave American shores until the title has been transferred.

The joint resolution is an American act enacted by Americans and for Americans. We are making tremendous sacrifices of our shipping and our commerce in behalf of peace. We limit the rights and the liberties of our citizens in the interest of peace, to keep out of war.

My countrymen, we hope that this joint resolution will keep us out of war. In a world in which military power has overthrown law and peace—where the sword rules like a king upon a throne, where armed might rules like a sceptered monarch, where ambitious dictators with great armies are bent on conquest—America must build the greatest navy upon the seas, powerful and strong enough to dominate the Atlantic on the east and the Pacific on the west. We must provide aircraft until it is adequate, both for the Navy and for the Army. We must provide aircraft defenses. We must be prepared to meet any threat to our safety or security. The voice of George Washington lays upon us that solemn duty.

While we hope and pray that, under God, this joint resolution will keep us out of war, we must be prepared to defend the territory, the governmental institutions of the United States, and the lives and liberties of our people.

Wheeler Homecoming Celebration, Hudson, Mass.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ROBERT M. LA FOLLETTE, JR.

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, October 10 (legislative day of Wednesday, October 4), 1939

ADDRESS BY HON. BURTON K. WHEELER, OF MONTANA

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an address delivered by the senior Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER] at the Burton K. Wheeler Homecoming Celebration held at Hudson, Mass., on Sunday afternoon, October 1, 1939.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

It is a pleasure to be back in Hudson and to greet old friends and acquaintances.

Though the town has changed with the march of progress—though many sites familiar 30 years ago are no more—and though there is increased business activity and many more persons are here, yet the old spirit is the same. I am proud to be numbered among the sons of Hudson, just as I am pleased, beyond my limited description, with the great reception that has been accorded me.

My obligations to you now are even greater, and I have long known that I owe you much. It was in your public schools that I received my primary education. It was the principal of the Hudson High School who suggested and encouraged my study of the law. Fate has treated me kindly, and I wish to acknowledge my debt to Mr. Charles A. Williams and to Miss Ethyl Rawson of the Hudson public school system for the encouragement which they gave me.

It was the town of Hudson, the county of Middlesex, the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, and the glorious traditions of all New England that furnished the background of which I am so proud. No State, no part of these United States ever produced greater liberals, greater leaders, or better men than John Hancock, Benjamin Franklin, Samuel Adams, Paul Revere, John Adams, and the host of patriots whose names and whose deeds are so indelibly inscribed on the pages of history of this Nation. They were the liberals of their day. Some called them radicals. Today we honor them as patriots. The liberalism of these farseeing patriots has been a constant source of inspiration to all Americans.

New England has contributed more than leadership to our great Nation. Democracy on this continent had its birth in the town meeting. I can well remember as a boy clutching the hand of Abe Tyler, my grandfather, as we went to town hall. I thrilled to the discussions. There it was after full and open debate by all citizens who desired to participate, that town problems and policies were settled. Such free and open discussion and the rule of the majority is real democracy.

Your forefathers and mine laid down their lives to establish a democratic republic in this land. They were farmers, cobblers, blacksmiths, tailors, merchants and tradesmen, but with the march of progress the shoeshop became a factory and the cobbler an employee. The small factory or shop with its owner-worker disappeared and in its stead came modern industrialization, combinations, and trusts. Mass production replaced the individual and brought with it severe tests of democracy—unemployment, low farm prices and poverty.

Amid economic inequalities, social injustice, and poverty democracy always labors if, indeed, it does not fail. Poverty is as needless as it is vicious. It fills the earth with subversive dogmas, endangers our democracy, and hence our freedom. Poverty is the menace of peace, the seed of race hatreds, and the cause of religious prejudice. If man must hate, let us not hate each other—let us hate poverty. If man must make war, let us not fight each other—let us make war on poverty.

The success or failure of American democracy is dependent upon economic and social conditions—upon the welfare and happiness of the people who compose it, and not upon who wins the war in Europe. Men will fight and even die for democracy; but once gained, their children and grandchildren come to accept the privilege of constitutional democracy as commonplace. Lacking employment, food, clothing, shelter, or markets for their produce, they become a fertile field for demagogues. Once Germany attempted a democracy, but its people had been reduced to economic serfdom, and in poverty succumbed to the false promises of economic security. They sold their freedom for the promise of bread. The old saying that "you cannot have bread for nothing" is as true today as ever. You must work for it or you'll be required to give up your liberties for it.

Through the ages the number one economic problem had been that of producing enough. American industrial genius solved this problem in our country by mass production.

Now, we are told we have too much farm land, too much factory capacity, too many mines, too much food and clothing; so much of everything that starvation lurks at our doors. So much wheat, milk, and meat that farmers are losing their farms, laborers losing their jobs, and people losing faith in their fellow man, if not in their Government.

What a paradox!

Let us not forget that it is the very lack of all these things of which we have an abundance that lies at the bottom of the wars in Europe and in the Orient.

It must be apparent then that mass production to be successful must be accompanied by mass consumption—money earned and in the pockets of the people to buy the goods produced.

We in America must use our genius and our resources in solving this paradox of want in the midst of plenty, if we desire to save the country from financial and moral bankruptcy. We must not use that genius or our great resources in a futile European war. It should never be forgotten that it is the moral and financial bankruptcy of a nation that brings about dictatorship.

Less than 23 years ago we went into a bloody conflict "to make the world safe for democracy." Today, after that so-called victorious holy war, the world knows less democracy than ever before. To say the World War was futile is to be charitable; it was horrible; it was disastrous. I shudder to think of the potential results, direct and indirect, of the present war.

A quarter of a century ago Kaiserism was to be stamped out; now it is nazi-ism. Both are indefensible—both are repugnant to free peoples. The problem that faces Europe today not only parallels the 1914 situation but is one which is recorded in the pages of European history a hundred times. The characters may be more bold, the names changed, and certainly the villain is equally or more repulsive, but the plot and the climax are as old as European history itself.

My sympathies are with the Allies—and I know that the American people and all lovers of democracy want Hitlerism crushed. It is the symbol of dictatorship, of bankruptcy, followed by intolerance, bigotry, and prejudice. All this is the product of the last war, and should the present war assume the dimensions of the first World War I am fearful that there will not only be a bankrupt Germany but a bankrupt world—not one Hitler, one Mussolini, or one Stalin, but many.

Sympathetic as we are with those who find themselves at war with dictators, we must never lose sight of the fact that our entry into war cannot be measured alone in terms of lives lost and dollars spent. The price would surely be loss of democracy and Christianity. They could not withstand the impact of war.

Our problem is to solve our economic difficulties at home and not the politics of Europe. Our problem is to preserve American democracy—and not the balance of power or the boundaries of Europe.

We are passing through a grave crisis—a trying period. We must be vigilant in guarding our peace. Neither sentiment, propaganda, nor profits must be allowed to influence our determination to avoid our participation in the present conflict.

Already there has been loosed upon us a flood of propaganda from both sides. Its intensity will be multiplied with the passage of time. Already in Washington the war hysteria rises in full flood. Detectives watch the Capitol, watch the office buildings, and watch each other. It won't be long now before we will be spying on each other and seeing German U-boats in the Great Lakes and enemy airplanes over the Rocky Mountains.

I sometimes wonder whether we shouldn't be more afraid of the war propaganda originating in New York and Washington than that which emanates from foreign capitals.

The American people today seem resolved to withstand it. Let us pray that they keep steadfast in the hectic days to come. They realize that our vision may be clouded, and our thinking dulled, but they know that the cost of war will be greater today than ever before.

War profits will destroy true neutrality. They lure and corrupt. War profits may bring a temporary and artificial prosperity—a prosperity which would be only a shot in the arm of our economic system productive of a cheap and murderous jag—but which would end in a disastrous depression. At this moment there is some increase in the price of wheat, sugar, beef, and other basic goods. Certain industries are hastily reemploying men, but for any war-engendered prosperity we will eventually pay and pay and pay.

We are neither Germans, Poles, Britains, Frenchmen, Italians, nor Russians. We are Americans, and in this hour of world strife our country is a haven for peace. We must so maintain it. Cries of nazi-ism, fascism, or communism that we presently hear neither frighten nor interest me. Working democracy can withstand their attacks. The only "ism" in which I am interested is Americanism. We should build up our national defense so that no nation will dare attack us; we must build up our trade in the Americas where our natural markets lie.

And now my friends, as a Member of the United States Senate I promise you that I will never vote to send a single American boy across the water to fight on foreign soil. Neither will I, by my vote, approve of a single step that in my judgment may lead this country down the road to war.

These are some of the reasons why I am not in favor of selling arms and munitions to any of the belligerents. This is why I would insist that all other products be paid for in cash and delivery made in this country. And this is why I would say to all Americans—you travel in troubled waters at your own risk—you cannot and must not involve this country in war.

America must be kept safe for Americans in America!

Attitude of Senator Caraway Toward Repeal of Arms Embargo

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES F. BYRNES

OF SOUTH CAROLINA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, October 10 (legislative day of Wednesday, October 4), 1939

ARTICLE FROM THE WASHINGTON POST

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a brief article from the Washington Post under the heading "Mrs. CARAWAY, two sons in the Army, holds repeal best peace bet." The article sets forth the attitude of the Senator from Arkansas [Mrs. CARAWAY].

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Washington Post of October 8, 1939]

MRS. CARAWAY, TWO SONS IN ARMY, HOLDS REPEAL BEST PEACE BET

The lone woman Senator, Mrs. HATTIE CARAWAY, of Arkansas, whose two sons are Army officers, yesterday told the International News Service she was going to vote for "President Roosevelt's arms-embargo repeal because I don't want my two boys to have to go to war."

Mrs. CARAWAY'S sons are Capt. Paul W. Caraway, instructor in law at West Point, and Lt. Forest Caraway, stationed at Chilkoot, Alaska. Both are West Point graduates and would be in line for immediate duty in event of war. Mrs. CARAWAY said:

"I feel very deeply on the subject of neutrality. I don't want to see the son of any American mother go to war.

"Many women, because I am the only woman Senator, write to me and tell me that if I had any sons I would not vote for repeal of the embargo.

"Well, I have two sons, both Army officers, and I am sure that if we were forced into war that they would go to the front line. I do not want that, and I'm certain that mothers of other sons who would have to go do not want it.

"If I thought that repeal of the embargo would lead us into war, I certainly would not vote for it. But I believe, with the restriction the President's bill carries on American shipping to war zones and the cash-and-carry provisions on all shipments to belligerents, that it, if anything will, will keep us out of war."

List of Supporters of Pending Neutrality Legislation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. THEODORE G. BILBO

OF MISSISSIPPI

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, October 10 (legislative day of Wednesday, October 4), 1939

LIST COMPILED BY HON. KEENER C. FRAZER, PROFESSOR OF INTERNATIONAL LAW, UNIVERSITY OF NORTH CAROLINA

Mr. BILBO. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to publish in the Appendix of the RECORD an important list of outstanding men and women in the Southeastern States. The proposals for the revision of the neutrality laws of the United States, as formulated by President Roosevelt and Secretary of State Cordell Hull, submitted to the Congress of the United States in special session, are approved and supported by this group of more than 100 men and women, representing the churches, journalism, business, the professions, civic interests, labor, and education.

I think I am safe in saying that these leading men and women of this great section of the United States voice the sentiment of more than 98 percent of the people of this section.

For this list I am indebted to Hon. Kenner C. Frazer, executive secretary of the Southern Council on International Relations, and professor of international law of the University of North Carolina, Chapel Hill, N. C.

There being no objection, the list was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CHURCH LEADERS

Bishop H. P. Almon Abbott, diocese of Lexington, Lexington, Ky.
Bishop Theodore D. Bratton, Jackson, Miss.
Bishop Thomas C. Darst, diocese of eastern Carolina, Wilmington, N. C.
Bishop J. Lloyd Decell, Methodist bishop of Alabama and Georgia, Birmingham, Ala.
Bishop Hoyt M. Dobbs, Methodist bishop of Louisiana and Mississippi, Jackson, Miss.
Bishop William M. Green, diocese of Mississippi, Jackson, Miss.
Bishop Robert C. Jett, retired bishop, diocese of southwestern Virginia, Roanoke, Va.
Bishop Paul B. Kern, Methodist bishop of Tennessee and Florida, Nashville, Tenn.
Bishop H. J. Mikell, diocese of Atlanta, Atlanta, Ga.
Bishop A. S. Thomas, diocese of South Carolina, Charleston, S. C.
Bishop John D. Wing, diocese of south Florida, Orlando, Fla.
Bishop Frank A. Juhan, diocese of Florida, Jacksonville, Fal.
Rev. John W. Frazer, D. D., Mobile, Ala.
Rev. M. Ashby Jones, D. D., Atlanta, Ga.
Rev. George Stoves, D. D., Macon, Ga
Rev. R. P. Marshall, D. D., editor, Florida Christian Advocate, Lakeland, Fla.
Rev. John W. Inzer, D. D., First Baptist Church, Asheville, N. C.
Rev. James W. Jackson, D. D., Columbia, S. C.
Rev. Albert S. Johnson, D. D., First Presbyterian Church, Charlotte, N. C.

Rev. John Glenn, D. D., Edenton Street Methodist Church, Raleigh, N. C.
Rev. B. R. Lacy, Jr., D. D., president, Union Theological Seminary, Richmond, Va.
Rev. W. E. Rollins, D. D., dean, Virginia Theological Seminary, Alexandria, Va.
Rabbi Edward N. Calisch, D. D., Congregation Beth Ahabah, Richmond, Va.
Rabbi Joseph Rauch, D. D., Temple Adath Israel, Louisville, Ky.

JOURNALISTS

Mr. Julian Hall, editor, the Eagle, Dothan, Ala.
Dr. John Temple Graves, editor, the News, Birmingham, Ala.
Mr. David E. Smiley, editor and president, the Times, Tampa, Fla.
Mr. Tom Wallace, editor, the Times, Louisville, Ky.
Mr. Barry Bingham, publisher, the Courier-Journal and Times, Louisville, Ky.
Dr. Herbert Agar, the Courier-Journal, Louisville, Ky.
Mr. John D. Ewing, publisher, the Times, Shreveport, La.
Mr. Frederick Sullins, the News, Jackson, Miss.
Dr. Clarence Poe, editor, the Progressive Farmer, Raleigh, N. C.
Col. Santford Martin, editor, the Journal and Sentinel, Winston-Salem, N. C.
Mr. Charles A. Webb, president, the Asheville Citizen and Times, Asheville, N. C.
Hon. George F. Milton, president and editor, the News, Chattanooga, Tenn.
Mr. J. H. Nye, editor, the Tennessean, Nashville, Tenn.
Mr. Virginius Dabney, editor, the Times-Dispatch, Richmond, Va.
Dr. Douglas S. Freeman, editor, the News Leader, Richmond, Va.
Mr. Louis I. Jaffe, editor, the Virginian-Pilot, Norfolk, Va.

BUSINESS AND PROFESSIONS

Mr. A. W. McAllister, chairman of the board, Pilot Life Insurance Co., Greensboro, N. C.
Mr. P. H. Callahan, president, Louisville Varnish Co., Louisville, Ky.
Mr. J. Skottowe Wannamaker, president, American Cotton Association, St. Matthews, S. C.
Mr. John Sprunt Hill, Durham, N. C.
Mr. Algernon Blair, contractor, Montgomery, Ala.
Mr. Bennette E. Geer, manufacturer, Greenville, S. C.
Mr. John A. Law, president and treasurer, the Saxon Mills, Spartanburg, S. C.
Mr. F. M. Jackson, Sr., Birmingham, Ala.
Hon. Blanton Fortson, jurist, Athens, Ga.
Hon. Kemp D. Battle, lawyer, Rocky Mount, N. C.
Hon. Walter Stokes, Jr., lawyer, Nashville, Tenn.
Hon. James H. Hammond, lawyer, Columbia, S. C.
Hon. Devereux Lippitt, lawyer, Atlanta, Ga.
Hon. Helen Douglas Mankin, lawyer, member Georgia House of Representatives, Atlanta, Ga.
Hon. Charles Hall, lawyer, Macon, Ga.
Hon. Douglas Arant, lawyer, Birmingham, Ala.
Hon. E. Smythe Gambrell, lawyer, Atlanta, Ga.
Mr. L. O. Crosby, lumberman, Picayune, Miss.
Mr. Vance J. Alexander, president, Union Planters National Bank & Trust Co., Memphis, Tenn.
Mr. E. R. Malone, president, American National Bank, Pensacola, Fla.
Mr. Oliver J. Sands, banker, chairman finance committee, Church Schools in Diocese of Virginia, Richmond, Va.

CIVIC LEADERS

Mrs. Karl Bishopric, North Carolina Federation of Women's Clubs, Spray, N. C.
Mrs. R. H. Latham, General Federation of Women's Clubs, Asheville, N. C.
Mrs. C. T. Wanzer, Charlotte, N. C.
Mrs. J. U. Reaves, Alabama Federation of Women's Clubs, Mobile, Ala.
Mrs. Laura Smith Ebaugh, American Association of University Women, Greenville, S. C.
Mrs. J. Ralston Wells, Florida Federation of Women's Clubs, Daytona Beach, Fla.

LABOR LEADERS

Mr. John A. Peel, regional director upper south region, Textile Workers' Union of America, Roanoke, Va.
Mr. T. A. Wilson, chairman, North Carolina Industrial Commission, ex-president, North Carolina Federation of Labor, Raleigh, N. C.
Mr. E. L. Sandefur, C. I. O. director for Carolinas, Winston-Salem, N. C.

EDUCATORS

President John Stewart Bryan, College of William and Mary, Williamsburg, Va.
President Julian A. Burruss, Virginia Polytechnic Institute, Blacksburg, Va.
President Francis P. Gaines, Washington and Lee University, Lexington, Va.
President J. N. Hillman, Emory and Henry College, Emory, Va.
President R. B. Montgomery, Lynchburg College, Lynchburg, Va.
President W. T. Sanger, Medical College of Virginia, Richmond, Va.
Dean J. Nelson Frierson, University of South Carolina, Columbia, S. C.
Dean James H. Hewlett, Centre College, Danville, Ky.
Dean W. C. Jackson, Woman's College of the University of North Carolina, Greensboro, N. C.
Dean Charles W. Pipkin, Louisiana State University, Baton Rouge, La.
Dr. Helen G. McDonald, Winthrop College, Rock Hill, S. C.
Dr. James W. Patton, Converse College, Spartanburg, S. C.
Dr. Calvin B. Hoover, economist, Durham, N. C.
Dr. Gilbert T. Rowe, professor of religion, Duke University, Durham, N. C.
Dr. Amry Vandenbosch, professor of international law, University of Kentucky, Lexington, Ky.
Dr. Mary Watters, Mary Baldwin College, Staunton, Va.
Prof. Keener C. Frazer, professor of international law, University of North Carolina, Chapel Hill, N. C.
Dr. E. A. Ziegler, professor of foreign economics and finance, University of Florida, Gainesville, Fla.
Dr. A. F. Harmon, Montevallo, Ala.
Dr. W. W. Pierson, dean, the Graduate School, University of North Carolina, Chapel Hill, N. C.
President Hamilton Holt, Rollins College, Winter Park, Fla.
President John H. Sherman, University of Tampa, Tampa, Fla.
President Dice R. Anderson, Wesleyan College, Macon, Ga.
President George C. Bellingrath, Rabun Gap-Nacoochee School, Rabun Gap, Ga.
President M. L. Brittain, Georgia School of Technology, Atlanta, Ga.
President Rufus E. Clement, Atlanta University, Atlanta, Ga.
President Harvey W. Cox, Emory University, Emory University, Ga.
President Guy H. Wells, Georgia State College for Women, Milledgeville, Ga.
President Pierce Cline, Centenary College of Louisiana, Shreveport, La.
President D. M. Nelson, Mississippi College, Clinton, Miss.
President B. L. Parkinson, Mississippi State College for Women, Columbus, Miss.
President H. G. Bedinger, Flora MacDonald College, Red Springs, N. C.
President Frank P. Graham, University of North Carolina, Chapel Hill, N. C.
President Gideon I. Humphreys, High Point College, High Point, N. C.
President Walter L. Lingle, Davidson College, Davidson, N. C.
President Howard E. Rondthaler, Salem College, Winston Salem, N. C.
President E. W. Sikes, Clemson College, Clemson, S. C.
President Henry N. Snyder, Wofford College, Spartanburg, S. C.
Chancelor O. C. Carmichael, Vanderbilt University, Nashville, Tenn.
President Charles E. Diehl, Southwestern University, Memphis, Tenn.
Dr. Alex Guerry, vice chancelor, the University of the South, Sewanee, Tenn.
President Stewart W. McClelland, Lincoln Memorial University, Harrogate, Tenn.
President Ernest L. Stockton, Cumberland University, Lebanon, Tenn.
President E. A. Sutherland, Madison College, Madison College, Tenn.
Dr. M. D. Collins, State superintendent of schools, Atlanta, Ga.
Dr. A. H. Collins, State superintendent of education, Montgomery, Ala.
Dr. Willis Sutton, superintendent of schools, Atlanta, Ga.
Dr. T. H. Harris, State superintendent of education, Baton Rouge, La.
Dr. Clyde A. Erwin, State superintendent of education, Raleigh, N. C.
Dr. James H. Hope, State superintendent of public instruction, Columbia, S. C.
Dr. Sidney B. Hall, State superintendent of public instruction, Richmond, Va.

NOTE: Name of Mr. C. A. Fink, president, North Carolina Federation of Labor, arrived too late to be listed with other labor leaders.

Air-Mail Pick-up

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ELMER THOMAS

OF OKLAHOMA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, October 10 (legislative day of Wednesday, October 4), 1939

ARTICLE BY FREDERIC J. HASKIN

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, in connection with the convention of postmasters now being held in this city, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD an article appearing in the Boston Traveler by Frederic J. Haskin entitled "Air-Mail Pick-Up to Cover All United States."

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Boston Traveler]

AIR MAIL PICK-UP TO COVER ALL UNITED STATES

(By Frederic J. Haskin)

WASHINGTON, D. C., August 24.—Last June, 12 years almost to the day after Lindbergh's great flight, regular air passenger service was started over the Atlantic to Europe, and the world acclaimed another triumph in the amazing progress of aviation.

Overshadowed by this spectacular achievement, but surpassing it in significance from the standpoint of public service, another great event in aviation was taking place at about the same time.

This was the inauguration of the air mail pick-up service.

The first event brought Europe within 24 hours reach; the second brought the advantages of direct air service, now enjoyed by less than 15 percent of our population, within reach of the smallest community, with the prospect that it eventually will revolutionize the air transportation system.

The comparison offers a simple index to the relative utility value of commercial aviation's two latest innovations.

WORLD INNOVATION

The air mail pick-up service was established by the Post Office Department, under an act of Congress, to test the merit of the system whereby collections and deliveries are made in flight in providing service to communities which are unable to obtain it because of their size, geography, or lack of airport facilities. Nothing like it had ever been tried as a scheduled air operation anywhere in the world.

Two routes were laid out, one extending between Philadelphia and Pittsburgh, and the other between Pittsburgh and Charleston and Huntington, W. Va. There are 58 communities on the 2 lines, none of which, with the exception of the 4 termini, has ever had a direct air service of any kind.

Operator of the routes is All American Aviation, Inc., of Wilmington, Del., the president of which is Richard C. du Pont, internationally known flier and aviation authority, who is also president of the American Soaring Society and once held the American gliding championship.

FEEDER SYSTEM

In addition to providing air-mail facilities for communities which cannot be practically or economically incorporated into the trunk line air system, the pick-up service was started in an effort by the Government to encourage the development of a fast and efficient feeder system for the main lines.

In aviation circles the conviction is widely shared that the development of feeder lines and the extension of the benefits of air transportation to communities that are anxious for the service is essential to the ultimate success of commercial aviation in this country. Neglect of this vital arm of any adequate transportation system is considered by many experts to be the big weakness of aviation's expansion program.

While the system has been in operation only a short time, it has demonstrated the entire feasibility of the pick-up principle.

The high degree of performance achieved by the service in maintaining daily schedules and in the efficient handling of the air mail, although it has been pioneering a new field, has demonstrated its efficacy as a practical and economical adjunct of air transportation.

FERTILE FIELD

What is also important is that the growing volume of mail that is being moved daily over the two lines is proof of what has been long suspected but never verified, that there is a fertile field for the expansion of commercial aviation beyond the country's populous centers.

The success of the operation has been so encouraging that the company has extended the service to include express, and the feasibility of placing the pick-up equipment on passenger planes to be used for collecting mail and express when landings are unnecessary is now being studied in connection with plans to expand the system to every section of the country.

While novel and spectacular, the air pick-up system is a simple and dependable operation. The ground equipment consists of two steel poles 28 feet high, which are set 60 feet apart. A transfer rope, to which the pick-up container is attached, is suspended horizontally between the poles. The pick-up equipment in the plane comprises a winch and shock absorber and a 60-foot steel cable, to which is attached a four-fingered grapple. Deliveries are made with the same kind of containers and ropes that are picked up. The mail itself is transported in small pouches which are placed in the containers. These pouches are labeled as to their destination, and they are sorted en route for delivery.

DELIVERY AND PICK-UP

As the plane approaches the air station for a pick-up and delivery the cable and hook is unreeled through a hatch in the bottom of the ship. The rope bearing the delivery container is attached to a release just over the hatch and is lowered by hand, so that in approaching the station the plane is trailing two lines, the delivery rope and the cable.

The plane comes into the station on a gentle glide much the same as it would in landing. An instant before he reaches the air station, the pilot releases the delivery bag and rope, which fall to the ground. The containers have been especially designed and constructed to protect their contents from this impact. In making the pick-up the plane passes over the masts of the air station at an altitude of 50 to 70 feet. As contact is made, the rope slips down the cable into the grapple. Simultaneously the bag slides to the opposite end on the fitting by which it is attached to the rope. This simple slide-fitting attachment, which absorbs most of the shock of contact, is what really makes it possible to make the pick-up without imposing an excessive strain on the plane. The remainder of the shock is taken up by the olio-strut in the plane, so that the whole contact is barely noticeable. A safety link in the cable protects the plane from accident should the hook become fouled by an obstacle on the ground.

In present operations the pick-up load has been limited to 50 pounds, but in tests loads weighing over 70 pounds have been picked up with the same equipment without placing any undue stress on the plane or giving any indication that the limit has been reached. The normal speed at which pick-ups are made is usually 90 and 110 miles an hour, but they have been successfully made at higher speeds up to 125 miles an hour. Similarly there has been no indication that a limit has been reached on the speed at which pick-up can be made with the present equipment.

Communities fortunate enough to be situated on airways are within 24 hours' reach of one another. Europe is less than 2 days away. The advantage of this service to the business and industry of these communities is incalculable. Communities on the two pick-up routes of All American Aviation now share these advantages as those located on airways, and an adequate feeder system of lines of this type would bring them within reach to every locality in the country.

The air pick-up also has an important relationship to the national defense. As a preparedness measure, the Government is now engaged in training 20,000 reserve pilots a year. The national expansion in aviation that will result from this tremendous program will absorb many of these flyers who desire to make aviation a career, but there are many more who will finish their courses and find no opportunity to utilize their training. A means must be found for keeping these men in the air or much of the value and effectiveness of the program will be destroyed. The best pilots are the active pilots. Spreading the feeder system throughout the country will offer a field of employment to some of these pilots, which will be a definite contribution to the success of the preparedness program.

Letter to California Delegation on Peace

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JERRY VOORHIS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, October 10, 1939

LETTER FROM JOHN ANSON FORD

Mr. VOORHIS of California. Mr. Speaker, because I believe it sounds a note which is greatly needed to be heard in Washington right at this time, and because I am deeply impressed with the fairness of its balanced appraisal of the present international situation, I am asking to have printed in the RECORD the following letter addressed to Members of the California congressional delegation by Los Angeles County Supervisor John Anson Ford:

LOS ANGELES, CALIF., October 9, 1939.

To the Members of the California Congressional Delegation, Washington, D. C.

DEAR FRIENDS: I trust it will not be considered presuming if I attempt to interpret to you something of California's spirit and attitude with respect to the present war in Europe and America's relation to it.

A few nights ago I presided at a mass meeting in the Los Angeles Philharmonic Auditorium, participated in jointly by organizations and citizens representing a very wide range of viewpoint politically, and in the fields of economics and international relations. Admitting the possibility of some individual divergence of opinions, I think I can speak for the very large constituency represented at the Philharmonic. And having been daily in close touch with the thought and feeling of the people of Los Angeles County for the past 5 years because of duties as an elective county official, I believe what I say reflects the overwhelming opinions of this county, which comprises about 43 percent of California's population. To a lesser extent I am speaking for the majority opinion of the balance of the State, having recently conferred with several of the northern leaders and having friends or acquaintances in most of the counties.

That the people of California, along with the rest of the country, want the United States to keep out of the war goes without saying.

Their question is, rather, How shall we keep out of the war honorably and to the benefit, not the detriment, of ourselves and the world at large?

The attitude which you, the California congressional delegation, take can exert a profound influence on the pending decision of Congress and of the American people.

First, I believe the American people are determined not to send another expeditionary force to Europe. If the Allies are hoping to repeat the record of 1917 and thereby tilt the scales of war in their favor, it becomes immediately imperative that Congress disabuse the European diplomatic mind of that hope. Rather, our thoughts and our resources must be dedicated to a constructive, not a destructive, program of lasting peace. Speedy decisions are needed. World changes are taking place almost overnight.

Second, there is strong sentiment in California that Mr. Roosevelt should undertake to mediate peace. Hitler has opened the door. England and France have not closed it. No great moral principle will be violated by such an effort. Let America see to it that neither pride nor war propaganda cause her to let this opportunity pass to help reconstruct the European scene before it is reduced to blood and ashes, for I find many Californians are coming to see that a peaceful world must be a changed world. Above all, the change must be a matter of the mind and heart, not merely governments, and systems and boundaries.

Among the outward changes which carry with them a new material and spiritual outlook on life are the following:

(a) Britain must speedily abandon her imperialistic policies and accelerate the democratic movement toward democratic and autonomous confederation of her constituent dominions.

With the passing of the Empire must pass the imperialism of its financial overlords. While Britain has a homeland in some respects gloriously democratic at heart, her world-wide aims and methods remain imperialistic and antidemocratic.

(b) Present-day Germany must be interpreted in the light of the Treaty of Versailles. The criminal folly of that crushing peace is widely recognized. To say this is neither to approve or condone Hitler. History alone can fully appraise that enigmatic personality and his glaring contradictions.

Whatever may be Germany's grievances against the Treaty of Versailles—and admittedly they are great—Californians are particularly aroused against the racial intolerance and atrocities practiced by Hitler. To Californians as to all the great American majority, the broad principles of democracy and not banishment or extermination of one racial group by another, offer the basis for lasting peace among the peoples of the civilized world.

(c) These very principles of democracy should indicate our own course. Our task is not the extermination by war of the German regime, however much it may be repugnant to us. Instead, having faith in the slow but sure capacity of an intelligent people eventually to purge and cleanse its own house, Californians feel that our task is to stand guard, with our moral economic and military weapons of defense, confidently awaiting that day when the fires of intolerance and the hot glow of egomania shall have burned themselves out.

Third. Californians have learned to think of this European struggle in personal terms, with worthy and unworthy motives mingled in typically human fashion—all magnified to a national scale and clothed in obscuring terms of intrigue, multilateral diplomacy, and propaganda.

Fourth. California is now demanding that in this time of war we prepare for peace. Economics are too much an integral part of international ethics to admit of delay in preparing for the future. Trade, employment, social security, the moral and cultured well-being of the people—all these are in the balance. The United States must positively shape events through Executive and congressional action or events will shape themselves, to the detriment of all.

Some nation or some individual must initiate the effort for peace. And time is of the essence. Judging by the results of the World War, a peace effort earnestly seeking justice with mercy would serve mankind far better than a so-called peace of victory.

America, California believes, is peculiarly fitted by her detachment from the scene of conflict and by reason of her eminent leaders to initiate negotiations for a peace of justice tempered with mercy. Our President and our Secretary of State have given abundant evidence of their practical capacity to perform this difficult world service.

Guided by the disillusioning experience of 1919 and strengthened by 20 years of sober study of international trends, let America attempt again some constructive part in the affairs of our world.

No other people in all history have been so endowed geographically and racially to speak for all mankind. The principles of our Government suggest that we cannot live unto ourselves. To the degree that we truly serve mankind in this hour of need we shall be abundantly rewarded.

The people of our country have always been forward looking. While realities at home and abroad demand that past wrongdoings and shortcomings of ourselves and others must be humbly acknowledged, we in America believe that a better world and a better United States will be vouchsafed if we seek it with humble and contrite hearts. To believe otherwise is to envisage chaos and another Dark Age.

It is not rhetorical verbiage to say that the United States has a great destiny. To fulfill that destiny we must use our deep spiritual power and our vast material strength to bring the brotherhood of man nearer to reality.

This great crisis is America's great opportunity.

JOHN ANSON FORD.

Who in Europe Lives in a Glass House?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. KARL E. MUNDT

OF SOUTH DAKOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, October 10, 1939

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. Speaker, those in this country who because of misguided patriotism or the desire for ill-gotten war profits would involve the United States in the present European conflict, either directly or indirectly, would do well to study the following date book of European treachery which under leave extended to me I am inserting herewith as it appeared in an editorial in my home-town newspaper. An impartial study of these recorded historical facts should convince all pro-Americans that none of the belligerents in Europe come into the court of war with clean hands and that any move on the part of this country to tinker with the blood business abroad must be based on a jungle greed for profits and not a Christian impulse to protect any "innocents abroad."

GERMANY DECEIVES POLAND—ENGLAND DECEIVES PALESTINE

If trickery, and imperialism, and broken promises are the stock in trade of one set of belligerents in Europe, they are also the formulas steadfastly applied by the other set. America rightfully abhors force, intimidation, and subjugation in foreign affairs and believes in the concept of individual liberty and equality of opportunity. America believes in these concepts equally whether it be in the environment of Poland, Czechoslovakia, Palestine, or in India where the British Empire keeps the Hindu race as economic puppets paying tribute to the Crown. In a war to determine which nation should subjugate the peoples of another, surely this country should remain neutral, impartial, dispassionate. "Means short of war" should be studiously avoided in a profit-making zeal to capitalize upon Europe's carnival of death, lest they become "a short cut into war" making us participants in a war in which we have no interest and in which there is no "right side." Such neutrality may not please certain groups of brokers and bankers, may actively displease munitions makers and shipbuilders, but it will gladden the heart of every American mother of every American boy. As the gentleman from Iowa, Congressman HARRINGTON, has so vividly said, "All the American investments abroad are not worth the slaughter of a single American boy—if so, what mother will furnish that boy?"

Those who are today insisting upon placing the imprint of the dollar sign above the flag of American neutrality by asking Congress to repeal the arms embargo and making us the supply agent of wholesale murderers of all countries, including Japan, owe the citizens of America two straightforward answers to two direct questions which they have thus far studiously avoided. I am, personally, still uncommitted for or against any American peace program or neutrality plan, but I insist that the proponents of putting this country into business for blood money quit evading the issue and answer these questions, so that the millions of Americans who, above all else, do not want to send American boys to die and rot on foreign battlefields will have a clear-eyed understanding of the risks involved in the repealist campaign.

TWO QUESTIONS REPEAL ADVOCATES AVOID

The two questions which still remain most eloquently unanswered are:

First. Just how, precisely and definitely, will repeal of the arms embargo help keep America at peace? Permit no smooth-tongued issue dodger to answer this by talk of keeping American ships out of foreign waters, cash and carry, or setting up combat areas in which American citizens are forbidden—both sides of the neutrality controversy agree with the neutrality program except for the arms-embargo repeal. Make somebody answer you directly how repeal of the embargo, how the business of selling war-making machinery will contribute to American peace? That is a fair question and deserves a fair answer.

Second. Can America have its cake and eat it, too? If repeal of the arms embargo is for the purpose—as some Senators and administrative officers now freely say it is—of enabling the United States to help defeat Germany and Russia and not for the purpose of strengthening our insurance against getting into war, then these repealists owe this country an answer to this question, too. Can we help defeat Germany and Russia and still keep out of war? Can we "have our cake and eat it, too"? If we can, the munitions makers and other repeal advocates owe this country a clear-cut statement of how it can be done. They must show what our course will be if Germany and Russia fight back. Senator BORAH raised this question clearly in his masterful address on October 2—thus far no Senator or White House spokesman has replied to it. Americans deserve an answer to this question; it is neither good politics nor good public policy to continue to evade it or to camouflage it by torrents of words about points in the bill on which all men stand agreed.

It is the two questions above which inquire about the peace-preserving or peace-destroying features of repealing the arms embargo. This is no time to evade the issue or deceive the people. Let those who would risk the lives of millions of American boys on the gamble that we can profiteer by selling arms to belligerents, help England and France win the war, contribute to the new map-making of Europe, reorganize the governments of nearly half a billion people, and still have a reliable safeguard against getting into the war, speak up and meet the issues. This is no time for breast beating about good intentions; it is high time, now, to talk frankly about the consequences of making a bad guess about how far we can go in playing with the fire of war and not get burned by its coals.

THE BLACK KETTLES AND THE BLACK POTS OF EUROPE

While waiting for the overdue answers to these questions I urge that all of you read the following "calendar of cupidity" which I have taken from the editorial page of my hometown newspaper, the Madison Daily Leader:

THE BLACK KETTLES AND BLACK POTS OF EUROPE

Whatever attitude the United States takes toward the European war, all patriotic people are agreed that that attitude must be dictated only by what seems best for the United States.

Those who seek a more or less active participation in the war on the side of the British and French base their view on the feeling that if the Germans beat them the world will be uncomfortable and unsafe for American democracy.

Those who seek to insure that the United States take no part in the war base their view on the feeling that American democracy is best served by preserving its strength, and its essence by keeping as clear as possible of the whole thing.

Either view sounds selfish. But what else is justified by the record of both sides since the World War? The Miami Daily News recently assembled the damning record of all the warring powers since 1919. By permission we reproduce that record:

GERMANY

Spent from 1919 to 1933 complaining against the Treaty of Versailles, and trying to evade many of its provisions.
Spent from 1933 to 1939 tearing up the Treaty of Versailles.
Decreed military conscription, 1935.
Occupied the Rhineland in violation of the Locarno Treaty, 1936.
Invaded and annexed Austria, 1938.
Sliced off a portion of Czechoslovakia, 1938.
Invaded and annexed the remainder of Czechoslovakia, 1939.
Took Memel from Lithuania by extortion, 1939.
Started, according to the best information available at present, a new world war, 1939.

POLAND

Seized a large part of Upper Silesia from the League of Nations, in defiance of the result of a plebiscite, 1921.
Seized Wilno, capital of Lithuania, 1924.
Mistreated German and Ukrainian minorities, 1919–39.
Seized Teschen area from prostrate Czechoslovakia, 1938.

FRANCE

Blocked every effort to induce the victorious powers to disarm, as promised in the Treaty of Versailles, 1919 to 1933.
Carried on economic war upon prostrate Germany, 1919–29.
Dominated the League of Nations, which put seal of approval upon Polish seizures of Silesia in 1921 and Wilno in 1924.
Occupied the Ruhr Valley of Germany on thin reparations pretext, 1923, with Prime Minister Poincaire privately expressing hope the Germans would not pay so France could annex the valley.
Unofficially supported Japanese invasion of Manchuria until realizing her stand was undermining her own insistance upon sanctity of the Versailles Treaty, 1931.
Blocked effective sanctions against Italy when latter invaded Ethiopia, 1935.
Sacrificed Czechoslovakia to appeasement policy, 1938.
Violated Syrian mandate by letting Turks take district of Hatay in deal for Anglo-Franco-Turkish alliance, 1939.
Defaulted on war debts to United States up to and including the present time.

ENGLAND

Carried on intermittent bombing of tribes on northwest frontier of India, 1920–39.
Supported Japan against United States at time of Manchurian invasion, 1931.
Failed to deal effectively with Italian aggression in Ethiopia, 1935.
Sacrificed Czechoslovakia to appeasement policy, 1938.
Broke Balfour promise of a Jewish homeland in Palestine, 1938–39.
Defaulted on war debts to United States up to and including the present time.

The Businessman Looks at Crime

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FRED L. CRAWFORD

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, October 10, 1939

AN EDITORIAL BY HON. FRED L. CRAWFORD

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Speaker, in accordance with permission given me by the House under unanimous consent, I submit the following editorial prepared by me and appearing currently in one of the nationally known monthly magazines of the Macfadden group:

THE BUSINESSMAN LOOKS AT CRIME

Were it physically and mentally possible for an American businessman operating his store on Main Street in Anytown, U. S. A., to peer into the cipher-looking end of a blue-steel revolver every 9 minutes by command of a hold-up man, hear burglars smash in the back door of his store every 2 minutes, and at the same time be able to answer the phone 37 times a day to receive the sorrowful news that 37 of his friends had been murdered, he would at the end of the day drop to his knees and pray Almighty God to show him his duty in suppressing lawlessness.

Yet that in part is the true story of what is happening to the businessmen of America, collectively, day in and day out throughout the year. But that isn't half the story. A serious crime cannot be committed every 22 seconds in this great Nation without striking across the threshold of the businessman or casting a shadow over his home hearth. Businessmen of America cannot escape being included in the victims of the 3,879 serious crimes that are committed daily in the United States.

As businessmen we sweat over our balance sheets and operating statements, but we rarely pause to figure in the cost of crime, which has been conservatively estimated at an annual levy of $120 upon every man, woman, and child. It does not appear in the reports of the United States Treasury, yet the annual bill inflicted upon the American people by the vultures of vice and violence is $15,000,000,000.

The businessman must come to look upon his local law-enforcing agencies with the same feeling of partnership as he does his board of commerce or commercial club in the business field, his lodge or club in the social field, and his church in the spiritual field. The businessman must look at crime, unpleasant though the task may be. In its cycle of an attack every 22 seconds, crime will eventually pull his name from the box. Crime looks at the businessman. It is time the businessman looked at crime.

The average citizen is all too resigned to leaving the job of looking after crime to the local police department or the sheriff's department. He complains about them and too frequently feels that any new equipment they may need in coping with modern Mephistopheles is only a luxury that will add to the tax burden of the property owners. In other words, "it can't happen here," and "if it does, then we'll do something about it."

The businessman spends an hour or more a week in conference with his board of commerce devising ways and means of inducing new industry to move into town to provide new pay rolls and relieve unemployment; or to widen the advertising campaign to enlarge the customer area from which the home town draws. The same businessman joins heartily in the campaign to beautify the town with parks and boulevards. Yet the ugly smear of crime in one section or another of his city is to him merely another item in the daily paper. It is forgotten by nightfall unless the offense has been sufficiently fiendish to cause a bad dream or two, but even then, it is dismissed with the dawn of another day.

What can the businessman do?

It would be simple to say that the way to stop crime is to stop producing criminals, yet in saying that we strike at the very heart of the problem. One only need to refer to the tabulation of uniform crime reports for the year 1938 to learn that 53 percent of the arrests made during 1938 were of persons less than 30 years old, and that 18.8 percent were less than 21 years of age. Another sad slant on the youthfulness of the annual criminal round-up are the figures showing that during the last year in crimes against property—robbery, burglary, larcency, auto theft, etc.—the toll was 31.5 percent of youngsters under the age of 21. Likewise, appalling are the figures showing that 12 percent of our murderers, 24 percent of our rapists, and 28 percent of our robbers are under 21.

It is in every sense a community problem and its phases of youthful delinquency can lead to any or every home in that community. The fact is, 30,000,000 American homes hold the solution of the crime problem of the generation. Our insurance against crime tomorrow is the premium paid today in the form of proper examples set before our youth. In shrinking responsibility we may innocently become an accessory before a crime.

If it is good business to encourage home beautification, fire prevention, and other types of campaigns, it is good business to promote a year-around campaign for the juveniles that will afford ample opportunities for exhaustion of the pent-up energy of youth in gainful, helpful, and healthful ways.

That forceful figure for law and order and arch enemy of the underworld with its fledglings of sooty down—a man for whom I have the highest regard, J. Edgar Hoover, Director of the Federal Bureau of Investigation, recently hit the crux of this phase when he said:

"The functioning of youth movements has an inestimably beneficial effect upon the welfare of the juvenile members of our communities, and any work which improves the moral outlook and character of younger members of society justifies itself in the dividends which posterity will receive."

While looking at crime, the businessman must also focus his glasses on politics. He must become interested in politics. There has been no greater stumbling block in the path of citizens bent on cleaning up ugly criminal situations than corrupt criminal machines, with one hand in the pocket of the taxpayers and the other pawing tribute out of the loot of the criminal. Every businessman's worthy endeavor should be to courageously cast into the abyss every vestige of corrupt political influence associated with the administration of criminal justice. Corruption in politics has been a millstone about the neck of too many sincere law-enforcement officers. Their hands have been tied while the underworld bloated itself with plunder pilfered under the protecting wing of venal officeholders, too often likewise waxing fat on the blood money spewing from their pipe line into the subterranean regions of lawlessness.

No businessman would tolerate such a system among his own employees. Why does he tolerate it and its consequent gloomy record of lawlessness among the employees on the public pay rolls? The only sound answer for the businessman who is looking at crime with a view of reducing its magnitude is to exercise his right as a citizen every election day by electing and encouraging the election of men to public office who are fearless, whose past records cannot be questioned, and who owe no allegiance and have no alliance with the denizens of the underworld. Having elected such public servants, the businessman must continue vigilant that honest government shall prevail.

The businessman should encourage the divorcement of law-enforcing agencies from our system of politics. I am informed in one city they have had 31 chiefs of police in 63 years. That is an average of a new chief every 24 months. The reason—politics. Police administration must not be changed at each shift of the political wind if an effective attack is to be made upon crime.

I can point with pride to two outstanding successes wherein an isolation policy for law-enforcement agencies has reaped rich reward to the taxpayers. I refer first, because of its national scope, to the Federal Bureau of Investigation. For the past 14 years this strong arm of the United States Department of Justice has functioned under several administrations but totally free from all political influence. Consequently, this agency, so ably directed by Mr. Hoover, is internationally famous and has the respect of every law-abiding citizen of the United States. Its long record, starting with the wiping out of gangsterism, which had the Nation on edge a few years ago, down through the crushing of the kidnap racket and into its present-day greatly enlarged realm of enforcement of Federal laws, stands as a glowing tribute to those American citizens who have tirelessly contended that crime would be whipped if hungry politicians kept their fingers out of the operations.

Likewise, high in this respect, stands another police organization upon which the people of the Commonwealth have hung the "no trespassing" sign. I refer to the Michigan State police, who have gained national recognition for efficiently combating crime without the aid of political machines. Its chief, Oscar G. Olander, has likewise served through alternating administrations of political parties of conflicting views.

With a police department fortified against the shifting political sands and built around a framework impregnable to political handicraft, the businessman may now concentrate his attention upon the building of well-trained unit of officers mentally and physically equipped to match wisdom and sinew against the cunning and brawn of the crook.

In the past, organized training and instruction for police officers has been confined to large metropolitan areas. On smaller forces officers were compelled to rely upon their own resourcefulness and their knowledge gained only through years of experience.

The twentieth century underworld offspring was quick to grasp the facilities of the fast automobile, machine gun, radio, and other modern developments as tools of his trade. Legislative bodies—local, State, and National—were slower to make these available to their agents. But with the acquisition of these facilities came the realization that organized, trained, law-enforcement officers are absolutely essential to any present-day police unit.

Here again Mr. Businessman can make his contribution by encouraging locally a police-training unit. The police-training movement is still in its infancy, but the Federal Bureau of Investigation has already demonstrated its effectiveness through the work done by the Federal Bureau of Investigation National Police Academy.

Although this training work is yet in its formative stages, the F. B. I., some State and local departments, the Office of Education of the Department of Interior, the American Municipal Association, certain colleges, and a number of professional agencies have cooperated in the development of training for police service.

Probably the most ideal training system is that of the Federal Bureau of Investigation National Police Academy, headed by Director Hoover. Law-enforcement officers from all over the United States, recommended by local officials, have filed applications with the F. B. I. and from these applications a limited number are selected every 3 months for an intensive course of 12 weeks' training at the F. B. I. school in Washington. The student receives practically all of the training given a G–man. In return for this training at the expense of the Federal Government (except for room, meals, and traveling expenses) the local government agrees to establish some form of a training school with their F. B. I. graduated officer as the instructor. Training gained at the National Police Academy is in this manner passed along to other members of the local department. The Federal Bureau of Investigation is to be highly commended for affording this training to key police officers throughout the Nation.

Many State-police units have a similar intensive course for their own rookie officers, but usually this training is not available to the local police and sheriffs' units.

An example of what colleges can do was demonstrated in Michigan recently when the Michigan State College established a police-administration class. Fifteen men graduated this summer, having completed a 5-year course consisting of 3½ years' academic work, with the remaining period in actual practice at the State police barracks. Already more than half of the "college cops" have entered positions with various police departments.

Adequate training of officers is due to receive more and more attention, and the businessman will do well to be an exponent of a local police-training course, irrespective of how small a beginning.

Combating the menace of lawlessness is by no means a hopeless task if our citizens will arise to the responsibility before them. Forces of decency have sufficient facilities if courageous men can be found to use them. As one of the heaviest losers to crime in the past, the American businessman must look crime squarely in the face and determine that there shall be no compromise with the forces of evil.

The American businessman, as a leader in his community, must enlist the mind and the heart of the citizenry in this battle against crime. He must lead the attack on juvenile delinquency; destroy crime's alliance with politics; and help establish a corps of well-trained, efficient officers thoroughly prepared to outwit the enemies of society and expose crooked officeholders. Irrespective of national economic conditions, business can never realize the full benefits of prosperity until this widespread lawlessness is curbed.

The American businessman has this important job to do—and he is going to do it.

Keep America Out of War—Amend the Present Neutrality Act

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOSEPH R. BRYSON

OF SOUTH CAROLINA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, October 9, 1939

Mr. BRYSON. Mr. Speaker, according to the latest press dispatches from London, Paris, and Berlin, the war in Europe is now at a standstill. Hostilities have been temporarily suspended, we are told, while the great nations of Europe are making what appears to be a final search for peace.

In view of the many admitted obstacles to a peaceful settlement of the present European dispute our grim hope for peace at this time might seem a futile one. Nevertheless, let us hope that peace will come presently by way of compromise instead of later by way of surrender, which in the final analysis may spell disaster for all nations concerned. We pray that this war may be ended now; that peace may come before it is too late to bring order out of the chaos of a strife-torn Europe.

OUR GREATEST RESPONSIBILITY

Whether it be peace or war that lies over the horizon for Europe, we in America must not forget that our first and greatest responsibility is to our own country and to our children who shall inherit it after us. We must not at any time relax our efforts nor soften our determination to keep America out of war. By keeping America out of war we shall be doing something infinitely great, not only for ourselves and our posterity, but also for Europe and the world at large.

In an address which I delivered at Spartanburg, S. C., shortly before my return to Washington, I remarked:

> In America let us keep the issue clear. We should continue to be concerned with only one thing—and that is to keep America out of war. * * * But let us lose no time in deciding upon a course of action which will keep us out of war today, tomorrow, a year from now, 2 years from now, or however long the struggle in Europe continues.

And I wish here today to again express the thought that we must lose no time in deciding upon a course of action which will keep us out of war. As I glance back upon the history of events that carried us into the last war, I can see where we left our peace objectives unguarded, where we left our wish to stay out of war unprotected, because we failed to establish a firm and practical policy at the outset of the war.

PRACTICAL PLAN

At the outbreak of that war we were intent upon peace, as we are intent upon peace today. Yes; it was our wish then, as it is our wish now, to keep America out of war, but we failed to look ahead; we failed to plot the inevitable course of events; we failed to take cognizance of the facts and face them as facts. Mainly, we wished for peace, and wished for it from the bottom of our hearts, but we lost as we failed to provide measures of protection for our peaceful intentions. America was then without any definite, clear-cut international policy, and, although we did not realize it at the time, we were drifting—drifting toward our eventual entry into the war.

My support of the cash-and carry plan, which the President has recommended to Congress, is based on the sincere belief that it is a sane, practical plan which will do much to keep us from drifting into war.

Repeal of the arms embargo section of the present Neutrality Act, selling to all belligerent nations for cash and carry, is a highly practical and realistic treatment of our desire to keep America out of war. I term the proposed cash-and-carry plan a practical and realistic treatment of our desire to keep America out of war for these two fundamental reasons:

First. It will serve to hasten the end of the present struggle.

Second. It will place America in the position of aiding England and France instead of Germany, as is now the case.

HELP END WAR

We know, first and foremost, that as long as there is war in Europe we shall be subjected to the danger and possibility of involvement. The danger and possibility of our being drawn into war will not disappear until Europe is at peace again.

Therefore, the American people are extremely anxious to see the war in Europe brought to a close at the earliest possible moment so that the danger of our being drawn into the conflict might disappear at the earliest possible moment. That the cash-and-carry plan will serve to hasten the end of the present struggle is the most logical conclusion to be reached upon analysis of the present European situation.

First, England announced some time ago that she would not cease fighting until Hitler is defeated and his aggression halted, and, unless the basis for an honorable peace can be found in Europe at this time, England will certainly continue her fight against Hitler. England has also declared that she is prepared to fight for 7 or 8 years if necessary. Hitler has declared for Germany practically the same thing, but his contentions are less susceptible of proof. However, the important thing for us to realize here is that the cash-and-carry plan would make available to England and France airships, and so forth, with which to bring the war to a speedier conclusion.

Of course, Germany, under the cash-and-carry plan, would be permitted to send whatever ships she could to our shores and purchase these same materials, the question of who obtained the goods being left up to the warring nations, not America. But it is believed that England, mistress of the sea that she is, will be able to transport sufficient materials to bolster up the weak spots in her war machine.

One of the weakest spots in the English and French fighting forces is in the air. The airships of Germany greatly outnumber those of England and France, but we have in America the productive capacity to turn out several thousand planes a month, which would in a reasonable length of time enable England and France to match the air strength of Germany.

PRESENT ACT AIDS GERMANY

Since under the present Neutrality Act Germany is being aided, and since by repealing the arms-embargo section of the present Neutrality Act England and France, instead of Germany, would be aided, we simply have to decide whether it will be best for us in the long run to, on the one hand, aid Germany, or, on the other hand, aid England and France. This time let us be objective and practical in our conduct of foreign affairs by making our choice as realists, not as wishful thinkers and impractical idealists. The plain, inescapable fact is that we have much less to fear from an English-French victory than a German victory. Aggression feeds on aggression, and let us do nothing to help the aggressor nation triumph in the present struggle.

AVOID DRIFTING INTO WAR

One of the strongest and most salient features of the cash-and-carry plan recommended by the President is that it forbids the use of American ships in trade with the belligerents. This is a much-needed safeguard against our involvement in war. We know that what did most to draw us into the last war was the sinking of American ships and the loss of American lives on the high seas. We must remove the danger of a recurrence of "incidents" which might again inflame public sentiment and lead us down the road to war. Keeping public sentiment strongly against our going into war is, after all, the thing which will do most to actually keep us out of war. The American people today are unanimously opposed to our entering war, and as long as this opposition to our participation in war is maintained we shall remain at peace. This is a certainty.

Therefore, what is most important is that we at this session of Congress lay the foundation for a firm, clear-cut international policy which will keep us from again drifting into war as we did in 1917. By amending the present Neutrality Act and establishing the cash-and-carry plan we shall lay that foundation for a sane and practical policy which will best serve to keep America out of war.

The Share of the Domestic Pork Market Supplied by the American Pork Producer

---

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WADE H. KITCHENS

OF ARKANSAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, October 10, 1939

STATEMENT BY THE AGRICULTURAL ADJUSTMENT ADMINISTRATION

Mr. KITCHENS. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include the following statement issued by the Agricultural Adjustment Administration:

> In the case of pork, as with practically all United States farm products, it is the volume of exports rather than the volume of imports that really concerns the American farmer. The American farmer has the American pork market; what he needs is an export outlet for his surplus hog products, rather than additional protection from foreign imports.

Up until 1936, pork imports into this country were so small as to be only a fraction of 1 percent of our total domestic production. During the last 3 years, high pork prices, resulting chiefly from drought liquidation of herds, have attracted slightly increased importations. During these 3 years pork imports have amounted to 1 percent of our total domestic production. In other words, the American farmer has at least 99 percent of the American pork market. He also has some share in the pork and lard market of foreign countries.

The largest proportion of pork imports into this country at all times is the result of continued demand for such luxury products as Polish canned hams.

The share of the domestic pork market supplied by the American producer, excluding lard, calendar years 1924–38

Year	Pork production	Imports[1]					Percent imports are of production[4]
		Hams, shoulders, and bacon[2]	Pork, fresh or frozen[2]	Pork, salted, pickled, and other[2]	Live hogs in terms of pork equivalent[3]	Total, pork
	Pounds	Pounds	Pounds	Pounds	Pounds	Pounds
1924	9,149,000,000	757,000	5,684,000	342,000	3,730,000	10,513,000	----------
1925	8,128,000,000	1,157,000	7,235,000	466,000	9,637,000	18,495,000	----------
1926	7,966,000,000	1,769,000	9,156,000	1,347,000	9,863,000	22,135,000	----------
1927	8,430,000,000	3,972,000	14,511,000	3,072,000	19,739,000	41,294,000	----------
1928	9,041,000,000	2,537,000	7,767,000	2,526,000	1,993,000	14,823,000	----------
1929	8,833,000,000	2,084,000	4,124,000	2,314,000	344,000	8,866,000	----------
1930	8,479,000,000	1,980,000	1,093,000	1,583,000	14,000	4,670,000	----------
1931	8,734,000,000	1,979,000	754,000	1,234,000	96,000	4,063,000	----------
1932	8,915,000,000	3,015,000	1,658,000	1,075,000	19,000	5,767,000	----------
1933	9,124,000,000	1,672,000	539,000	703,000	4,000	2,918,000	----------
1934	8,342,000,000	969,000	182,000	495,000	4,000	1,650,000	----------
1935	5,953,000,000	5,297,000	3,923,000	1,274,000	1,878,000	12,372,000	----------
1936	7,535,000,000	26,088,000	12,945,000	2,810,000	9,595,000	51,438,000	1
1937	6,886,000,000	47,422,000	20,877,000	6,532,000	9,105,000	83,936,000	1
1938[5]	7,563,000,000	44,347,000	4,287,000	3,748,000	31,000	52,413,000	1

[1] Imports for consumption.
[2] Actual weight basis.
[3] Converted at 55 percent of live weight.
[4] Blanks indicate less than 1 percent.
[5] Preliminary.

The National Debt

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JAMES SECCOMBE
OF OHIO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, October 10, 1939

ADDRESS BY HON. STEPHEN BOLLES, OF WISCONSIN, SEPTEMBER 7, 1939

Mr. SECCOMBE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include the following address to the Wisconsin Bankers' Association by the Honorable STEPHEN BOLLES, Member of Congress from the First District of Wisconsin, September 7, 1939:

Mr. Chairman, members of Wisconsin Bankers' Association, I hope no one here has remained to hear me as an expert on banking. Over a long period of years as a newspaperman I knew banks only as institutions which had the best, highest, most profoundly ornate buildings in the city. I remember many years ago that "Golden Rule" Jones, who had been elected mayor of Toledo, said the only use he had for banks was an overdraft. I learned later when I expanded a little in what we modernistically term "our economic life" that the first attribute of a banker and a most necessary part of his personal equipment was the ability to keep a poker face and say "no." This lesson in human architecture has been of great value in Congress, since I have voted "no" on so many of the wildly extravagant appropriations of billions of dollars.

I am not so sure that what I would have said a week ago I can say now. We are plunged into a cloud of darkness and we are looking for light in the east. A war-torn Europe demands new resolvements in attitudes. We cannot say that the financial structure of yesterday is that of today. Congress has voted a continuation of the President's power to alter the weight of the dollar and to continue the $2,000,000,000 stabilization fund. I voted "no" on this and am glad now in the international situation that I did so.

We have been going along in the United States for almost 7 years doing revolutionary things. We have piled up a debt into astronomical figures. We have appropriated, in the first session of the Seventy-sixth Congress, $13,000,000,000 which will have to be paid either out of tax revenues or by borrowing, and which made a deficit exceeding $3,000,000,000 for 1940. In these 7 years we have violated and voided every law of economics. We have slapped facts in the face. We have spent fifty billions in recovery without recovery. We have tried schemes dead from the days of Diocletion; withered, as would be the bullrushes around Moses when Pharaoh's daughter found him. We have placed on the Federal statute books more regulatory laws than all the dictators in Europe ever did and put the foot of the Government in the door of business to get an entrance so that there may be sold the phony financial plans of an experimental sales crew from the guinea-pig laboratory of an irresponsible collection of misguided zealots.

This is the hour when we should promulgate a new declaration of independence. It is time for freedom from legislative shackles and Executive dictatorship. We should not be carried away by fictitious profits from war. We will have to pay double for them later. Nor should we forget in the hysteria of war that we have still a job to do in order that freedom in this Republic may again be established. We have now the world's greatest bureaucratic government, the greatest debt, the greatest army of unemployed, a persistent downward trend of farm income. As most of you here are from cities, villages, and towns dependent in greater part on farm prosperity and income, I may say that this question involves us all.

I need not go into a discussion of national farm policy as reflected by laws and their administration. We have to admit that all these experiments, so far as stable recovery is concerned, have been failures. This condition has its reflection in every bank. In a search for causes of these abnormal conditions we must ultimately arrive at two destinations—continuous deficits and growing public debt. Debt follows deficit, and the penalty is the unprecedented volume of taxation now imposed by Federal, State, and local governments. Many of these taxes have reached or passed their maximum of productivity under the inexorable law of diminishing returns.

We may thus see that public debt and its twin brother, taxation, are the most important items the American Nation confronts. All other questions are submerged in these two—debt and taxation. It is perfectly clear to everybody that increase of expenditures, not the lack of revenues, has been the cause of constantly recurring deficits. It was a shocking exhibition of Government inefficiency when Congress was asked to vote for an increase of the debt limit. That was defeated, thanks to the support of many on both sides of the House. Our debt now exceeds $40,000,000,000. This does not include the contingent liability of some $5,000,000,000 due to obligations issued by various Government agencies and guaranteed by the Government. There is also the contingent liability—a potential liability—coming from some millions of dollars in housing programs. There are some offsets to this in the Treasury balance and resources of a few Government corporations and credit agencies. The book value of these items amounts to some $5,000,000,000.

When we come to consider this national debt we must realize that the total value of all farm lands, including farm equipment, buildings, and improvements, is estimated to be about $30,000,000,000, and that the gross assets of all manufacturing corporations in the metal and metal-products industry, which also includes steel, with the added corporations making food products or chemicals, are less than $40,000,000,000, with a net worth of such corporations much less. Then we can realize the immensity of this debt and what it means as a retardant to any recovery. There must follow an unprecedented volume of taxation already imposed on all industry, with the hark back into every home in the land. A group of industrial leaders some few months ago stated that "the more burdens heaped upon private enterprise, the fewer persons it can employ. The fewer it employs, the heavier it will be taxed to support the rest. Heavier taxes can produce a chronic state of depression.

There was no lack of knowledge on the part of the Members of the present Congress, both in the majority and minority groups, of the consequences of appropriating billions of dollars and still adding to both deficit and debt. There are those in Congress who definitely advocate inflation and believe that the solution of the debt and deficit both lies in the issuing of currency without let or hindrance, so as to supply the Treasury with cash. This, of course, is inflation, and strange to say, there are a number of earnest advocates of this policy. They are, with one or two exceptions, confined to the majority side of the House. I may say to you that in the desperation of finances, Government activities, and carrying out the programs for the bureaucratic organization, we are in great danger of such an inflationatory movement well supported in the next session of Congress. This is not called money inflation but credit inflation. This is the hovering specter of disturbance which we must look at and realize fully.

That such inflation under whatever name it may come will impair the credit of the United States Government is agreed upon by all of us. The debt heretofore has not been financed first of all from the savings of the people, but because the Government has placed its I O U's in the banks and then receiving credit on which it draws. The result is an abnormally expanded credit base which, unless handled with greatest care, can become unmanageable.

The safety of every bank deposit, activity in industrial enterprises, value of agricultural products, opportunity for employment, security of insurance policies all depend upon the unimpaired credit of the United States Government. That credit affects the fundamental human values. The banks own a little over 50 percent of the total direct and interest-bearing obligations. These are the keystone of the credit structure. Their holdings represent about 25 percent of their total assets and around 60 percent of total investments. Therefore I say to you, with all emphasis, that we must put every ounce of energy of all those who will be affected directly and indirectly into this preservation of our credit and to fight to the very end against any step toward inflation. Any drop in the prices of these obligations would not only disturb the financial structure of the country, but have serious repercussions on the greater mass of our people.

We may thus clearly see the interrelation between stability of Government credit, maintaining the public debt at its present level or less, the absolute necessity of reducing deficits by smaller appropriations, and arriving at a tax base which will not diminish the revenues by increasing the rates. I believe the public is becoming conscious of this great burden of debt. We have not overcome the deficits. Congress, in spite of the militant minority, continually increased the Federal debt and the appropriations in the last session. The fact is clear as daylight that the control of this situation rests in the hands of Congress and it behooves everyone, regardless of partisanship, to impress upon every person who is in Congress the necessity to guard against the present policy of expanding deficits. There is no royal road to this end. There seems to be a lack of any congressional plan to end these recurring deficits and the absence of any procedure to effectuate a plan even to gradually return to a balanced Budget.

We were fortunate in the last session not to have any bank legislation of a disturbing nature. I may say that the banking and currency committee had before it some twoscore bills with all sorts of haywire schemes, and they have so far died within the committee walls. There is a growing feeling in this Seventy-sixth Congress that it should rebel against administrative and bureaucratic pressure. There is enough pressure from outside without having it come from within. One must be actually in Congress to understand the power of this group pressure. Once upon a time a Member of Congress was supposed to have a liberty of thought and to act and speak and vote his own convictions after careful study of important questions. Now he is torn by conflicting emotions as one antagonistic group after another dangles before him a dark picture of his future if he does not vote the way the group suggests. These groups take no consideration of debt or deficit. They enter into no realm of economics. All they want is what they want, regardless of what happens afterwards. I do not suppose that we can rid ourselves of these pressure groups. We have over 200 of such organizations working in Washington. It costs thousands of dollars to feed, clothe, and pay salaries to this group of lobbyists. They are sentinels more for their groups than they are for active lobbying. It is certainly time to declare some freedom of action and to return to the understanding of fundamentals in the operation of government. Way back in 1776 Adam Smith, who was the first writer on economics, a man of erudition and a great teacher, at a time when understanding of the value of capital and free movement of peoples was beginning to impress itself upon our civilization, wrote this:

"To prohibit a great people, however, from making all that they can of every part of their own produce, or from employing their stock and industry in the way that they judge most advantageous to themselves, is a manifest violation of the most sacred rights of mankind."

Let me quote from the Majesty of Calmness, by Dr. William George Jordan, which seems to be apropos at this particular time in our history:

"The nation that is strongest is the one that is most self-reliant, the one that contains within its boundaries all that its people need. If, with its ports all blockaded it has not within itself the necessities of life and the elements of its continual progress, then it is weak, held by the enemy, and it is but a question of time till it must surrender. Its independence is in proportion to its self-reliance, to its power to sustain itself from within."

It is time that we return to freedom. The road back is beset with difficulty. No egg has ever been unscrambled. What needs to be done cannot be done in a few moments, a few weeks, many months, many years, and perhaps several decades. When we contemplate the fact that our deficits reached $23,000,000,000 in 6 years and that we have spent all of the revenues amounting to even a greater sum, we may realize that we have spent in these years on a planned economy and in experiments for recovery $50,000,000,000 it is time for us to pause and examine the shipwreck. After a great storm at sea over many days, with mountainous waves that pound the ship, tear away its smokestacks and its deck boats, batter it almost into helplessness, the good captain heaves to when he reaches a place of calm to take toll of the damage. We have been passing through such a storm for 6 years or more.

Senator KING, of Utah, a leading member of the majority party, speaking at the close of the Senate session, declared, "The Government may not continue this spending policy without inviting disaster. The spendthrift, whether it be individual, corporation, or government, must ultimately face the day of reckoning. Loose fiscal policies have undermined and destroyed governments of the past. We should not pursue policies which must inevitably result in impairing the financial integrity of the Government."

Senator MCCARRAN, of Nevada, in that same debate spoke of a personal interview with Trotsky, who had not then been exiled from Russia, in which the Soviet leader said that he predicted the day would come when bureaucracy would become so powerful in the United States that it would control the Government, influence its policies, and shape its legislation. The Senator pursued the subject by saying that there were more than a million Federal employees and that "bureaucracy has an insatiable appetite; it reaches out for more power and encroaches upon personal rights and liberties."

Let me quote to you also from the words of Edmund Burke, who was a great friend of the Colonies:

"The path to happiness for nations and men does not lie in sweeping innovations; always it lies in doing justice to the past, in welcoming what it has achieved as 'an entailed inheritance' and even in the hour of reform, in carrying it through in a spirit of gratitude and reverence toward existing institutions, which are not to be remade by the energies of a single generation of radical reformers, however ardent their passion for human happiness may be."

It is only by taking the road to freedom, going back to the principles which are fundamental in the American Government, destroying the bureaucratic domination, and calling a halt upon flights into the stratosphere of expenditure that we may return to a confidence in the future.

Income and outgo statement of the Federal Government, July 1 to July 31, 1939

The Government collected		$307,845,807.53
The Government spent		807,324,993.63
Leaving a gross deficit of		499,479,186.10
To arrive at the net deficit to be met by borrowing or by draft on general fund:
Subtract:
Statutory debt retirements	$134,250.00
Add:
Deficit in trust funds, gold increment, silver seigniorage, and Government checking accounts	113,306,162.29
Net addition to the gross deficit		113,171,912.29
Net deficit		612,651,098.39
Decrease in general-fund balance		390,918,687.03
Increase in public debt		221,732,411.36
Debt, July 31, 1939		40,661,264,822.47
Pre-war debt, March 31, 1917		1,282,044,346.28
First post-war peak, August 31, 1919		26,596,701,648.01
Lowest post-war debt, December 31, 1930		16,026,087,087.07
Increase since December 31, 1930		24,635,177,735.40

This summary is compiled from United States daily Treasury statements to show the gross deficit, the net deficit, and the drafts on the general fund to finance the deficit.

America

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CHARLES HAWKS, JR.

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, October 10, 1939

EDITORIAL FROM THE SATURDAY EVENING POST OF OCTOBER 7, 1939

Mr. HAWKS. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I desire to include therein an editorial appearing in the October 7 issue of The Saturday Evening Post entitled "America."

This editorial is, in my opinion, not only the most powerful but also the most sensible pro-American argument I have read or listened to, and I am putting it in the RECORD hoping that every Member of the Congress and many other American citizens will have the opportunity to read and digest its clear statement of fact regarding Europe's war.

The editorial follows:

[From the Saturday Evening Post of October 7, 1939]

AMERICA

Destiny has an errand here and we are about to keep an appointment with her. We do not know for sure what the business is. We do know it is important and that it behooves us now to steady our minds and think for ourselves.

There is an omen.

The event of incomparable human significance, one to which war itself is subordinate, is that the star of world supremacy has passed from the Old to the New World. To say that this happened during the World War, or that the World War caused it to happen, is not so. That star is the sign of ultimate power, and the power was here. In the World War for the first time, like a giant in swaddling clothes, we put it forth, and it was astounding, not to others only but to ourselves. We were not entirely unaware of it, but never before had we exerted it, and never had we considered either the historical meaning or the consequences of possessing it. Suddenly, therefore—and no one prepared for it—the world's center of political gravity shifted from one continent to another—that is to say, from Europe to America.

The star that now stands in our sky has no constancy. That is why we call it an omen. We are able to chart its travels during at least 4,000 years. For nearly a thousand years—and that was its longest vigil—it stood in the sky of Egypt. Then it passed to the Assyrians, from the Assyrians to the Babylonians, and back again to the Assyrians. For 500 years it was divided between the Greeks and the Persians. After that it took its place in the Roman sky and tarried there a while. During five centuries the world was a Roman world and peace was the Roman peace. Then for nearly 1,500 years it was a vagabond star, appearing and disappearing in a most unpredictable manner. Twice it rose over the Byzantine Empire and twice over the Tartars, Mongolians, and Huns. It passed to the Holy Roman Empire, which was wrecked by the Reformation. It went from there to the Ottoman Turks, and then for two centuries it was lost. That was a time of human chaos. This period of 1,500 years during which the star had a vagabond existence includes the Dark and Middle Ages.

In 1700 it was seen rising again, or might have been seen dimly, on the horizon of England. Napoleon tried to conquer it and failed. England became the British Empire, assumed supremacy in the world, and kept a British peace. During the British peace there were many wars, of course, just as there were during the long Roman peace, but the preferred condition was one of peace and economic order, and Great Britain was its defender.

To the rise of American power Europe was politically purblind. As a physical phenomenon it was astonishing and measurable; its further meanings were never considered. The thought of the star of world supremacy passing from Europe to America was one the European mind could not entertain. It happened and was not believed. American power determined the outcome of the World War, which England and her Allies had otherwise lost; an American army of more than two millions of men appeared in Europe and vanished. Still it was not believed. The only way Europe could think of America was as a stem of western civilization; the trunk and roots of it were in Europe. And to the stem would have been assigned the task, nay, the moral obligation, to restore the power and authority of Europe.

In all that we think we know of the historical process there was never a thing so strange as that the star of world supremacy should pass to a people who did not wish it, who had no idea what to do with it and who dreaded the responsibilities of possessing it. One of these is the responsibility to keep peace and order in the world—not absolute peace, of course, since that is yet impossible, but a regime of peace where there would be otherwise a regime of war.

Our first idea was to organize that responsibility and share it with Europe. Thus the Covenant of the League of Nations that President Wilson wrote into the Versailles Treaty and which the American people, by instinct, rejected.

Our second idea was disarmament. Europe was distrustful and suspicious. Disarmament was all right in principle. But suppose the world did actually disarm? Military supremacy in that case would pass to the nation that had the most powerful industrial machine and sure access to raw materials, because, in the event of war, it could beat all others in creating new weapons. What was the name of that one nation? America. Therefore, was the American disarmament evangel entirely sincere and disinterested?

Our answer to that was to say that, in default of disarmament, we were going to build the incomparable navy. Then for the first time the other maritime powers were willing to discuss naval disarmament in dead earnest. They all came to Washington, and there we said to them: "See. We have the longest sword. We can make it much longer still. But we believe in disarmament. And to prove it, we now propose to break our sword to the length of the next longest one, and to keep it at that length if you will agree not to lengthen yours. Do you agree?"

They agreed, in a state of amazement. Such a thing had never happened before in the history of the quarrelsome human race as that a people actually possessing the paramount power should offer in a voluntary manner to limit its weapons. But while we were towing our warships to sea and sinking them with our own gunfire, the foreign naval experts were already finding holes in the disarmament treaty through which they could push unforbidden types of warcraft, and one day we woke up to the fact that the American Navy was the only one that had actually declined in strength.

Meanwhile we had been pursuing a third idea, which was that, since we were the most productive people, and still the richest, notwithstanding our own exertions in the World War, it was our business and a kind of duty to assist in the restoration of Europe. So we poured our resources into Europe for that purpose, on a scale so prodigal and immense that we upset the economic balance. This is a long and complicated story. We are interested here in the sequels only. We lost our money, and we advanced the next war by maybe 10 years.

Now, therefore, the World War has been resumed. It is wrongly so named. It is, in fact, again what it was before—a European war, on the one side to defend and on the other to seize the star of world supremacy that is not there. It is here.

And again we shall have to decide what to do with our power. The decision we make may alter the history of the world for a thousand years. Twenty-two years ago we were putting it forth on the Continent of Europe, saying to ourselves, and believing, that we had engaged in a war to end war. It sounds ironic now. Nevertheless, it is one of the romantic facts to be written down in history that we had no other purpose. We were defeated. We were defeated because it was not our war. It was Europe's war, and the peace that was written was a European peace, laying down the lines for the next war.

Neither is the present war our war. We had no spoon in the caldron. Yet what are we saying about it? We hope we shall not be drawn into it. The President tells the people their Government will do everything it can think of to keep them out of it. For all that, we communicate to one another the fear that we shall somehow be got into it in spite of ourselves, moved by our emotions.

These are feeble attitudes and false. Nevertheless, they are dangerous. What we are saying to ourselves is that we leave it all to feeling. If our feelings crystallize, then we shall act. That is what we did before. We reelected a President on the slogan, "He kept us out of war," and 5 months later we were in it. From that experience, from the defeat we suffered, from the consequences, we should have learned what is wanting in the American ethos. Not to have known it then was pardonable; not to have learned it since, if we haven't, would convict us of weakness in mind and character.

Why these feeble attitudes that are in fact false? Why is our thinking so maudlin and muddy? Why are we so liable to be moved headlong by feeling? The answer is that we have within us no sense of American destiny. For want of it, this American power—the paramount power of the world—has no true center of its own, and that is a perilous fact. We need something more. We need the historical imagination to see that American destiny is unique in itself, entirely separate from the destiny of Europe.

Given that we were thus founded upon ourselves, with inner certitude, we should not now be saying of the European War either that we hope to stay out of it or that we are fearful of being drawn into it. We should not be exhorting one another to beware of foreign propaganda. We should not be dividing our minds between the isolationists, who say it is none of our business, and those, on the other hand, already abandoned to emotion, who say we shall betray civilization unless we go forth to save the democracies.

Instead of all that, we should know beforehand, and with certainty, under what conditions we would go to war at all. It would have to be our own war, not Europe's. It would have to be one wherein we were sure who at the end should write the peace, that it might be the American peace, unlike any peace that had been made before. If this be not in our destiny, then the star of supremacy that hangs in our sky is but a material sign, and that we disbelieve.

But no American war is remotely in view. We have no thought of starting one; no aggressor is threatening to bring war to us. That being so, of what now should we be taking forethought?

We should be thinking of what the state of the world will be when this European war ends. Our actual power will be still what it was; relatively it will be much greater than it was, because the power of Europe will have been damaged. We shall have by far the most efficient industrial machine in the world. We shall have two-thirds of all the gold, the only sound money and the only credit to lend. Our economic and financial supremacy will be such that we could, if we would, take possession of the world. But that is not what we want to do. If that star in our sky were an omen of world empire, we would wish it to go away; and if there is a new thing possible in the earth, it is that for once a people possessing the power to seize empire are not so tempted.

What else might we do with it? That is what we ought to be thinking about. It is ours. We did not gain it by conquest. We created it entire with our own hands. Therefore we are morally free to do with it what we will. Certainly, then, by taking thought, by discipline of the economic motive to make it serve the idea we fought for and lost 22 years ago in Europe, we could put it forth in ways to nourish the things we prefer to live with in the world and let the others wither.

War cannot end war; nor does it greatly abate the aggressor. The unmoral economic motive begins immediately to arm him again, and it has all to be done over. America, England, and France armed Germany. That was business. After Munich, England continued to sell essential war materials to Germany. That was business. America and England armed Japan against China. That was business. The economic weapon employed in peace to strangle war would be mightier than all the navies. Could there be a higher use of the American power than to impose that thought as a new law of the world and mind that it was kept?

First Army Maneuvers

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES A. SHANLEY

OF CONNECTICUT

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, October 5, 1939

OPENING CONFERENCE ADDRESS BY MAJ. GEN. HUGH A. DRUM, COMMANDING, PLATTSBURG, N. Y., AUGUST 15, 1939

Mr. SHANLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend and revise my remarks and include therein the speech of Maj. Gen. Hugh A. Drum at the opening conference of the First Army maneuvers.

I think that we should all be ever mindful of the admonition of President George Washington in his Farewell Address when he exhorted us to take "care always to keep ourselves, by suitable establishments, on a respectable defensive posture." I am confident that the distinguished speaker in our First Army maneuvers bespoke that thought.

I. GREETING

May I extend a welcome to all ranks and wish you every success in our maneuvers. Many here are attending a large army maneuver for the first time, and many more will experience for the first time the comradeship and esprit de corps engendered by the fraternity associated with military companionship and the patriotic objectives of our services. These associations are bound to be pleasant and productive of lasting friendships and increased military knowledge. A real opportunity for advancement in our chosen tasks of national defense is offered us in this gathering. Aside from actual training, much is to be learned by the exchange of views and cooperative consideration of our problems. We are here to learn—not to test the efficiency and capacity of individuals and units. Book and historical knowledge has its place in our preparatory studies; however, in the final analysis we must look to frequent training in the field with troops as the real approach to practical efficiency. Without placing undue hardship on the troops we have endeavored to illustrate the practical difficulties you may expect to encounter in actual campaigns in some exercises. You will profit by such experiences. The directing staffs have spent many days in advance preparation to insure your comfort and successful training. Do not expect perfection, as nothing is perfect in war, and, moreover, many of this group are as new at this game as you are. I know you appreciate the value of these views and will assist me and the directing staffs by mutual cooperation. By entering upon this work in such a spirit our tour of service will be pleasant and the return will be greatly improved efficiency.

II. NEED OF AN ACTIVE FIELD FORCE

In our national defense considerations in recent years great stress has been given to the United States Fleet, the organization of our productive industries for war, the development and acquisition of more modern armament (air and ground), and the expansion of our overseas garrisons. These provisions are important and essential steps and have met with national approval. However, those experienced in actual combat in war are convinced that these efforts, important as they are, are incomplete unless they include the creation in peacetime of a well-trained, adequately equipped, and well-organized fighting army force. This element is essential to the security of a nation, and at the same time is most difficult to create. A solution of the former considerations is of value only if well-organized fighting army forces are available to supplement and utilize these important assets. Of what value are modern munitions without manpower organized and trained to operate them? Of what value in war is a fleet or an air force without protected bases, or whose offensive action cannot be supplemented by a well-organized and trained army? The answer to these questions is found in the special and urgent efforts now being made by Great Britain to create a ground field army essential to supplement its large armament program and the expansion of its fleet and air forces.

Our experiences, as well as those of every other nation, are convincing that success in war is ultimately dependent upon a field army—one comprising both air and ground forces, adequately equipped and organized and efficiently trained and led. In our United States Fleet, with its air components, we have an efficient modern sea power. It is organized and trained as a homogeneous combat unit and so operates at all times. The high command is organized, and, by constantly functioning as a unit, has acquired the efficiency and facility to meet any exigency of war and combat. Whereas the picture of our Army is quite the opposite. Aside from the overseas garrisons our Army forces of all components are widely scattered in small Army posts and in the many communities of the 48 States. All units would have to be greatly expanded and all higher headquarters would have to be organized from the bottom up before our entry into a war. The General Headquarters air force is now undergoing expansion in many respects. The larger Army units are seldom brought together for organization and training, and even then the high commands must be improvised for the occasion. The superior qualities of the individual officers and enlisted men cannot entirely compensate for these serious defects, which will exist in any emergency unless we change radically our present system. Under such conditions our Army, except for munitions, faces problems quite similar to those that occurred when we entered the World War. It was a year and a half before our forces were prepared to enter battle as a field army in that war. Even our Regular Army First Division was not available for a year. Armaments, supplies, and equipment did not cause this delay, as the French and British supplied them as soon as our soldiers were organized and made available for training in France. It is important that we realize and make known this vital lesson and never forget that the most difficult preparedness problem is the organization and training of manpower—the creation of an efficient field force directed by skilled leaders, capable of utilizing the power of modern weapons.

In the military profession you are faced with a condition which does not confront any other professional group. The doctor, lawyer, banker, etc., can test and apply the principles and lessons he has studied and evolved each day of the year. He can continuously adjust his methods and policies and by practical experience determine whether he is adequately trained in his trade and sound in his conclusions. The soldier, on the other hand, must wait until he is called upon to preserve the integrity of his country before he can apply his theories and training. His stake is greater than that of any other profession. Furthermore, individual expertness is only supplemental to the more difficult problem of mass organization and efficiency. History is replete with examples of the defeat of nations and unnecessary loss of life when poorly organized and improperly led untrained troops have met trained organized ones in battle. In our country, with its large industrial plants, the problem of creating a well organized and trained field army, adequate for the first phases of a war, is more difficult than the transformation of our industrial system to a reasonable war basis.

The general purposes of the First Army maneuvers are in furtherance of the views that I have just expressed. These exercises are a step in that direction, but I am sure you will agree that 2 weeks once in 4 years devoted to this work are hardly adequate, especially under conditions where many important elements of a well-rounded-out organization are absent and which require an improvisation of the high commands on each of these infrequent occasions. However, with your cooperation we can and will accomplish much in these few days toward cementing ourselves into that military organization, so essential to success in national defense—an efficient field army.

III. SOME PRACTICAL CONSIDERATIONS RELATIVE TO OUR MANEUVERS

In planning a program for these maneuvers I have been faced with many practical problems—an important one of which is related to the composition and strength of the units to be included in the Army. One group of advisors advocated an assumption that the units comprising the First Army be as stated in our paper plans and at war strength, armed and equipped with the modern armament we hope some day to secure. I have resisted this approach as unreal—as presenting a false picture and thereby deceiving you and our fellow citizens who are really concerned in the protection of their homes. Our training would be superficial and visionary and would mislead you as well as the public. Consequently, I have deemed it better to be realistic and to have a more practical approach by directing that the Army enter these exercises exactly as it stands in peace—under a situation where an emergency has come upon us suddenly as it may—where we have been called into the field for active operations without delay. This is the basis of the War Department initial protective force plan. This is real—such a conception must bring home to us some of the actualities of our state of preparedness. The First Army as it has taken the field this month is not in fact an army. It is a collection of individual units, lacking adequate army, corps, and divisional troops, partially equipped and woefully short in the manpower, weapons, motors, etc., which experience has proven to be essential to an efficient field army. Let us consider these conditions in some detail:

a. Comparison of First Army and type Army

	Type Army	First Army	Shortages
			Number	Percentage
75 mm	480	300	180	38
155 mm	432	84	348	83
3" AA	72	31	41	57
Machine guns	4,926	1,863	3,063	67
Auto rifle	6,663	2,836	3,827	57
Tanks	210	251	+41	Over 16
Trucks	25,752	4,416	21,336	83
Personnel	321,475	75,116	246,359	77

b. Prior to this concentration, no corps or Army headquarters were in existence and no division headquarters were fully manned. To secure the personnel with which to improvise these units for this maneuver, I had to deplete our important Regular Army antiaircraft and coast defense units and gather in Regular officers from R. O. T. C., National Guard, and Reserve duties, thereby weakening seriously important units of defense, which should be available for immediate action.

c. The only aviation that could be made available is corps observation. The current expansion of the Army Air Corps prohibits our having any combat air units, so important for cooperative work with ground forces. Were combat aviation present, it would be my idea to demonstrate its uses on the battlefield by utilizing its potential powers to concentrate attacks initially on the hostile reserves, assembly areas, and communications, and as the battle is joined, to bring its fire and bombing power into the ground fight for interdiction and counter-battery efforts and to facilitate the operations of the infantry.

d. No artillery of a caliber larger than that operating organically with infantry divisions (75's and 155 howitzers) will be available and no Army or corps artillery. Only two antiaircraft artillery regiments will be present.

e. No corps or Army Regular chemical, engineer, signal, motor, medical, or supply units except two signal battalions will be available.

f. We will have the mechanized cavalry brigade and one battalion of tanks in addition to the divisional tank companies. These are our most modern weapons, yet few in comparison with our needs.

g. No antitank guns will be available. Only a few of the MI semiautomatic rifles will be in the hands of the troops. While infantry regiments will use the latest organization, the heavy weapon companies thereof will lack modern equipment in many respects.

h. The normal motor transportation of a field army should be about 28,500 vehicles. We will have only 4,657. This is about 15 percent and such shortage will, of course, greatly influence our mobility, capabilities of supply, and speedy transport of troops.

In the foregoing I have enumerated only the more important weaknesses in the Army preparedness picture. We may add thereto the inexperience of our officers and enlisted men in field exercises of large forces—the absence of the physical hardness required for active service, especially on the part of the National Guard and Reserves, and much ignorance concerning the conditions a soldier will encounter in the field and in battle—the field life of a soldier. These are real human handicaps which lack of preparedness has forced us to face before in most emergencies. Naturally they have influenced me in prescribing your training in these exercises. I know you will utilize the superior qualities of our personnel to overcome them better than any other soldiers in the world. You will take the tools available and do your best.

IV. THE TRAINING PROGRAM FOR THE EXERCISES

With the considerations just mentioned in mind, I drew up a program for our exercises which in general terms comprises the following main objectives, stated in order of actual sequence:

1. Instruction in a hurried mobilization of the Army, wherein we expand some existing organizations and create others, and by utilizing personnel from all components we improvise the higher commands, divisions—corps and Army—as well as an umpire group.

2. Instruction in the acquisition and organization of a suitable training area about Plattsburg, N. Y., and Manassas, Va.

3. Training in a hurried concentration of the Army in these areas—one-third at Manassas and two-thirds here at Plattsburg. In this work we are using all means of transportation—marching, airplanes, motor convoys, railroads, and even barges on the Hudson and Lake Champlain.

4. Actual training of the troops in the field, from the viewpoint of the individual soldier to the highest command unit—the Army staff.

5. Instruction in demobilizing forces and shipment home.

We have now accomplished all these objectives, except the fourth and fifth. Due to the nonexistence of higher commands in peace, the work and planning for the first, second, and third steps has taken all winter, requiring frequent conferences with transportation, supply, and other agencies, as well as between the higher commanders and staffs. My directing staff, the Corps Area staffs, and those of the States and divisions have been busy along these lines for months. Of course, there would be no such time available were we called out with little or no warning. All of these preliminary arrangements would have to be made after the emergency arose, and time would not be available to meet many of our shortcomings. We have organized the Army, such as it is, the maneuver area of nearly 300,000 acres, set up a supply system and concentrated the Army therein. There has been lots of profitable training in these important phases. Now we are ready to take up the actual field training of the Army.

V. GENERAL SCOPE OF THE FIELD TRAINING OF THE FIRST ARMY AT PLATTSBURG

We are limited to 15 days for the whole period of training. Five and one-half of these days have to be devoted to mobilization, concentration, and demobilization—to the shipment of the forces to and from their home stations, establishing camps, etc. Including Sundays, 2½ days are needed for rest and recreation. This left me 7 days for actual field training—for example, maneuvers. This is rather a short period in which to knit together an army and make it efficient in coordinated combat. Adding to this limitation, the unhardened physical condition of most of the troops, you will realize that the scope of our actual field training has to be greatly restricted. Before entering into the rigors of an extended Army maneuver a gradual hardening process for the personnel is essential. Then again, the minor tactics of battle, including the teaming of the cooperative arms, such as Infantry and Artillery, are best taught by small exercises which also give junior leaders opportunities for greatly needed training in independent leadership. These considerations, as well as others, have prompted our schedule which includes in order of sequence: First, two-sided reinforced regimental exercises; second, two-sided reinforced brigade exercises; third, a two-sided corps exercise; and last, a two-sided Army exercise. The divisional exercises are included in the two-sided corps and Army maneuvers.

In all of these exercises, air observation units, tanks, antiaircraft artillery, horse cavalry, and mechanized cavalry, such as we have, will be included and be a part of each separate command. The supply of food, water, and ammunition, and the care of the sick will be actually performed. There will be four overnight bivouacs, affording an opportunity to learn something of the conditions on a battlefield and the life of a soldier in the field in campaign.

VI. SPECIAL TRAINING CONSIDERATIONS

1. Definite objectives: To secure the best results from these 7 days of actual field training, it is essential that definite objectives, reasonable in scope, be predetermined. We cannot learn all of war in this short period; unless we concentrate our attention on a few definite objectives, the final results will be superficial and of little value. In each exercise, I hope all commanders will predetermine and announce the specific lessons to be imparted.

2. Training all ranks: A universal fault in past large maneuvers has been a tendency to approach the training scheme from the viewpoint of higher commands and staffs utilizing the rank and file merely as pawns for them to play with. I desire and have arranged the exercises to avoid such defects. I hope you will bear in mind the importance of keeping all ranks interested—playing their part—and will teach them their jobs as you learn yours. I want every man from the lowest rear-rank private to know the situation in each problem and what you are trying to do. Keep them in the game at all times and they will learn and do a better job. Remember that in a great expansion for war many of our enlisted men will become officers, and junior officers will reach high command, so let them know the broader picture of the exercises. These thoughts have prompted me to include in this conference the higher noncommissioned officers of the Army.

3. Speed in troop movement versus efficiency in combat fighting: Since the development of motors, facilitating speedy movement of troops, and the invention of mechanized forces, as well as the growing importance of the airplane, some Army men and many civilians believe that the solution of most campaigns rests primarily on rapid and wide troop movements. Encircling movements—surrounding an enemy—raids against supply places and lines—distant objectives—have gained first consideration in their thoughts. Such operations are important and at times may have decisive influences, but somewhere and sometime before a final decision is secured a battle will have to be fought. Irrespective of the speed of its preliminary movements, an army will have to engage in a ground battle before gaining a final decision. By rapid movement an army may gain an advantage of position, but it can seldom secure a decision without first winning a ground battle. Consequently, unless we know how to fight—to win a battle—speed of movement will be of little avail in modern war. Strategy in war—disposition of larger forces—is the function of the high command—one man—and is generally limited to one or two decisions in a campaign. Tactics—the fighting of a battle—is the function and job of all men of an army. Tactics and technique in battle, especially with our modern armament, are more difficult to learn than the rapid movement of troops and the wide swing around of mechanized forces, and therefore far more important.

In their normal daily life our people are using autos and trucks for every purpose. Some 30,000,000 are in the country, and our people are motor-minded. They know far more about motors and convoys than of fighting with modern weapons or any weapons. In connection with this statement relative to the daily movement of Americans by motor I wish to call your attention to the fact that during and after the Battle of St. Mihiel, in preparation for the Meuse-Argonne fight, I directed the motor movement of 458,000 American soldiers in a period of about 10 days. I give you this illustration to show you that even 20 years ago the Army was conscious of the potentiality of motors in the movement of troops.

I do not intend to belittle the advantages of speed off the battlefield; it has its place in the art of war and is important. Yet there is nothing which has come to us from the recent fighting in Europe and Asia to give any indication that mobility off the battlefield can compensate for inefficiency in the conduct of a fight. With our limit of 7 days for field training we cannot learn everything. Then, again, our motor transportation is limited. While there will be some rapid movements by trucks and wide swings by the mechanized brigade, the main objective of our training will be associated with the execution of battle—i. e., what the combat units have to do after the motor vehicles bring them in contact with an enemy. What I term the "mechanism of battle."

4. Decisive battle: In our writings and teachings we speak of the "decisive battle"—i. e., a battle to win a final decision over the enemy. Our doctrine is that all forces should be brought to bear in the "decisive battle." The commander must concentrate his full effort—avoid piecemeal employment of units, dispersion of efforts by scattering his forces and by independent disjointed operations. At the same time, the commander should utilize the full combat power of all instruments available and seek combat favorable to them, a battle wherein his air and mechanized weapons may join the other forces in decisive blows. Bear in mind also that decision in battle is secured not so much by killing men as by skillfully employing all available means to discrganize the enemy forces. While men unfortunately have to be killed in this operation, it is best accomplished by powerful blows which destroy the enemy's system of command and supply. These are the vitals of battle organization, and, if permanently severed, the means of direction, unity of action, and sustenance will fail and the power of cohesive resistance will then disintegrate. These are the results to be sought, and all means—air, mechanized, and other ground forces—should be coordinated for this purpose. This principle applies to all units, from the fight of a platoon to that of the army as a whole. Indoctrination of a command in this principle is essential to battle success. It should guide the initiative of all leaders and insure cooperative action by all units. Teach it to your commands—concentrate forces and fires, fight, advance, outflank, and pierce the enemy lines, all with the objective of reaching and disorganizing his command and supply systems.

5. Planning and organizing battle: In the narrow limits of our routine peacetime training we seldom have occasion to visualize a field army in battle and all the problems associated therewith. We picture our regiments of a few hundred men or our divisions of a few thousand men with a few guns. We see a few airplanes and tanks associated with a division. Compare this picture to an army of more than 300,000 men, several hundred guns, a mechanized brigade, several hundred airplanes, hospitals, depots of supplies of all kinds, and great transportation systems. Think of the problems of food, water, gas and oil, sick and wounded, repairs, shelters, as well as those relating to the direction and coordination of all units in combat. I am sure you will realize that such an immense machine needs great leadership, direction, control, and management; that it is incapable of running all over the country by leaps of a hundred miles at a time and fighting successfully a battle today and another tomorrow a hundred miles away, as some of our theorists of today would have us believe. Such a conception fails to comprehend the human and technical problems of such a mass. Few persons who have not been through a war experience realize that it normally requires several months to establish a supply and evacuation system which will permit the efficient operation of a field army. All of the efforts of the A. E. F., with French assistance, permitted us to set up a sufficient supply and evacuation system in about 30 days for the maintenance of the First Army at St. Mihiel and Meuse-Argonne. Many of the installations which we used in the First Army had been established many months before. I give you these figures to impress upon you the magnitude of the supply and evacuation problem.

Let us visualize in general terms the essential steps associated with the operations of an army in campaign:

First. After selection of a theater of operations comes the concentration of the army therein and the establishment of bases of supply—food, gas and oil, munition—and a system of supply, distribution, and evacuation.

Second. Coordinated reconnaissance of air and ground forces to locate the enemy and gain knowledge of his movements and the terrain features associated therewith.

Third. A rapid advance of detachments to develop further the enemy's main forces and to secure terrain features as a basis for the coming battle.

Fourth. Decision for battle and the form it will take.

Fifth. The arrangement of the army for the battle—composition and disposition of the forces and means to insure their coordination in the fight, and behind them establishment of the supply and evacuation and communication arrangements.

Sixth. The launching of a concerted and united blow.

These are not simple steps to be accomplished overnight. When they are well planned and conceived and time is taken to insure adequate knowledge thereof by all the units of the army, the foundation for success will have been laid. Otherwise, it is a hit-and-miss play, with the useless sacrifice of thousands of lives and the danger of failure. These same general steps are applicable to the smaller units of an army and should guide you in your approach to and conduct of battle. Seek out and develop the enemy—then plan and organize for your fight and launch your troops in a coordinated blow. This applies to platoons and air flights as well as to an army.

VII. MECHANISM OF BATTLE

The increased fire power and range of modern aviation and field artillery, coupled with the rapid movements of mechanized forces, will demand battle operations in greater depth and width than ever before. The combined ground and air battle of the future will embrace an area of conflict equivalent, at least, to the range of light artillery. Decision will seldom be gained until the rear area of light guns is penetrated. On an army front, many small combats will develop, with a tendency to lack of coordination. The supporting artillery will have to make several echelonments forward and frequently will lose contact with its infantry. Attack air units must join in the fight and supplement the artillery. Infantry, tanks, artillery, mechanized units, attack aviation will be encountered on one hand, and on the other they will have to be teamed and directed in coordinated attacks and advances. Food, ammunition, gas, oil, and water supply will be difficult. It will be a fight of several days. In the conduct of such a fight, or the mechanism of battle, our great difficulty will be to preserve the integrity of the fighting groups and to sustain a continuous blow until successful. Speed in combat is as important as in the movements preliminary thereto, but coordinated blows, when all arms use their fire power in concert for definite objectives, are the real basis for success.

In the time available, I can point out only a few salient considerations which should guide you in your conduct of the "mechanism of battle":

a. Maintain constant patrolling and reconnaissance, day and night, and connecting groups with adjacent units.

b. Provide adequate antiair and antitank reconnaissance and defense.

c. Cooperate with adjacent units by outflanking operations and enfilading fires.

d. Maintain a close link between infantry and artillery supporting units.

e. Tie in to decisive blows the assistance of tanks and attack aviation.

f. Maintain communication to insure artillery and air support at critical times.

g. Keep your higher commanders informed of your own actions as well as those of the enemy.

h. Plan your combat—have a scheme of maneuver for each local fight—bring all your fire power to bear to insure rapid advances in accordance with this plan.

i. Fight at night as well as in daylight.

j. Maintain reserve units for local maneuver and to further your plan.

k. Insure resupply of ammunition, gas, oil, and adequate food and water as you advance.

VIII. OTHER BATTLE CONSIDERATIONS

1. Coordination and initiative of subordinates: This brief, but inadequate, description of the "mechanism of battle" should bring home the necessity for close coordination on the one hand, but more important the reliance that must be placed on subordinate commanders. Superior qualities of initiative on the part of subordinates will be needed. With an understanding of the high commander's plan of battle and his doctrines on the conduct of battle, the subordinate commanders can and will meet local combat situations by their own initiative and resourcefulness. Our training must encourage this attitude in all ranks so that the junior leaders will be aggressive and force an early decision in the battle.

2. Speed of action and decision: Speed of action as a corollary to our modern weapons and transportation demands rapid mental processes as well as physical movements. The full value of our modern implements will be lost unless our mental processes are stepped up in harmony therewith. We must develop the faculties of sizing up situations quickly, grasping opportunities, making quick decisions, and utilizing our modern communications for transmitting these to the troops in brief intelligent instructions.

3. Combat orders: These conditions demand a radical change in our system of combat orders and the time lapse between their issuance and receipt by subordinate units. With the advent of increased mobility in rear of the battle area and the introduction of mechanized and motorized and aerial forces into the conduct of battle, not only must the commander and his staff speed up their mental processes, but they must devise means whereby the decisions of the commander can more quickly be transmitted to the troops who will execute them. If your commands are properly trained and indoctrinated, it is not essential that subordinates be given details of how to carry out their jobs. A commander must have in mind a definite and clear-cut plan that he desires carried out. Knowing his own mind, and confident of his judgment, the commander can state in a very few words what he wants accomplished and in most general terms how it is to be done. By such approaches we may reduce the lapse of time between the issuance of the higher commander's decision and its receipt by commanders of front-line units. Our previous conception of 6, 12, and 24 hours from the division, corps, and army headquarters to front-line units must be reduced if we are to take advantage of the modern means placed at our disposal for conducting battle. The staff must not be permitted to delay the transmission of the commander's decision any more than should the intermediate headquarters through which it of necessity passes. Having announced a scheme of maneuver and arranged for proper coordination of the efforts of those to be engaged in the fight, most staff details may be reserved for supplemental orders. This will leave available the maximum time to subordinates for reconnaissance and proper planning of their own part in the operation. I cannot too strongly urge you to accelerate the transmission of tactical decisions in order to avoid the loss of the advantages of the speed and power of our modern weapons.

4. Mechanized forces: In our army here at Plattsburg we have the mechanized cavalry brigade and a battalion of infantry tanks. Although their basic weapon—the armored tank—is the same, the main purposes of these forces are quite different. The mechanized cavalry brigade is a complete unit, prepared for independent operations; has its own air observation, artillery, and communication and supply units. Its mobility and power make it suitable and valuable in operations in advance of the army—in raids, outflanking blows, and as a reserve for use at the crisis of battle, whereas infantry tanks are intended primarily to reinforce and assist advancing infantry units and are especially valuable in these respects. Defense against these forces has been greatly improved with modern weapons and facilities, such as the new antitank guns and tank mines. Unfortunately, our First Army lacks much of this equipment, so we will have to improvise. The 75 millimeter and 37 millimeter are good antitank weapons. Road obstacles are readily constructed. One of the first steps in defense against these forces is distant air and ground reconnaissance with a speedy communication system. With a small mobile force of guns, infantry, and engineers held centrally, timely information should permit adequate blocking operations to meet advances of mechanized forces—so also in opposing the infantry tank. Confidence in your antitank weapons and obstructing means will remove most of the fear of these weapons, in the same manner as confidence in the efficiency of antiaircraft fire will lessen the fear of the airplane.

5. Night operations and attack: There is a phase of combat which has probably been too greatly slighted and of which we have too little knowledge. I refer to night movements and night attacks. I hope during these exercises that every opportunity will be developed and prosecuted for the testing and experimenting with thoughts concerning night operations. On several occasions troops will be in contact throughout the night. I hope that during these periods you will endeavor to develop lessons which will benefit all of us. It is not hard to visualize a battlefield at night, with the enemy positions lighted by searchlights and flares dropped from aircraft, with the attacking or advancing troops in the shadow. It is not difficult to visualize, in a situation such as will confront the troops during these maneuvers, that an entire line might be moved forward under cover of darkness and overrun a hostile outpost position with little or no difficulty. There are many opportunities for the imagination to conceive means of identification and methods of maintaining control during night operations. The fastening of white patches on men's backs or some other distinguishing mark may permit patrols or larger elements to identify one another when operating at night in hostile territory. I hope efforts will be made to develop schemes and tactics for night engagements.

6. Battlefield supply: In your preparation for the Army maneuvers I hope you will give consideration to supply on the battlefield. This will include food and water, as well as ammunition. The supply will have to be made at night. It is an easy task, if properly planned and executed, but frequently a miserable failure, with natural discontent following. In the Army maneuver you will bivouac 2 nights, where the supply will be an actual problem. So don't force me to say after the exercise, "I told you so."

IX. HEADQUARTERS UNITS

Organization and functioning of the headquarters staffs in combat is a problem requiring your attention. Bear in mind that these headquarters are not limited to officers, but include many enlisted specialists and much mechanical office machinery. They are the focal point from which directions for operations issue. If they fail to perform their function of accurate thinking, swiftly translated into clear directives, the sacrifices of gallant troops will have been made in vain. Staffs have an invariable tendency to become too large. To guide and direct large military organizations, we require small compact headquarters, capable of functioning rapidly, with complete coordination. A staff routine and system of operation is an essential factor to insure businesslike and timely action—organization and procedure is necessary and should be developed in each staff group. They must operate, at times, 24 hours a day for several weeks, be prepared for rapid night movements, and it is imperative that members retain their vigor, health, and mental alertness. Weariness and discouragement in the commander and his staff infect their troops instantly and disastrously.

X. MANEUVER MAP

Discuss terrain features and their relationship to our field training and certain assumptions forced by the problem and private property.

XI. COMPETITION BETWEEN UNITS

Our American soldiers enjoy a healthy competitive spirit. We can secure many advantages by utilizing this characteristic. Consequently, I hope you will inject competition into all phases of our camp and field life during the maneuvers. Please make effective in this connection my instructions for recognition of outstanding services in the maneuvers.

XII. PRIVATE PROPERTY—CLAIMS

Instructions have been issued in detail reference private property and claims. I am sure you and your soldiers realize the importance of care in this particular, especially care against fires.

XIII. CONCLUSIONS

a. The soul of an army: The acme of efficiency in combat springs from the soul of an army—its esprit de corps—that fraternal comradeship which inspires individual and group confidence, determination, and the mutual respect and affection which engender the spirit of willing sacrifice for the success of the whole. The development of these qualities in the leaders insures similar traits in the lower ranks.

As our Army and its corps assemble as units in peace only once in several years, the value and inculcation of these human qualities should receive close attention in our field exercises. Let us endeavor to think, plan, and act in the spirit of the First Army, I, II, and Provisional Corps, and knit ourselves into the combat teams these great fighting units represent.

While we live in a machine age—militarily as well as commercially—let us not forget that success in battle in the final analysis is secured by man. His desires to become efficient, his willingness to meet hardships and to make the supreme sacrifice, are inspired by his respect and affection for and confidence in his leaders. The personality of the leader is a vital factor. Who ever heard of the numerical designation of Civil War units? It was Hancock's, Longstreet's, or Jackson's corps. Success in battle will seldom be secured except through personal leadership—so in this machine age we must guard against the danger of the mechanical element dominating the human side.

b. Conclusion: It is a pleasure to welcome you here. I hope that the exercises upon which we are about to enter will prove both interesting and instructive. It is my earnest desire that every effort be made to take advantage of each opportunity for the training of the individual as well as the unit. The umpires have been directed to give exercises of various kinds to battalions and regiments in reserve when it is evident that they are going to remain in such condition for some time. During the actual army maneuver I have given instructions that the umpires shall prepare and give problems to the battalion commanders which will maintain interest and further the instruction of the smaller units. Particularly will they observe the close contact essential between the infantry and the artillery.

I am very happy that in this exercise we have the three components of the Army of the United States represented, and distributed throughout the command. These contacts will develop a mutual respect among these components and will tend to develop a more efficient Army of the United States.

I again welcome you to the First Army maneuvers. I know that both individually and as a group you will work hard for the success of our maneuvers, and I am sure that we all will have a profitable 2 weeks.

Police Powers for the League of Nations

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES SECCOMBE

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, October 10, 1939

ARTICLE BY HARRY FREASE

Mr. SECCOMBE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD I include the following article by Harry Frease, of Canton, Ohio:

The problem of preserving international peace without war, has never been solved, after more than 4,000 years since the Babylonian Nation was ruled by a code of laws compiled by Hammurabi.

For more than 40 centuries down to the present day, the only preparedness for peace has been a preparedness for war; without any effective means for determining and enforcing international rights and obligations, except by war.

International law is merely a collection of maxims, without any effective means for interpreting or applying them to conflicting claims of international rights and duties.

Treaties of amity are no longer considered as binding upon the nations concerned, beyond their own purposes from day to day; and diplomatic negotiations bind no nations who do not wish to be bound.

The Permanent Court of Arbitration, established at The Hague in 1899 and amplified in 1907, cannot compel unwilling nations to arbitrate their differences, and has no means for enforcing its awards.

The League of Nations, formulated at Versailles in 1919 and subsequently established at Geneva by some 54 nations, has no means for enforcing its covenants, or the decisions of its assembly, or of its council, or of its arbiters, and has failed to accomplish its purposes.

The Permanent Court of International Justice of 1920, adhered to by some 52 nations, cannot command the presence of unwilling nations and cannot enforce its judgments.

The Pact of Paris, formulated in 1928 and adhered to by some 64 nations, contains no provisions for enforcing its agreements or for determining and preventing violations thereof.

And finally the Declaration of Lima, made on December 23, 1938, between some 20 American governments, goes no further than the American Declaration of Indepndence in 1776, and provides no means for establishing and enforcing the principles formulated therein.

The absence of mutual guaranties and effective executive powers has been obvious ever since the Covenant of the League of Nations was formulated, and that omission is a sufficient reason in itself for the failure of the League, as it is now constituted, to perform the function of preserving peace without war during the 20 years of its existence.

The success of the American constitutional form of a national government for a considerable number of separate sovereign States, was largely because it included legislative, executive, and judicial departments for well-defined but limited national purposes only, and left the organization and general powers of government for all other purposes to be determined and enforced by the several States, subject only to the particular powers delegated to the National Government.

It would seem to follow that if the Covenant of the League of Nations were revised by amendment, so as to establish legislative, executive, and judicial departments, with well-defined and limited supernational powers only, leaving all the strictly national powers to be dealt with by the several member governments there is no reason why the League of Nations should not function for preserving peace, without any other changes in its present organizations.

More particularly, if a permanent international police force were included in the executive department of the League of Nations to carry into effect the legislation of the League and the judgments of the court of justice, the existence of such a force would render unnecessary the maintenance, for immediate mobilization, of large armies and navies for preserving peace or preventing war and would permit the disarmament which is contemplated by the Covenant of the League.

SUGGESTIONS FOR REVISION

The legislative department of the League might be modified so that the Assembly shall consist of representatives of the people of the members of the League, elected by the citizens of the respective nations in proportion to the population thereof, and so that the Council shall consist of a smaller number of representatives selected by the national governments of the respective members, likewise in proportion to the population thereof; and so that each representative in the Assembly shall have one vote and each representative in the Council shall have one vote.

The Assembly would correspond directly to the American House of Representatives, the British House of Commons, and the French Chamber of Deputies; and the Council would correspond somewhat to the American Senate, the British House of Lords, and the French Senate. The Assembly might have 1 representative for each 2,000,000 citizens of the respective nations, with a minimum of 1 representative; and the Council might have 1 representative for each 10,000,000 citizens of the respective nations with a minimum of 1 representative.

The legislative powers of the Assembly and the Council should be limited to international questions, including the codification of international law without interfering with legal international treaties, and its enactments should be by a majority vote in each of the Assembly and the Council. In addition to its legislative powers the Council might well be given advisory powers, and, preferably, controlling powers over the international acts of the executive department, the same to be exercised by a two-thirds or three-fourths vote of the councilors.

An executive department for the League might readily be provided by substituting a president-general for the existing permanent secretary-general, appointed by the Council with the approval of the Assembly for a single term of not exceeding 10 years; who would be not only a president for administering the affairs of the League, but also a commander in chief of an international police force, the different elements of which should be supplied by the member nations or governments, in proportion to the population thereof.

In suggesting the size of an international police force, one might begin with the plan which prevailed in the United States of America when its population was about 25,000,000, which was that a regular army of 1 soldier for each 1,000 citizens was sufficient for purely national purposes. Such a ratio in the 15 so-called democracies proposed by Clarence K. Streit as a nucleus for his Union Now, containing a population, without dependencies, of 279,869,000, would create an international police force of 279,869 soldiers; and if Japan, Germany, Italy, Russia, and Latin America, with their populations of 491,564,000 were added, it would increase the international police force by 491,564 soldiers, making a total force of 771,433, without considering China or India, and other continental and insular nations or dependencies.

Such an international police force might be sufficient, and it would surely not be excessive, when made up of the necessary land, naval, and air forces, and especially if it were divided into several continental posts or depots, as in America, Europe, and Asia, and perhaps in Africa; and no nation, not even the United States of America, should hesitate to supply its quota, when an international disarmament has been effected.

The judicial department of the League has been well established in the Permanent Court of International Justice, and to render it fully effective requires only the adherence of all the members of the League, and especially of the United States, without reservations; the compulsory acceptance by all its adherents of the jurisdiction and the judgments of the Court with respect to all international questions whatsoever, ipso facto and without special convention; and the availability of an international police force to compel obedience to its judgments.

There is no need for any revision of the power or jurisdiction of the League Court, because the same is already well defined and limited by article 36 of the statute for the Court, to strictly international questions, as follows:

"(a) The interpretation of a treaty;

"(b) Any question of international law;

"(c) The existence of any fact which, if established, would constitute a breach of an international obligation;

"(d) The nature or extent of the reparation to be made for a breach of an international obligation."

Such a revision of the Covenant of the League of Nations and the statute for the Court of International Justice, would seem to be necessary, and is believed to be all that would be necessary to secure international peace without war; and it is difficult to see how any one of the 64 adherents to the Kellogg-Briand Pact of Paris could refuse to agree to the League Covenant and the court statute, as amended, because it was therein agreed, as follows:

"ARTICLE 1. The high contracting parties solemnly declare in the names of their respective peoples that they condemn recourse to war for the solution of international controversies, and renounce it as an instrument of national policy in their relations with one another.

"ART. 2. The high contracting parties agree that the settlement or solution of all disputes or conflicts of whatever nature, or of whatever origin they may be, which may arise among them, shall never be sought except by pacific means."

All the nations of the world, excepting a few in South America, have subscribed to the foregoing declaration and agreement, which is nothing more than a restatement of the preamble to the Covenant of the League of Nations, as follows:

"The high contracting parties—

"In order to promote international cooperation and to achieve international peace and security;

"By the acceptance of obligations not to resort to war;

"By the prescription of open, just, and honorable relations between nations;

"By the firm establishment of the understandings of international law as the actual rule of conduct among governments;

"And by the maintenance of justice and a scrupulous respect for all treaty obligations in the dealings of organized peoples with one another—

"Agree to this Covenant of the League of Nations."

It is very difficult to understand what the United States expected to accomplish by taking the lead in formulating the Pact of Paris, which merely restates the purposes of the League of Nations, some 6 years after refusing to ratify the Covenant, which had been inspired by former President Taft and promulgated by President Wilson; without supplementing the declaration and agreement with the necessary provisions for interpreting and enforcing the obligations clearly defined therein.

It is just as difficult to understand why the people of the United States have acquiesced for some 20 years in the refusal, which is nothing less than a criminal neglect of their official statesmen, to either adhere to the Covenant of the League, and to the statute of its Court, without reservations, or to take the necessary steps, somewhat as suggested herein, to revise the Covenant and the statute by the necessary amendments to render them effective and therefore acceptable to all the nations of the world.

It is even more difficult to understand why the people of the United States have permitted their official statesmen to withhold an adherence, without equivocal reservations, to the statute for Permanent Court of International Justice, which was advocated by Andrew D. White and Joseph H. Choate and their respective associates at The Hague in 1899 and 1907; was proposed by former President Taft and his associates in the League to Enforce Peace in 1915; was drafted by a committee of 12 international lawyers, including the late Elihu Root, in 1920; was recommended to President Harding, with certain conditions and understandings, by Charles E. Hughes, as Secretary of State, in 1923; for which President Coolidge obtained the advice and consent, with certain reservations, of the United States Senate by the affirmative vote of 76 Senators in 1926; which was revised by a committee of jurists, including Elihu Root, in 1929; and although the revised statute was submitted to the Senate by President Hoover in 1930, the advice and consent for the adherence of the United States was refused by an affirmative vote of 52, which was less than the necessary two-thirds of the Senators present, as a result of which the United States remains in a very equivocal position with respect to the Permanent Court of International Justice.

AMERICA SHOULD ACT

The events of the past 20 years, during which the United States Government has sought isolation and a pretended neutrality by refusing to enter the League of Nations and to submit to its Permanent Court, and especially the events of the past 20 months, during which Hitler has defied the world, clearly show that world peace without war cannot be preserved unless the American people shall require its Government to enter the League and submit to its Court, when revised, without any reservations whatever.

In 1915 to 1917 America did not evade the inevitable results of a diplomacy which falsely proclaimed that we were "too proud to fight" and which encouraged Germany to prolong the war until the United States was compelled to fight.

And in 1939 America cannot evade the inevitable results of a diplomacy of neutrality which is not and never can be neutral, or of an isolation which is not and never can be isolation, because either one will encourage Hitler to proceed with his piracies until the United States is compelled to fight.

Nor can America evade the inevitable results of a delusive diplomacy, expressed at a time when "we can expect war at any moment" by announcing that "America will stay neutral," that "America will go to war only if she is attacked," "or if the British Fleet is defeated," and that "the foreign ministers of Germany, Italy, France, and Britain should meet and see if there is a way out."

With the reverberations of the Munich agreement (?) ringing in one's ears, it is somewhat naive to believe that a meeting of foreign ministers could find a way out; and it is quite as naive to believe that in event of war America can stay out, until she is attacked; and it is not merely naive but it would be crass cowardice and also a slow suicide for America to await the destruction of the British Fleet before going to war.

Why should France and Britain assume to speak for Poland, and perchance for Hungary, at another Munich meeting? Or, why should France and Britain be expected to police the world until America is attacked or until the British Fleet is destroyed? The only answer to these questions is that for 20 years the United States has refused to participate in the League of Nations, which has been said by Dr. Butler to be the only possible "solution of the world problem in terms of prosperity and peace."

The same thought was expressed in another way by Cordell Hull, our Secretary of State, in an address to the Tennessee Bar Association in June 1938, as follows:

"The most important problem now confronting the human race is that of establishing throughout the world, as the foundation of further progress, an unshakable regime of order under law."

This world problem has not been solved, and can never be solved, without the full participation of the United States in a league of nations, revised to create a representative union of national governments, having the necessary supernational legislative, executive, and judicial powers, and limited to strictly international relations of the respective national governments.

POSTSCRIPT

Whatever diplomacy the United States shall adopt with reference to the European war which was initiated by Adolph Hitler on the day after the foregoing paper was completed, its influence in solving the world problem of peace will be enhanced to a dominating degree, if it promises an ultimate adherence to the League of Nations and the Permanent Court of International Justice without reservation, which it can safely do if the League and the Court are supplemented by an international police to enforce international law.

Pending a termination of the existing war, the United States might well propose to follow the declaration of Lima by organizing a league of American nations and reviving and enlarging the Central American Court of Justice of 1908 to 1918 as an American court of international justice, with an international police to enforce international law in the American Hemisphere.

Such a leadership might suggest a similar procedure on the part of the neutral European nations which have already had one conference at Brussels upon call of the King of Belgium for the purpose of coordinating their defensive activities.

In answer to the well-grounded aversion to the idea of sending American soldiers for duty abroad, it is sufficient to say that in a properly distributed international police force it should not be necessary to send American troops across the waters; and in any event the United States Navy and the United States Marine Corps are constantly sailing the high seas, and our sailors and marines are frequently used for protecting American interests in foreign lands.

The Neutrality Bill

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. KEY PITTMAN

OF NEVADA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, October 11 (legislative day of Wednesday, October 4), 1939

DISCUSSION OF NEUTRALITY BY SENATORS NYE AND PITTMAN AND A PANEL OF OTHER SENATORS

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix a discussion of the pending neutrality legislation which took place October 1, 1939, on the American Forum of the Air, and was participated in by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. NYE] and myself, and a panel consisting of the Senator from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY], the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. DANAHER], the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. LUNDEEN], and the Senator from Indiana [Mr. VAN NUYS].

There being no objection, the discussion was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Announcer MCCORMACK. WOL, in cooperation with WOR, presents the American Forum of the Air.

Tonight listeners to the coast-to-coast Mutual network will hear the first of this season's Sunday night broadcasts—emanating from the modern broadcasting studios of the new Department of the Interior Building in Washington, D. C.

The facilities of these radio studios have been extended by the Secretary of the Interior, Harold L. Ickes, in the interest of free speech, on assurances these educational broadcasts will present both sides of a national problem, temperately discussed by the leaders of opposing schools of thought, and conducted by a nonpartisan, nonpolitical organization.

Tonight's American Forum of the Air will be presented identical to those which became such widely listened to programs last year. Under the direction of Theodore Granik, pioneer in educational radio discussion, you first will hear the presentation of both sides of tonight's topic of discussion by outstanding leaders on the subject. Following the formal presentation of opposing views, the issue will be heard in informal discussion by a panel board ready to treat the argument extemporaneously.

And now Mr. Theodore Granik.

Chairman GRANIK. Thank you, Mr. McCormack.

Tomorrow the Senate of the United States will begin its historic debate on revision of the Nation's neutrality law.

As reported by the Foreign Relations Committee, the bill provides for repeal of the arms embargo, requires that shipments of American goods to belligerent countries be made in non-American vessels, and authorizes the President to designate combat zones in which American ships and citizens would not be permitted to travel.

The committee report on the measure declared that the Nation cannot maintain its neutrality "so long as the arms embargo remains on the statute books."

"An embargo on arms, ammunition, and implements of war," it added, "is contrary to the accepted precepts of international law, which prescribe that any belligerent may purchase any articles or materials in any neutral country. Belligerents as well as neutrals have relied from time immemorial upon this law.

"The embargo," the report continued, "was a voluntary departure from international law by the United States Government, and cannot, in the opinion of this committee, be administered in an equitable or neutral manner, nor serve to maintain the peace of the United States."

Proponents of the measure contend that it will protect the neutrality, the safety, and the integrity of our country, and at the same time keep us out of war. Its opponents, however, argue that repeal of the embargo on arms shipments would create a definite road to the involvement of the United States in the European war, contending that, once this first step is taken, it will be easy to get rid of any cash-and-carry requirements and of the Johnson Act forbidding loans to debtor nations in default.

And while the controversy is centralized around the single question of whether there shall be or shall not be an embargo, it is expected that one of the other major points of the discussion, will deal with the issue of whether 90-day credits for belligerent purchasers of American goods shall be permitted.

On the eve of congressional action the American Forum of the Air is pleased to present a debate on the question tonight.

We will hear, first, from Senator KEY PITTMAN, of Nevada, chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee. He will be followed by Senator GERALD P. NYE, of North Dakota, long a Senate leader in international problems.

Immediately following we will present an informal panel discussion. Our panel members are: Senators ERNEST LUNDEEN, of Minnesota, TOM CONNALLY, of Texas, JOHN A. DANAHER, of Connecticut, and FREDERICK VAN NUYS, of Indiana.

And now, as our opening speaker, Senator KEY PITTMAN.

ADDRESS BY SENATOR KEY PITTMAN

Fellow citizens of the radio audience of America, in the 12 minutes allotted to me I can touch but briefly on the most important phases of the proposed neutrality legislation. The members of the Committee on Foreign Relations of the United States Senate who participated in the drafting of the proposed substitute for the House joint resolution were actuated solely by determination to preserve the neutrality and the peace of the United States, and to secure the safety of its citizens and their interests. The names of the distinguished Senators who voted in the Foreign Relations Committee to report out this substitute are known to the people of the United States. These men are just as intelligent and patriotic and love peace just as intensely as the distinguished Senators who oppose the proposed substitute. The world situation today and its possible future effect upon the United States is too serious for us to permit that there be any misunderstanding as to the proposed legislation or that legitimate consideration of the subject be obscured by catch phrases and appeal to the groundless fears of mothers and fathers.

In the proposed substitute for existing law and for the House joint resolution, restrictions upon the travel of our citizens, upon their trade, and upon our American vessels have been made much more severe than exist in the law today or that have ever been proposed in the Congress of the United States. I will admit on the very start that obedience to this proposed legislation will entail a great sacrifice upon the part of our citizens, but I am confident that every patriotic citizen will be willing to make this sacrifice in the knowledge that it has for its purpose, and will probably have as a result, the keeping us out of the European war.

Let us see in brief what it proposes. It absolutely prohibits American vessels from carrying passengers or any kinds of articles or materials to the warring powers. The old neutrality law, which expired on May 1, 1939, granted the discretion to the President to determine what articles might be transported in American vessels to belligerents with the exception of those few manufactured articles defined in existing law as arms, ammunition, and implements of war. That was the provision in the law of 1937 that Senators opposing the proposed substitute bragged was voted for by 63 Senators and voted against by only 6. Aren't those 63 Senators pleased that we now propose to amend the law by now taking this discretion away from the President and absolutely mandatorily prohibiting our American vessels from engaging in any commerce with belligerents? If they do not favor such change, let them say so now. The old cash-and-carry law which expired on May 1, 1939, as far as the divesting of title out of the American citizen, is reenacted in the proposed substitute, but has been strengthened by providing that any loss by any American citizen in the sale and transfer of title and possession of his goods shall not be made the basis of any claim by the United States Government. Do not the opponents of the present legislation approve of that additional clause? The provision for a foreigner to take title and carry all goods from the United States applies only to the warring powers, but some of the warring powers might start to submarine our American vessels who are dealing with neutrals adjacent to warring powers as they did in 1917. We can't afford to allow our American seamen to suffer death through submarining without notice for the sake of trading even with a neutral. We do not know whether such conditions will arise, nor with regard to what neutral it will eventuate. Nor can we know how long such action might continue, and therefore we have granted to the President of the United States the discretion to place combat areas around those neutrals, commerce with which results in the destruction of our ships, our American vessels, and the lives of our citizens on board, and to prohibit entry by our American vessels into such combat area. It is impossible to conceive that any President vested with such responsibility would use such power necessarily, and it is equally inconceivable that he would refuse to use such power in carrying out the intent of Congress in protecting the lives of our seamen.

Do you know that today there is no law restricting American vessels from carrying scrap iron, steel, lead, zinc, copper, and every kind of metal, oil, gasoline, and every other character of raw material to any of the warring powers? Certainly the opponents of the proposed legislation must favor the absolute restrictions that we propose to enact into law prohibiting the transportation of such materials to the warring powers. Great Britain has issued its list of contraband—that is, articles and materials that may be seized or destroyed if they believe they are going to their enemy—which includes all of the articles that I have named which under existing law may be carried by our American vessels to the warring powers. Germany has gone even further in its list of contraband. It includes every article of commerce. Only recently Germany has sunk Swedish vessels because such vessels were carrying wood pulp to Great Britain. Everyone knows that the chief use of wood pulp is in the manufacture of paper. Oh, yes; wood pulp may be used for the manufacture of other things. In fact, today nearly everything can be manufactured into instruments of war. And yet the opponents of the proposed legislation are willing to defeat the proposed neutrality law simply because those few manufactured articles which are defined as arms, ammunition, and implements of war may be purchased in this country the same as all other kinds of war instruments and taken away by warring powers in their own vessels.

All the old provisions, even those that have died by their own terms, are reenacted into the proposed legislation and materially strengthened. There is some question being raised by the opponents of the proposed legislation with regard to section 7 (a) of the proposed substitute, entitled "Financial transactions," prohibiting the purchase, sale, or exchange of bonds, securities, or other obligations of the warring powers, or the making of loans, or the extension of credit to such powers, because it is provided that if the President shall find that such action will serve to protect the commercial interests of the United States or its citizens he may, in his discretion, and to such extent and under such regulations as he may prescribe, except from the operation of said section ordinary commercial credits and short-time obligations in aid of legal transactions and of a character customarily used in normal peacetime commercial transactions. They forget that that language is exactly the same as was contained in the bill for which 63 Senators voted when the existing law was before the Senate in 1937. They forget that such law is now on the statute books; and no Senator or Congressman to my knowledge has ever made any objection to it in the past. The Attorney General, in construing the Johnson Act, which is in almost the same language as section 7 of the existing law and of the proposed substitute, except that such act does not by any proviso grant any discretion to the President to permit the extension of short-time credits, said in part: "This, I think, is indicative of a purpose to deal with such 'bonds' and 'securities' and with 'other obligations' of like nature, observing the rule of ejusdem generis—that is, obligations such as those which have been sold to the American public to raise money for the use of the foreign governments issuing them—not contemplating foreign currency, postal money orders, drafts, checks, and other ordinary aids to banking and commercial transactions, which are 'obligations' in a broad sense but not in the sense intended. It was obviously not the purpose of the Congress to discontinue all commercial relations with the defaulting countries." Ninety-day drafts, checks, and other instruments used in the payment for export goods are generally considered as cash transactions, and the Treasury Department so decided at a conference at which, I am informed, Senator JOHNSON was present But let us remember that the proviso in existing law rests the permission of the extension of such normal peacetime commercial transactions in the President. I am unwilling to believe or admit that any President of the United States would use this discretion contrary to the best interests of the United States. However, the Foreign Relations Committee have added a mandatory clause to such existing law in the following language: "but only if such credits and obligations have maturities of not more than 90 days and are not renewable. If any government, political subdivision, or person to which credit has been extended pursuant to the authority vested in the President under this subsection is in default in whole or in part upon any obligation to which such extension of credit relates, no further extension of credit to such government, political subdivision, or person shall be made or authorized under this subsection during the period of such default."

If any 90-day checks or drafts of a belligerent government are not paid in full at maturity, then the President is prohibited from granting such government said 90 days' extension of credit on any other transactions during such default. Is there any stronger mandatory provision that could be enacted? Do we not know that 95 percent of commercial transactions are conducted through drafts and checks and that a period must elapse between the time of the giving of such drafts and checks and the time when such drafts and checks are presented and credit is given to the seller? Are exports of our wheat and cotton and other usual exports to be obstructed, if not stopped, through the abandonment of the customary methods of payment for such goods? We are voluntarily placing great restrictions upon our citizens and their industries without absolutely taking the chance of stopping all exports. Our country is not in a condition today to bear any such additional burdens.

I am impatient at the hocus-pocus that whatever we do today will be a step toward war because tomorrow Congress will yield to persuasions to do things that they believe wrong today. A distinguished Senator of the United States enunciated this baseless contention when he said recently in a national broadcast: "The next step will be to make loans to the Allies to protect the credit that has been advanced." Well, would the Senator vote to give authority for our Government to loan money to a belligerent government for such purpose? Of course not. Would any Senator who opposes the proposed legislation vote to grant such authority? Of course not. Would any patriotic Member of Congress cast such a vote? I do not believe it. I have just as much confidence in the wisdom and patriotism of every Senator in the United States as I have in the distinguished Senators who fear such action and who would fight against it. The Government of the United States cannot lend money to a warring power without authority of Congress. Congress alone can appropriate money to carry on a war. Congress alone can authorize war. The Members of the Congress of the United States are patriotic, intelligent, and sincere men and women. They have a fixed determination to keep out of the European war. It is, therefore, deceptive to say that such a Congress, if it takes a step that it believes right today, is going to take another step tomorrow that is not right.

Chairman GRANIK. Thank you, Senator PITTMAN. You are listening to the American Forum of the Air presenting a discussion on the neutrality bill. You have just heard Senator KEY PITTMAN, of Nevada.

And now we are pleased to present Senator GERALD P. NYE, of North Dakota.

ADDRESS BY SENATOR GERALD P. NYE

I insist that repeal of the arms embargo is not in keeping with American determination to stay out of Europe's war. This attitude is not prompted by any partisan spirit. Those of us who are for the arms embargo now were supporters of it since 1935, when we introduced bills for both the cash and carry and the arms embargo. We thought then that America needed both of them to keep us out of war, and we still think so. We have been able to observe how greed can grow into a great power in the affairs of the Nation, how quickly a little privilege can become a vested interest, how readily, to be specific, the traffic in death can become not only respectable but arrogant.

We are a nation of people almost unanimous in expressing a determination to stay out of the European war. But of this great number there are some who are eager to help one side engaged in the European conflict to the extent of arming them with the instruments which war calls for. When will it dawn upon such people that, since modern war is conducted on two specific fronts, the military and the economic, one quite as important as the other, that we cannot be into a war on one front without expecting shortly to be into it on both fronts? If we are determined to fight this war with materials we will inevitably end up by fighting it with men.

How many more wars do we have to have before we learn that lesson? It was written long ago, "Where your money is, there will your heart be also."

This pending decision by Congress on the arms embargo involves the question whether the United States will take the first step toward participation in Europe's war. I insist that we cannot conscientiously declare ourselves out of Europe's war when we go into Europe's war actively on the economic front in support of one side.

The people should be reminded that they have no vote on this question, no vote on the possibility that they will die in the mud in the Rhine for some cause to them unknown. They vote on everything else, but not on the most important matter in their lives. The administration refused the people that right last year when it pressured Congress to defeat legislation giving that right. Now that same administration is engaged in taking away another safeguard against our involvement in war, the arms embargo.

In this situation Congress is the only protection from involvement. The debate will start tomorrow noon.

What is the fight about? It is about getting into a war situation by accident, or because of greed, or because one single man thinks we ought to get in. That is not democracy. The bill that is pending has some good and some very bad features. The good features are now or have been a part of our neutrality law. The bad features are those granting more power to the President.

The arms embargo is the real heart of the controversy, and I hope the window dressing in the bill is not going to be permitted to blind anyone to that fact.

We who fight repeal of the arms embargo will insist that to make our country the arsenal for one side in the European war is to make our country the target for the other side; that the embargo is pure neutrality; that repeal is the first step into the foreign war; that we can get along without the blood profits that are available through embargo repeal.

Those who favor repeal of the arms embargo will insist that the embargo is unneutral, that there is money in the murder business, that we need the returns from foreign war to bolster our economy, that we must choose sides, that the cause of democracy is involved in Europe's never ending imperialistic struggles.

The arms embargo has become a kind of traffic light. If it is repealed, the light will turn green—"go ahead"—along the road to war. Now the light stands at red, "Stop!" and we propose to keep the arms embargo there to hold that light at red, to let all and everyone know that the American people propose to stay out of this war.

The fight in Congress to keep the arms embargo on the books is going to be desperate. It is going to be desperately fought, because once that embargo were repealed, there will be no turning back and putting it back on the books—not until after another war.

The gloating dispatches from Washington expressing the administration's belief that they had the votes to repeal are probably doing some harm. They are discouraging some people from writing their Senators and Congressmen. I want to tell you that you will see within a very few days that a majority has not pledged itself to repeal the embargo, and I am confident that it will not be repealed. The very fact that the administration has taken time on the air every night for 2 weeks indicates that its forces are not sure of their ground.

There are some other contradictions, too. What of this representation that unless we sell war supplies to England and France, those countries are going to be crushed, and then to know that the purchases by those two countries of munitions during the 5 months preceding the invoking of the arms embargo were insignificant. The truth is that England and France know that if repeal of the arms embargo can be accomplished, they can anticipate with far greater ease, a little later on, repeal of the cash-and-carry requirements, repeal of the Johnson Act, and finally repeal of that resolve to keep American sons off the European military front.

Here in America eminent statesmen insist that the repeal of the embargo is essential if we are to stay out of Europe's war. Does anyone believe that England and France want us to repeal the embargo for that same reason? There isn't an American who doesn't know better.

And, speaking of inconsistencies, what of the attitude of those who are now demanding repeal of the arms embargo as a thing necessary to keep us out of Europe's war, by comparison with their insistence only 2 years ago that unless we wrote an arms embargo to prevent exportation of arms into Spain, the United States would be drawn into that civil war in Spain. Now, war in Europe has broken out—and the administration has turned a somersault—and is asking that we repeal the arms embargo which in 1937 they considered so necessary for our own peace.

Here are many insisting upon repeal of the arms embargo as a step to keep us out of war, yet insisting in the same breath that we get into Europe's war to the extent of supplying one side with arms and making our Nation an arsenal for that side.

Eloquently men plead for an adjournment of politics on this issue, only to let us observe the leaders of the repeal cause summoning into conferences only that part of a committee bearing a certain partisan label and known to be friendly to the cause of repeal, and excluding all others.

We have had proclaimed a state of emergency here in our own country. In that connection let me point out that Congress was summoned into special session in the name of a limited emergency. Of course, if an emergency exists, the Congress ought to be here. But why must those who insist that there is an emergency be equally insistent that as soon as Congress has repealed the arms embargo it should hurry back home?

Contradictions? Who does not remember how, after Congress this summer refused to repeal the arms embargo, the President echoed a complaint to the effect that because we had not repealed the embargo we had lost our chance at a nice little trade boom? But now the President and his following are talking, talking, talking about how to prevent anyone making a profit out of this situation that has developed abroad.

I said before that many people think that the issue is one of choosing sides. It is awkward choosing sides in these days. You never know who is in bed with you when you wake up. Who expected to see the marriage of those supposedly bitter enemies Soviet Russia and Nazi Germany? What assurance do we have that we would not wake up one moment to find England tied up with one or both of them?

And speaking of changing around, the changes of the President himself have naturally made many of us wonder where he will land next. They have made us wonder whether he has not embarked on a policy which may lead him on courses different from those he had in mind. The President today says that the existence of the arms embargo may be responsible for taking us into Europe's war; that it is unneutral to refuse to sell to all nations at war alike; that we ought to repeal it. This is the same President who in the fall of 1936 was heaping praise upon the neutrality law, including the arms embargo, as a "weapon to safeguard American neutrality," against the appeal of fools' gold.

Let us be honest with ourselves and clear about our facts in this controversy. The neutrality law, with the arms embargo in it, was written for the purpose of keeping the United States out of other people's wars. Until last May that law carried within it, together with the embargo forbidding the exportation of munitions to any nation engaged in war, a cash-and-carry plan, now being advocated as a substitute for the arms embargo. But let it not be forgotten that the administration that now wants the cash-and-carry plan permitted that cash-and-carry plan to expire last May. Here they come in the name of emergency, to ask repeal of the arms embargo and establishment again of the cash-and-carry plan. They were for the arms embargo and are now against it. They were against the cash and carry when they let it die last April, and are now for it. All this switching around makes many of us sure that they may have less interest in protecting our peace than in accommodating our laws to a certain interventionist foreign policy and winning profits.

The appeal is made that though we have the arms embargo preventing the exportation of munitions to nations at war, there is no safeguard against traffic in other commodities being so challenged and jeopardized as ultimately to take us to war. Overnight some people have become most zealous in their determination to prevent American trade with nations at war which would risk searches, seizures, and sinkings that might take us to war. All right, let us agree that this danger does exist. What are we to do about it? Is the only answer to repeal the embargo and write the cash-and-carry plan to cover all commodities, including munitions? Certainly not. If we want the most thoroughgoing safeguard against that kind of chance, then what we want is an enlargement of the existing embargo that will forbid exportation of anything and everything to nations at war, or resort to a program which the administration once recommended—the maintenance of only a normal peacetime trade with nations at war. If that is not to be done, then let's have the embargo plus cash and carry to cover everything else.

The time to start staying out of Europe's war was before Europe went to war. Congress and the President made that start by writing the neutrality law. Now is the time for Americans, their President, and their Congress to hold fast to that kind of a start. We so desperately need today to be prevented from taking those steps which could so easily be steps straight to war. We ought to guard most jealously against the possibility of the United States gearing its economy to a wartime basis if we would avoid a repetition of that disastrous experience which is still with us.

We should decline to be fooled into believing that there is the faintest ideal of democracy involved in that European conflict today. The No. 1 issue is the maintenance of existing imperialism and empires and the prevention of other imperialisms and empires being built to outshine them.

There is already some sentiment in this country to the effect that much as we may regret it, the time does seem to be at hand when we are going to have to clean up over there in Europe once again; that we stopped too soon the last time; that we have got to hop in there again and this time sweep clean; and that the way to start doing that is to move in at once on the economic front by becoming the arsenal for one side, which can be done only by repealing the arms embargo. This attitude, I might say, in light of what does prevail and will prevail in Europe for a long time to come, reminds one of the housewife who, during a 3-day dust storm out in the Dust Bowl, went out with her broom and swept her porch every half hour.

Say what you will, there were no causes more largely responsible for our entry into Europe's war in 1917 than foreign propaganda and our wartime trade. The record clearly discloses how true this was. Let us not repeat that experience. Let us not take the first step which so easily paves the way to the next step, even to further steps involving declarations of war. Let us not do that at least until we can have a clearer definition than now exists of what part we can play successfully, of what chance there is of going to war and remaining a democracy. Until we shall perchance have decided that Europe and her aches are really our aches, let us not fool ourselves into believing that we can get half in and yet stay out of that war, for we ought to know that we are either going to be in or out—in or out.

An emergency exists or is declared to exist! Repeal the embargo becomes the hue and cry! Adjourn politics! Politics ought to be adjourned in this controversy. But there must be no adjournment of allegiance to the cause of keeping America strong, keeping democracy secure where we have a real chance to keep it secure, one place in all the world. There must be no adjournment of allegiance to that principle and policy dictating that America mind her own business, that America avoid entanglement in European power politics, about which we know so little and which we certainly cannot disentangle.

Speak up, Americans; make your voices heard. Don't for 1 minute permit yourself to believe that this cause of retaining the arms embargo is lost, for it is not lost. This fight is only just begun, and I say to you that it will be a matter of only a few days before there will be ample demonstration of the fact that a majority of the Members of the Senate have not pledged themselves to vote for repeal of the arms embargo.

Announcer McCORMACK. Immediately following station identification, we will continue with the panel discussion.

This is the Mutual Broadcasting System.

Announcer McCORMACK. This is the American Forum of the Air, originating in the broadcasting studios of the new Department of the Interior Building in Washington, D. C., and presented over the Mutual network by WOL in cooperation with WOR.

We return you the chairman of the program, Mr. Granik.

Chairman GRANIK. Thank you, Senator NYE. This concludes part I of tonight's American Forum of the Air.

And now, as part II of tonight's American Forum of the Air, we present an informal panel discussion. The panel members are: Senators JOHN A. DANAHER, of Connecticut; TOM CONNALLY, of Texas; ERNEST LUNDEEN, of Minnesota; and FREDERICK VAN NUYS, of Indiana.

Senator DANAHER will open the discussion.

Senator JOHN A. DANAHER (Connecticut). Thank you, Mr. Granik.

There cannot be the slightest question of the good faith and the earnestness and sincerity of the Members of the United States Senate in their desire to keep the United States out of war. We honestly do differ, however, as to the method to be pursued in that particular. Senator PITTMAN, the distinguished Senator from Nevada and chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee, has described the pending bill as a proposed neutrality law. I claim that it is not a neutrality law, that that is a misnomer. I say it is a trade-in-munitions bill, and I believe that we can properly turn to the report of the Committee on Foreign Relations, where we read: "The embargo is contrary to the accepted precepts of international law, which prescribe that any belligerent may purchase any article or materials in any neutral country."

I want to legislate for the United States, and not for any belligerent.

Senator CONNALLY, out of your long experience on the Committee on Foreign Relations, and out of respect for your part in the draftsmanship of this particular act, I would like to direct your attention, if I may, to section 7B, and let me point our first that section 7A is the one which purports to place the limitation upon credits, and section 7B reads that "The provisions of this section shall not apply to a renewal or adjustment of such indebtedness as may exist on the date of such proclamation."

I claim, Senator, that the very language there adopted, if enacted into law, will make possible, between now and the date of the proclamation, the extension of unlimited credits creating any amount of indebtedness for any possible purpose in furnishing munitions to a belligerent. What is your view, Senator CONNALLY, if I may ask?

Senator TOM CONNALLY (Texas). Senator DANAHER, I think you are getting the cart ahead of the horse in jumping over about five or six pages of the bill and ignoring its chief purpose, and singling out a section that really has no serious application. Section 7B, to which you refer, refers to existing debts owed by people in European countries to American citizens. Of course that has nothing on earth to do with the war. Those are debts that have been incurred in former times, and of course they may be renewed if they cannot be paid. I came here tonight to discuss this bill on its merits, and not to engage in partisan politics. One of the Senators on the main panel seemed to spend most of his time denouncing the administration and President Roosevelt. I want to discuss this bill and see whether it is right or whether it is wrong, no matter who is for it and who is against it. I respect the views of those who are opposing the repeal, but I want to tell you one reason why I favor repeal of an embargo.

The embargo on arms provides that in time of peace—that is the existing law—any nation preparing for conquest, arming itself to overrun peaceful neighbors, may buy all the arms in the United States which it may desire, but when it once strikes and creates a state of war the innocent victim of its aggression can't get a single gun or a single bayonet to meet the guns and bayonets which have been sold to the other nation, in time of war. It offers a disadvantage to the weak and defenseless and the innocent and peaceful. It offers a premium to the aggressor, to the conqueror, and to the militaristic nations that look with covetous eyes upon the property or the territory of their neighbors. It permits the burglar in the daytime to buy his jimmy and his tools and his nitroglycerine in order to rob a bank or steal your treasure, but when he is discovered in his acts it prevents the owner from borrowing a weapon from his neighbor to repel the burglar and to punish him for his crime.

Now, Mr. Chairman, it has been said that to repeal the arms embargo constitutes unneutrality. I deny it. It is not true. The United States of America is the only nation on earth that has such a law. All of the great countries of the earth recognize that international law permits any nation to buy from neutral nations in time of war any commodity, arms, ammunition, implements of war, food, clothing, raw materials and anything, and it is not a violation of international law. Today the countries neighboring Germany, Italy, Hungary, Rumania, what was once Poland, what was once Czechoslovakia, Belgium, Holland, Denmark, are selling Germany, and Germany is buying from them arms and ammunition, supplies of every character. That is not unneutral. If it is not unneutral for those countries to sell to Germany, why is it unneutral for the United States to sell to England and France or to Germany, for that matter? Under the arms embargo which these gentlemen want to retain, Italy can come to America today and buy all the arms and ammunition that she wants, and what assurance have we got that when they are once bought and transported even in American ships, they may not be transported to Germany for her use? I submit, Senator LUNDEEN, who will follow me, that that is in part my answer as to why the embargo should be repealed.

Senator ERNEST LUNDEEN (Minnesota): We should remember that this is war between two utterly selfish groups. They are not engaged in any humanitarian objects. They are engaged in protecting themselves and all of their interests, looking after their empires, because they are empires, and great empires.

Many people think of France as a little country. It has more than a million square miles more than the United States in its colonies. Great Britain is more than four times the size of the United States. They are looking after themselves. They are not so careful about us. It seems to me they owe us some money. It seems to me they owe us some war debts. In 1917 I stood on the floor of the House of Representatives and predicted that they would be loaned billions and they would never pay them back, and they did not pay them back. They have been rather insolent about it. These groups are all selfish. I would like to see these West Indies Islands turned over as part payment for some of these debts, and perhaps that would make some of these European nations pause about war the next time. Democracy in Europe? Is there one left? Where is there any democracy—they are all dictators over there. They switch around according to their best interests. I hope it is not undignified to say, "Who took the whiskers off Russia a while ago, and who put them on now, again?" Why, they were very, very crude, terrible people a while ago, and then, shortly after that, they became very respectable when the British Empire went over and for 6 months courted them. Now, of course, they are bewhiskered again, and terrible people.

Now, we are being charged, according to the newspapers, rent for the trenches that we fought in and rent for the graves in which we placed our hero dead. And if we don't pay the rent, they cremate them. I don't know what they intend to do with the ashes of these hero boys we sent over there.

Now, I am greatly interested in what these distinguished and learned Senators say, but I am more interested in what Washington and Jefferson and Jackson and Lincoln and the Founders and Fathers of the American Republic said about situations like that, and I want to read one paragraph from Washington, the Father of our Country, when he said, "Why forego the advantages of so peculiar a situation? Why quit our own to stand upon foreign ground? Why, by interweaving our destiny with that of any part of Europe, entangle our peace and prosperity in the toils of European ambition, rivalship, interest, humor, or caprice? It is our true policy to steer clear of permanent alliances with any position or portion of the foreign world." Then he said, "The jealousy of a free people ought to be constantly awake, since history and experience prove that foreign influence is one of the most baneful foes of republican government."

Senator VAN NUYS, I am sure the American public are going to be much interested in your point of view. I know we all respect one another's position; we are all Americans, we are trying to do the best we know how for this country, where we were born, and the Nation we love.

Senator VAN NUYS (Indiana). Mr. Chairman, I only have a word or two of observation at this time. The thing that impressed me in this debate up to date, and which to me is radically wrong and should be stopped if we are going to solve this question impassionately and on a sincere basis, was the observation made by the second speaker tonight who says that the Nation stands today before a traffic signal with the green light on if this so-called neutrality amendment is passed, but as the law is today, it flashes a red stop light. I want the American people listening in to know that there isn't a one of the majority of the Senate which will pass this bill, these amendments, very shortly, but what stands adamantly against the entrance of the United States of America into this or any other foreign war. I am only speaking for myself, Senator CONNALLY and Senator LUNDEEN, only for myself, but I hope as one of the results of this war that Hitlerism will be wiped off the face of the earth forever. Now, how best to accomplish that without involving this country in the war, in a foreign war, is the problem which confronts us. Why should we be drawn into another war? The Chief Executive in the message which he recently sent to Congress, incorporating a detailed statement from Secretary Hull and in which statement the President concurred, said that the chief concern—Secretary Hull said—of this country is its peace and neutrality. And later, just recently, the Chief Executive broadcast to the American people and assured them and reassured them that there would be no black-out of peace as long as he could control the executive situation.

A preponderating majority of the Congress, Senate and House, join in those sentiments. But what is more vital and more determining than the Chief Executive or the Senate or the House is the fact that the great overwhelming majority of the American people are against ever entering into another foreign war. I hope that as a result of this nonpartisan, patriotic debate on the floor of the Senate and here tonight, that that statement that the passage of these amendments is tantamount to the United States of America not entering into another foreign war.

And now, noticing the anxious look upon the face of Senator DANAHER, and the great documentary arms, ammunition, and implements of war which he has piled up before him, I defer to him at this time.

Senator DANAHER. For a question, if you please, Senator VAN NUYS. I have observed in the course of your remarks that your attitude is born of a desire to crush Hitlerism. Do you not conceive it to be the purpose of the United States Senate to legislate in favor of the people of the United States, and the position of our country before the world, rather than to pass such legislation as would either aid or crush any nation?

Senator VAN NUYS. I do not admit, Senator, that the objective of this law is along that line, and I prefaced my observation by the statement that that was my individual opinion and desire.

Senator DANAHER. Senator, of course you are aware that there are a great many people whose sentiments, whose sympathies, in fact I properly might say the sentiments and sympathies of all of us, rebel at what has happened, for instance, to bleeding Poland, and on that account a great many people wish to lend assistance to England, and because of that I sent to the Secretary of State for a break-down under the munitions export license arrangement, for the actual figures of the extent to which we have assisted England during 1939, when the imminence of war must have become at least as apparent to England as it did to us. And it is a singular thing, Senator VAN NUYS, that from the end of April of 1939 to the end of August of 1939, arms export licenses were issued to English carriers, or to American exporters to be sent to England, all kinds of munitions, including airplanes, the total of $701,000 worth. Now, it is perfectly apparent from the figures, Senator, I should say, that either of two things is true. One of them necessarily must be that England does not need our help under the arms, ammunitions, or munitions and implements of war theory. Wouldn't you say so?

Senator VAN NUYS. Well, it really isn't my turn. Senator CONNALLY is next, and I defer to him as the next on the panel.

Senator LUNDEEN. May I say there that I have a clipping in my hand which states that both Britain and Germany are supplying warplanes to Rumania right now. Take that mix-up.

Senator CONNALLY. My answer to Senator DANAHER is that we are not predicating this legislation on how we can help England, or how we can hurt Hitler, or how we can assassinate Stalin, as he has been assassinating his friends and allies all these years. This bill is designed to keep the United States of America out of war. Under the present bill, American citizens cannot sell arms and ammunition, but they can sell anything else on earth, and they can carry it in American ships, not alone to neutrals but to belligerents and warring nations. What got us into the World War? It was not what the ships had in them, because Germany sank food ships and clothing ships and all other kinds of ships, irrespective of whether they carried munitions. Under this bill no American citizen can ship anything to a warring nation in an American ship, neither arms, munitions, nor implements of war, nor general supplies of oil or cotton or food or any other article of commerce, raw materials—not one thing going abroad in an American ship, and when we keep American ships off the seas, when we keep them from going to belligerent nations, we have done more than any government on the face of this earth in all the history of time ever did before to keep out of war.

Now, why should we refuse to sell one belligerent arms and ammunition? Under international law they have a right to buy them, and if in time of their need, in time of danger, we refuse to award them the same right that all other nations possess to our markets, we are committing an unneutral act. We are doing that to their hurt and their damage which is not authorized under international law.

For that reason this bill, when it treats both belligerents alike as to arms and ammunition, when it treats them all alike in refusing the transport of American goods of any kind in American ships to belligerent nations, gives to the American people the greatest guaranty, much greater than the present so-called embargo law.

I deny it; I reject it. All of us want to keep the United States out of war, and that is what this bill is designed to do. It is the best guaranty that has ever been offered to the American people, to say nothing of having been adopted, in all the history of time. Is not that true, Senator LUNDEEN?

Senator LUNDEEN. You say about keeping out of war. It seems to me I heard that 22 years ago. They were going to keep us out of war. Oh, yes; they were all for keeping out of war. But they were getting us in just as fast as they knew how, behind the camouflage of keeping us out of war.

When I was a young Congressman at that time, I was observing as much as I could the movements behind the scenery.

I just had a clipping taken out of the Sunday papers. We hear a great deal about conscription and militarism, and here is an article here about one of these nations introducing conscription that might be of some interest, a nation that says it is a republic but now is a dictatorship.

Here I have the Chicago Daily Tribune of September 29, and I would like to ask the distinguished and able chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee about that, whether it is correct or not. "Our chameleon foreign policy"—and here is a drawing of Senator PITTMAN speaking to Congress on April 7, 1937. "Congress seeks to keep out of the next war. Our bill places an embargo upon the exportation of arms, munitions, and implements of war to belligerents. This is the only embargo imposed. No one has seriously opposed it."

Then recently Senator PITTMAN is represented as stating, "Not to sell arms and munitions to belligerents is dangerous. The embargo must be repealed."

Well, I think that ought to be cleared. I am sure that our able chairman might want to say something there.

Senator KEY PITTMAN (Nevada). Senator LUNDEEN, some people, you know, profit by experience. Others don't. I have made a great many mistakes since I have been in the Senate, and frankly I admit it. I really thought at one time that the embargo was going to be more effective than it was. I can't think it can be effective when there are just a few manufactured things like guns and ammunitions in it and you have oil and gasoline and iron and steel and everything that makes ammunitions out of it, and I don't think it can be solved by reason of the last thing that happened—that is, the alliance of Russia with Germany—because she can get all the ammunitions into Germany from the United States.

Announced MCCORMACK. So we have concluded the initial broadcast in this season's series of the American Forum of the Air broadcasts emanating from the broadcasting studios of the new Department of the Interior Building in Washington, D. C.

The facilities of these radio studios have been extended by the Secretary of the Interior Harold L. Ickes in the interest of free speech, on assurances these educational broadcasts will present both sides of a national problem, temperately discussed by the leaders of opposing schools of thought and conducted by a nonpartisan, nonpolitical organization.

The Mutual network will bring you this forum broadcast every Sunday evening from 8 to 9 o'clock, eastern standard time, through out the session of Congress. Tickets to this broadcast may be had by sending your request to station WOR, New York, or WOL, Washington. In the interest of education, there are printed and distributed, free of charge, a limited number of copies of the entire proceedings of these broadcasts. Address your requests and comments to WOL.

The American Forum of the Air is directed by Theodore Granik, who presided as chairman tonight, and comes to you as a presentation of WOR in cooperation with WOL.

This is Stephen McCormack speaking.

This is the coast-to-coast network of the Mutual Broadcasting System.

Pending Neutrality Legislation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GERALD P. NYE

OF NORTH DAKOTA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, October 11 (legislative day of Wednesday, October 4), 1939

RADIO ADDRESS BY. HON. JOHN H. OVERTON, OF LOUISIANA

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an address on neutrality delivered by the senior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. OVERTON] in the American Forum of the Air, Mutual Broadcasting Co., on October 8, 1939.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The Congress of the United States is now considering a measure of the most vital importance to every man, woman, and child in America. Our decision on this question may lead us to war, or it may keep us in the paths of peace. I submit that we should do everything within our power to keep the United States not only out of the present European conflict but also out of all foreign wars in the future. We should do not simply a few things to keep us out, but everything within reason. We should think first of America and not European or other foreign nations.

Our neutrality resolution should contain both the arms embargo and the cash-and-carry plan, and also, with perhaps some slight modifications, all the other safeguards proposed in the resolution now before Congress. There is no reason whatsoever why we cannot retain the present embargo on arms, ammunition, and implements of war and reenact the cash-and-carry provision on all other commodities. Up until May 1 of this year we had both the arms embargo and a cash-and-carry policy on all other articles of export. The arms embargo is still the law of the land, but the cash-and-carry requirement expired last May. Let us retain the one and reenact the other. The objection that I have to the neutrality resolution pending before Congress is not by reason of its carrying a cash-and-carry provision, but because it undertakes also to repeal the arms embargo, which is the cornerstone of our neutrality and our strongest legislative safeguard against involvement in foreign wars. Let us, therefore, understand this fact clearly: We do not have to repeal the arms embargo in order to have the cash and carry. We can and should have both.

We adopted the arms-embargo policy in 1935, 1936, and 1937, when our judgment was not warped by either the friendships or animosities engendered by the present European conflict. That policy was adopted to meet just such a situation as now confronts us, and for the threefold purpose of keeping us out of war, of refusing to aid other nations with deadly weapons in carrying on war, and of maintaining a fair and just neutrality. The administration officials and spokesmen who approved this policy, declared that it was a clear policy, a wise policy, a powerful protection for us. Now that the contingency against which we have been protecting ourselves has, in fact occurred, should we now scrap one of the fundamental safeguards, agreed upon all sides as a measure calculated to preserve our own peace? The neutrality legislation, with its continuing arms embargo, was American legislation deliberately enacted by the American Congress, not out of consideration for foreign nations but solely in the interest of these United States.

To repeal the arms embargo would be to take sides officially by act of our Government. If the American people are being asked to take sides they shall be so asked frankly and openly, and not through the side door of the arms embargo repeal. If we begin now to supply one side with arms in this mammoth conflict now just getting under way in Europe, we shall find, as we did in the World War, that gradually we shall be called upon to do more and more, and to take step after step on the road that leads us to war. Soon the American dollar will be following our American arms, and then the American flag and the American soldier will be following both to the battlefields of Europe.

We have erected a few barriers against involvement in foreign wars. We should keep every one of them. I favor strengthening them, adding to them, but I am opposed to striking down a single one of them.

Personally I am against the United States taking sides. Bitter experience teaches us that it is not to our national interest to do so. We took sides once before in the power politics of Europe. We came out of that war without having saved the world for democracy, without putting an end to all wars, without attaining any of the high ideals for which our soldiers fought and died in foreign lands. What we got out of this misadventure was a dishonored debt of over $13,000,000,000 owed us by European nations and a post-war depression from which we have not recovered. We spent for that war, including the default on the war debts, approximately $60,000,000,000. We sacrificed the lives of over 100,000 of our young men and have filled our veterans' hospitals with thousands upon thousands of others, maimed, diseased, bereft of reason. What a tragic reminder of the utter futility of our participating in the wars of European nations or of trying to adjust their racial, religious, territorial, and political differences.

Another World War will take infinitely more of our life, our wealth and resources, our democracy. So strongly do I feel about that this I am unwilling to take a single step toward participating again in the endless and ever-recurring quarrels of European nations, which neither we nor they can apparently ever hope to settle.

Our participation in another World War would bring us a virtual dictatorship in the United States during the course of the war. The nature of modern, totalitarian war makes that unavoidable. The only way to avoid it is to keep the country out of war. Another great war will jeopardize our democracy. You recall the extensive and unprecedented powers which had to be given to our Executive during the last war. They will seem mild compared to the complete controls that another war will put into the hands of any President, regardless of who he may be.

If we ever get into another major war, we may never regain the democracy we will be forced to give up while the war is on. I do not believe we can impose democracy upon all of Europe. But I do believe that we can and must preserve democracy in these United States, encourage its growth throughout this hemisphere, and be prepared to defend it here from all outside attack. I cannot understand how anybody who cherishes our free institutions, our democratic traditions and spirit, our very civilization, can contemplate taking sides now, even just a little, with anything but complete horror. We must perform our task in our own country and on this hemisphere, where we have great opportunities which coincide with our real national interest. We may and do have sympathy for certain nations in Europe, but we must not allow such sympathies to blind us to what is good, what is possible, and what is practicable for the United States. Our own country, its strict neutrality and avoidance of war, should be our first and last thought.

The neutrality legislation adopted in 1935, 1936, and 1937, after careful study of our previous war experience, has become an important part of our national policy. The barriers against easy involvement in foreign war put up in legislation must not be broken down. The present law includes the arms embargo, the ban on loans and restriction on credits, the prohibition against our citizens traveling on belligerent ships. To these provisions should be added the cash-and-carry proposal and other safeguarding measures. Such action will best serve the interests of the United States. The notice that we gave to the rest of the world over 4 years ago that we would not again become an arms arsenal for any set of belligerents, that we would not again supply in wartime the deadly weapons of mass murder and wholesale destruction, was a sound decision, and is still a sound and humane policy.

I take my stand for retention of the arms embargo, together with the rest of the present law, and the addition of cash-and-carry provisions, as the best insurance to our peace.

Problems of Law Enforcement

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ALBEN W. BARKLEY

OF KENTUCKY

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, October 11 (legislative day of Wednesday, October 4), 1939

ADDRESS BY HON. J. EDGAR HOOVER

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD an address on the problems of law enforcement delivered by Hon. J. Edgar Hoover, Director of the Federal Bureau of Investigation, before the International Association of Chiefs of Police at San Francisco, Calif., on October 10, 1939.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

There have been few times, if any, in our history when law enforcement faced a more serious ordeal than today. Not even in the turbulent World War days were there greater problems. We then battled only subversive forces and sporadic crime, not a widely flung underworld often highly organized in racketeering and destruction. There has never been a greater need for progress, development, and improvement within the ranks of law enforcement. Widespread cooperation must be marshaled if we are to meet the difficult problems that lie before us.

We have a habit in the International Association of Chiefs of Police of speaking frankly, of rolling up our sleeves at these annual meetings and talking over our problems man to man, striving always to face the truth, no matter how unpleasant that may be. In this spirit of frankness, I ask that we face the fact together that the demand for improvement must start within the ranks of law enforcement, for it will come only through our own efforts. Glaring irregularities which public apathy may have glossed over in the past will be brought into the foreground in the future. Our house must now be put in order through vigorous and concerted action, both for national defense and self-defense.

The President of the United States has instructed the Federal Bureau of Investigation to take charge of all investigative work in matters involving espionage, sabotage, subversive activities, and violations of our neutrality regulations. He has asked all law enforcing agencies to refer promptly to the F. B. I. any information obtained by them relating to such matters. I am confident that each and every law-enforcement agency in our Nation will realize its responsibility in this national emergency and will wholeheartedly respond to our President's request.

You are assured that the F. B. I. will carry on this special work in the same way in which it has functioned in other phases of its activities in recent years—in a calm, impartial, vigorous, but unhysterical manner. Constitutional guaranties of American citizens must be protected. We must proceed in an orderly, lawful manner.

Just as the old-fashioned dragnet never served as a cure for crime, neither will similar "drives" be an effective inoculation against espionage. The paramount task is to secure the facts, and establish the guilt of those who owe their allegiance to a foreign power, before invoking the authority of the law. This is the function of duly constituted, capable, and efficient law enforcing and investigative bodies, but, of course, we need the aid of loyal and thoroughly honest, patriotic citizens at all times.

If the internal defense of the Nation is to be preserved, there must be a coordination and centralization of responsibility such as the President of the United States signified by his recent request directed to American law enforcement. Every effort must be directed in an orderly manner by thoroughly responsible, well-trained, professional law-enforcement officers, totally devoid of hysteria. The evil spirits which would destroy America must be met and conquered. In this there can be no middle ground.

In the wave of patriotism that is rising in the country there lies the danger of overzealous groups or individuals engaging in acts which are distinctly un-American in method, no matter how patriotic in aim. We need no vigilantes in this situation. The vigilante method is distinctly contrary to American ideals of justice. The Federal Bureau of Investigation has been called upon to investigate all matters relating to espionage, sabotage, and violations of the neutrality regulations. In turn the Federal Bureau of Investigation has requested cooperation of all law-enforcement officers in the United States.

This combined attack by Federal and State forces should be sufficient so far as investigation and prosecution are concerned. Beyond the efforts of these law-enforcement agencies there is a need, of course, for the individual cooperation of all sincere and earnest Americans. This cooperation should be limited, however, to passing on to the proper officials all questionable facts or rumors which may come one's way. An alert public is the best defense against traitorous or inimical conduct. Let us be realistic and practical, ever alert to the dangers which we know lurk in practically every community in the land, but always calm in our judgment between the real and unreal.

Therefore I place before you as the prime requisite of progress in law enforcement the urgent current need of reconstruction, or improvement, of the weeding out of inefficiency, and a spirit of grim determination to face the problem of all crime with a resolution never before known in our history. This cannot be done for us; we of law enforcement must do it for ourselves.

In proof of this, I have only to point to the development of the Federal Bureau of Investigation. Today, through the selection of proper personnel, through a Gibraltarlike stand against outside interference, through constant battling for the better things in enforcement, the Federal Bureau of Investigation, I am proud to say, has demonstrated that obstacles can be overcome. No favored friend of the underworld makes appointments to the Federal Bureau of Investigation. No power is great enough to swerve this body from its sworn duty nor from its tenets of fidelity, bravery, integrity. And I insist that the experiences of the Federal Bureau of Investigation are within the grasp of every law-enforcement organization in America. Many of you have been resolute in your determination to mold your organization upon the same principles of efficiency and decency. This of necessity requires unrelenting persistence, a spirit of self-sacrifice, and unwavering faith and courage to dig in and fight for that which is right. It requires the fearlessness emulated by the Attorney General of the United States, Hon. Frank Murphy, in his stand against corruption and his burning zeal to do something about the situation.

It is the unfortunate plight of America, in this period of chaos in world affairs, to become the jousting ground for the subversive forces which work against our best interests, even our national existence. That these may go beyond the ordinary espionage activities and into the realms of sabotage and the fomenting of outbreaks and riots is, of course, not beyond possibility. Such things have been tried before. They are a part of the plans of those who, like termites, bore from within. I need not tell you men of law and order that the underworld will take every advantage of the added burdens upon law-enforcing bodies. This is an inevitable certainty. Beyond that the minions of lawlessness will be used at every opportunity by those who seek to undermine our national defense.

Therefore, as a battleship's decks are cleared for action in the face of an enemy challenge, so must law enforcement be ready for any emergency, armed with the best of ideals, courage, personnel, and equipment.

The maintenance of law and order has always been one of our most important governmental functions, warranting the highest type of personnel and facilities that a community can provide. If your community has failed in its duty, it is now your solemn obligation to insist that the opportunities be provided whereby lecherous barnacles—the lazy officer, the corrupt officer, the cheating officer, or the ignorant officer—may be eliminated. Facilities long lacking must be made available if our people are to be protected. The handcuffs of corrupt politics must be struck from your wrists in order that you may be allowed to place the profession of law enforcement upon a high plane of efficiency, honesty, and integrity. Decency demands that this be done in every community in America.

To do this our profession in its entirety must be able to go before the public with clean hands. We must be able to prove, in asking that corrupt politics in law enforcement be cast aside, that we are not tainted by partisan political machinations. When we ask for cooperation and demand efficiency let us be sure that there are no cheap jealousies or lack of cooperation to weaken our case. Unfortunately, there is not enough cooperation among the law-enforcement bodies of America. Lip service does not suffice. There is too much petty jealousy among officers. There is too much eagerness to capture the headline instead of the criminal.

You men of experience can recount instance after instance of how a lack of cooperation has brought about added expense, difficulties of apprehension, and often the escape of a desperado. The chase of practically every major criminal has presented outstanding examples of unselfish effort of law-enforcement officers, eager to lift the banners of law and order above all other aims. At this time I would be remiss if I did not publicly express the appreciation of the F. B. I. for the efforts of those officers who have aided us in the discharge of our duties. And we have been proud of the opportunities which we have had in helping you.

Since we are frankly considering the problems and difficulties of law enforcement, let us examine another evil wrecker of popular public respect. I refer to the matter of corruption. There have been instances wherein vicious criminals, even professional murderers, have been allowed to go free by persons who blemished the name of law enforcement by calling themselves peace officers. It is true that law enforcement has been stifled by crooked politics.

Truthfully, no single criminal can correctly be given the title "Public Enemy No. 1." That appellation can be claimed only by "Old Man Corrupt Politics." And he lives in practically every community in the land. No officer can truly promote law enforcement when he follows the precepts of crooked politics and himself indulges in corruption, whether it be petty graft, the acceptance of bribes for the freeing of arrested men, or for the weakening of testimony in court or engaging in acts of criminality, which has been the case all too often, and is evidenced unfortunately by men in uniform having been convicted of every type of crime from petty thievery to bank robbery and rape.

It should be an inviolable rule that every law-enforcement officer in America should be fingerprinted before he is given a shield of authority, and those prints sent to the F. B. I. in Washington for search against the criminal records. Not until the International Association of Chiefs of Police goes on record as demanding this protection can it be truly said that the police departments of this country are making a determined effort to free the inner ranks of law enforcement from those destructive agents who do so much to stain its name.

It certainly should be no matter of pride to any of us when a chief of police is found to be a fugitive from justice or when ex-convicts are discovered in the ranks of law enforcement. The time long has passed when a thief should be set to catch a thief. Thieves and all other criminals can best be brought to justice by honest men. Only men of integrity and decency can shake the complacency of the underworld.

It must be taken for granted that the average law-enforcing body is most eager for improvement. Nevertheless, the status of the majority is lowered by those retrogressive bodies which still adhere to the outmoded and disproved theory that enforcement of law truly rests in the end of a night stick. Police training is now available to practically every law-enforcement officer in America who desires it. The F. B. I. National Police Academy already has graduated over 400 officers, the majority of whom are qualified police instructors. And the doors of the academy are open to every community in the Nation. The entire facilities of the F. B. I. are at the command of American law enforcement.

Yet it is a grievous fact that there are a number of communities which absolutely refuse to take advantage of police training. In others it has been found that certain officers have been sent to the National Police Academy as a mere sham and a sop to public opinion. They have gone there, many of them, under personal sacrifice; they have given of their time and their efforts and returned to their communities only to find themselves blocked at every turn by jealousies or by an absolute aversion to advancement in police methods. Sometimes the stumbling block has been an older officer, too set in his ways to admit that there is such a thing as scientific crime detection; but all too often the obstacle has been the intrusion of corrupt politics. In case after case the graduate has been shunted from one job to another, or pigeonholed with the promise of later activity, or the excuse of insufficient funds with which to conduct the necessary schools.

Why law enforcement, in certain instances, should deliberately and sometimes maliciously refuse to take the channels which inevitably will lead toward a weakening in the ranks of crime is more than any intelligent advocate of law and order possibly can understand. In spite of all this, however, progress has been constant and gradual, until today law enforcement is regarded as having surpassed all other public services in the advancements which it has made.

Consider for a moment the possibilities of the F. B. I. National Police Academy. The primary purpose of the F. B. I. National Police Academy is to train selected officers in order that they may return to their respective police organizations and impart the training received at Washington, D. C., to the members of their local departments. With the completion of the twelfth session of the F. B. I. National Police Academy, over 400 graduates have returned to their communities and have made instruction available to almost 100,000 police officers. In addition officials have graduated from the academy representing the Royal Canadian Mounted Police; the Quebec Provincial Police; New Scotland Yard, London, England; and the Shanghai municipal police, Shanghai, China.

I am happy to report that those officers attending the next session of the academy will be housed in a modern, air-conditioned barracks building at Quantico, Va., during their 3 months of training free of charge except for actual subsistence. In addition we are building the most modern pistol and rifle ranges at Quantico to be found anywhere in the world, where daily the Police Academy students may receive the finest training in all practical uses of firearms and protective devices known to law enforcement. The F. B. I. training center at Quantico fulfills a dream of many years—it establishes a veritable "West Point of law enforcement."

Certainly, here is the forerunner of a new day in law enforcement. Here is a tribute to the foresightedness of you outstanding officers who have cooperated so efficiently with the Bureau in this work. I am grateful to your Committee on Police Education and Training for its support of our training project and I desire to pay my respects to those officers who have attended the F. B. I. National Police Academy at great personal sacrifice. I cannot praise too highly the determination and absolute heroism of such men in continuing their studies against every possible effort to turn them from their chosen path.

Progress can come only in a lawful manner. No law-enforcement body which stoops to entrapment or illegal or unethical tactics can possibly deserve anything but contempt. The catching of a criminal is one thing, his conviction is another. No law enforcement body can call itself properly efficient unless it is so equipped that it can follow through in court what it has begun in the field of apprehension.

It has always been my belief that peace officers should fight for the right, not only in the actual apprehension or detection or conviction of offenders, but in all matters as well. It was for this reason that I subjected myself to the sneers and jeers of sentimental piffle-purveyors by decrying the scandals of parole. It has been for this reason that I have constantly abjured the average citizen to be ever alert in his own community for his own protection. An officer's sworn duty to himself should be to fight day and night, no matter what his hours of duty may be, for improvement of conditions about him. This means that passive inaction no longer can be tolerated.

The world today is in a death grapple for the preservation of democracy. It has been the record of history that dictatorships, whether in villages, states, or nations, have been founded upon gangster tactics. Our fight against dictatorships must begin at home—in every crossroads in the land. If a chief of police is hampered in his work by a venal politician then it is his duty to stand up like a man and let his community know that fact. If criminals go free because a prosecuting attorney is subject to bribe-taking, then it is a solemn obligation to get the evidence and prove this man to be what he is, for after all, a crook in public office is 10 times as devastating as any crook who ever roamed the underworld. There is no stain that can soil civilization more, no viciousness more deadly, no stench more vile, than that of a criminal who masquerades as a protector of his community.

There is a great need for wide extension of crime-prevention activities. One of the most important of all law-enforcement activities is the building of a closer bond of cordiality and of understanding between the law-enforcement officer and the child. There is no greater saving in life, property, or human qualities than that which comes in the prevention of crime. The subject must be approached scientifically and realistically. There is no place in it for the sob-sister or the charlatan, the fakir, or the quack. Neither is there any place for the weak-kneed "Caspar Milquetoast," who is unwilling to face the facts.

The youth problem in crime is a national disgrace. The figures compiled by the Federal Bureau of Investigation must make one stop and think. They point to a definite increase in youthful criminals. So far this year more persons 19 years of age have been arrested than of any other age. They are closely followed by the 18-year-olds. It is not pleasant to walk through any penal institution or jail in America and look into endless rows of youthful faces. Over 19 percent of all persons arrested this year have been under voting age. These individuals constitute 12 percent of all murderers arrested, 29 percent of all robbers, 46 percent of all burglars, 33 percent of all thieves, and 54 percent of all automobile thieves. We cannot dodge the issue or argue that these facts result from youthful folly. America no longer can refuse to face the causes behind this rising tide of juvenile crime. It is a definite challenge.

I have been condemned for insisting upon bringing to light many phases of youthful crime, and because I have dared to speak the truth—that crime rests at the doorstep of the American home. Some individuals believe we should keep all of this behind a curtain, but I insist that no concealed evil can be remedied. The way to cure a plague is by quarantine, by ferreting out the carriers of disease and either eradicating them, or placing them where they cannot infect the populace. The same realistic approach to crime prevention must be made.

I believe the time is approaching, unless we block it, when the subject of probation will be open to as many charges of scandal as that of parole. This applies particularly to the power which certain judges have taken upon themselves, either through egotism, sentimentalism, corrupt politics, or other causes, to decide whether or not a man should serve his sentence or ever be tried. I have the case before me of a motor thief, who was not even taken into court because a judge decided that the case was merely one of youthful folly. In another instance a teacher—an instructor of youth—was found quite by accident to have a criminal record, which included embezzlement and the forgery of United States Treasury checks. Yet she had never served a day of her sentence. In another case a bank embezzler who stole Christmas and vacation savings was allowed to go free on probation after serving a 1-day sentence. Again, a bank official, who, it is estimated, stole more than $100,000, walked out of court without serving a day, having been put on probation. Such perversions of ordinary justice poison the springs of public confidence in law enforcement.

Not for a moment must we lose sight of the fact that sure detection, swift apprehension, and certain punishment are the three time-proven ingredients which provide a remedy for crime. Any weakening in this attitude places us at the mercy of the underworld. We are constantly surrounded by nitwits and porous-brained sentimentalists who, either through powder-puff perspective or actual affiliation with the criminal element, seek to undermine the foundations upon which we must stand if we are to protect the American home.

Just why certain individuals who intrude themselves upon law enforcement seem to give the major part of their attention to getting criminals out of prison instead of putting them there, where they deserve to be, is a mystery we never will be able to solve. We must fight them with every atom of strength we possess and bestow upon them the contumely they deserve as first aids to crime. There must be a rededication to not only fight crime but to prevent crime.

I have said before and I say again—America has room for only one ism—Americanism. All other isms are inimical to the best interests of our Nation. Let no smoke screen descend upon you, blinding your vision from the pitfalls that lie ahead. Let there be no misunderstanding as to the meaning of true Americanism. It is an abiding adherence to our democracy that sprang from the Declaration of Independence and is defined by the Bill of Rights and the Constitution. Loyalty to those principles is Americanism.

Its ideals are translated in a wholesome respect and obedience to the laws of the land. It is holding high the banners of law and order. Americanism represents liberty. It is respect for all nations without entangling alliances. It is free worship without bigotry. It is truth without distortion of fact. Americanism is love for our time-honored institutions. Americanism is that desire, that willingness, that determination that motivates our citizens to stand ready to defend our liberty against every subversive force, whether it come from within or without. Again, I say, our spacious land is big enough only for the one true ism—Americanism—first, last, and always.

The maintenance of law and constituted authority is our surest and safest protection against the scheming aggression of the unlawful and godless enemies of the stability of our social order. Let us keep a united front for its preservation.

Repeal of Present Neutrality Act

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LEWIS B. SCHWELLENBACH

OF WASHINGTON

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, October 11 (legislative day of Wednesday, October 4), 1939

ADDRESS BY JAMES W. RYAN, ESQ.

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. Mr. President, yesterday at Columbia University Law School, James W. Ryan, Esq., a noted New York lawyer and member of the International Law Division of the American Bar Association, delivered an interesting address on the legal phases of the pending neutrality legislation. I ask unanimous consent that the address may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The question we are to discuss today more vitally affects our national life than any question that has arisen since we entered the World War. It involves a charge that by exercising our right as a neutral nation to carry on our national economic life by offering to trade on a commercial basis on equal cash terms with all belligerents we are aiding or making a gift to one belligerent which is an unneutral act and is, therefore, proper cause for war being declared against us. That is a charge that is so important, because involving the great issue of life and death, that it is worthy of the most profound intellectual efforts of which we are capable. It is a charge that is so serious that it can properly be discussed only with the utmost sincerity. After much consideration of the law and the facts in this matter, I am firmly convinced that that charge is unwarranted, and I feel honored to have the opportunity of presenting the results of my consideration to the incoming generation of lawyers, judges, and national leaders represented in this meeting of Columbia University Law School.

The charge that the intent of Congress in the new neutrality statute or Pittman-Connally bill is to aid or make a gift to one of the belligerents is in effect a charge that the American people, speaking through Congress, intend to take sides and mix in the war. The obvious answer to this is that the American people have no intention of taking sides or mixing in the war. Every poll of public opinion that has been taken shows this almost unanimously. And not one of the supporters in Congress of the new statute has stated that it is his or his constituents' intent by the new statute to aid or make a gift to one of the belligerents or to refuse to trade on the same commercial terms with all belligerents. A careful examination also of the President's message to Congress and of the newspapers and of the Government's press releases shows that neither the President nor any other official in the executive departments or administration has ever stated that that is the intent of the new statute. On the contrary, the supporters of the new statute in Congress and those in the administration who have made public statements have expressly disclaimed any such intent and have given precise and adequate grounds in furtherance of our national defense and security, and in furtherance of our concern to act strictly in accordance with the laws of neutrality, as their reasons for support. And as Congress and not the Executive is the legislative body, any possible expression by executive officials of intent or reasons for their supporting the new statute would be immaterial on the question of intent of the American people when expressing themselves through Congress.[1] I am astonished at the lack of knowledge of fundamental legal rules and of the provisions of the Constitution of the United States displayed by many of those opposing repeal with respect to this indisputable fact.

The continued assertion that the individual sympathies or opinions of the President or other administration officials determine the intent of Congress, no matter what Congress' real or expressed intent is, tends further to becloud the real issues and confuse the public mind and improperly embarrasses our country in its relations with foreign countries. Perhaps I should not bear too heavily on the general run of opponents of repeal in this connection, because the real responsibility in history will rest on Senators BORAH, NYE, and VANDENBERG for not correctly stating the material facts and issues involved. It is immaterial that such mistake was made in good faith and from lack of proper consideration and analysis of the matter. The important thing now, however, is for the people and Congress to avoid being distracted by irrelevancies and to get down to serious and careful consideration and discussion of the real issue, whether or not the new statute will most effectively further our national defense, security, and interests. As I shall endeavor to show, international law has nothing whatever to do with this real matter under consideration, and the less said about international law the better if we are to think clearly, avoid unnecessary controversy with foreign governments on irrelevant issues, and reach a sound result in accord with our urgent national interests of self-preservation and not in violation of any law or rule or fairness, international or otherwise. The rights of self-preservation and of security and self-defense are unchallengeable fundamentals in international law and in every branch of jurisprudence and field of human conduct.

Furthermore, there are well-settled rules of law for determining the intent of Congress or other legislative body in a statute, and these rules are known by every competent lawyer and are applied invariably by the courts. Any international tribunal or other court would as matter of ordinary course follow these rules both because they are well-settled law and because they are necessary rules based on clarity and integrity in thinking and reasoning. If the language of the statute is clear and unambiguous, the intent of the legislative body as expressed in the statute is unassailable.[2] Bad faith or insincerity cannot be charged against the whole American people or against the people of any other great democratic nation when represented and acting through vote of the majority of their elected representatives in a legislative body or congress and clearly expressing their intent in a statute.[3] Good faith of the entire nation when so acting is presumed. The language of the new statute is clear and unambiguous and falls within this rule. The law is equally well settled that if the language of a statute is ambiguous or not clear, the interpretation which accords with law is to be accepted.[4] The Supreme Court has held that international law is part of our law and of the law of every civilized country.[5] An unneutral act is a violation of international law. Therefore the new statute, even if ambiguous, would fall within this rule of interpretation that Congress intends no unlawful or unneutral act.

[1] Cf. the Supreme Court's decisions that in construing an act of Congress the intent of the executive departments is immaterial excepting that where an ambiguously worded statute is involved an administrative interpretation made by those departments during enforcement and continued for 10 or 15 years will be followed by the courts (Texas & P. R. Co. v. United States, 289 U. S. 627; Alexander v. Cosden Pipe Line Co., 290 U. S. 484; United States v. Missouri P. R. Co., 278 U. S. 269; United States v. Jackson, 280 U. S. 183; United States v. Farrar, 281 U. S. 624; Norwegian Nitrogen Products Co. v. United States, 288 U. S. 294; Constanzo v. Tillinghast, 287 U. S. 341).

The law is also well settled that when the language of a statute is not clear the court will examine and accept the intent as expressed in the congressional committee reports recommending passage of the bill and the other statements of intent made by the Senators and Congressmen who supported the bill in Congress.[6] The new statute also falls within this rule because the report of the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations and the statements of the Senators supporting the bill show that the intent is not to commit an unneutral act or to aid or favor one belligerent as against another, or to otherwise mix in the war, but is "to preserve the neutrality and the peace of the United States and to secure the safety of its citizens and their interests" (p. 1 of Senate Committee on Foreign Relations Report, Sept. 29, 1939). The intent has also been stated by supporters of the new statute in Congress as being to further our national defense and security by accelerating and increasing our industrial capacity in the production of armaments to meet our own armament needs for national defense and to prevent large industries of that kind now in the United States and essential to our national defense from moving to Canada or other foreign country because of the unfortunate embargo provisions of our old Neutrality Act which interfere with plant operation on a mass-production basis and reduce the capacity or unit rate of plant production per month. And aside from this benefit of increased production for our own needs conjointly with the increased export trade there is the decisive fact, which those opposing the new neutrality statute entirely overlook, that our Government, as the territorial sovereign, can and will take over the newly enlarged armament plants and their products exclusively for our own national-defense needs at any time that such action becomes desirable or necessary. Laws already on the books (National Defense Act of June 3, 1916, U. S. C., title 50, sec. 80, 39 Stat. 213–214; National Defense Act of 1920; Acquisition of Stocks of Strategic Materials Act of June 7, 1939, ch. 190; and Naval Appropriation Act of March 4, 1917; and see Industrial Mobilization Plan, Revision of 1939, as released by the War Department)[7] become effective immediately in any national emergency and authorize the President to require all armament plants and other businesses located in this country to produce all the war materials we need for our own country's use before producing them for anyone else. The new neutrality statute therefore enormously increases our military strength without requiring any appropriation from Congress or additional burden on our taxpayers. The intent of the new statute has been further stated as being, by repealing the present Neutrality Act, to eliminate a wholly unintended and unneutral result flowing from that act by stopping our giving aid and special privilege to and unfairly discriminating in favor of one of the belligerents who happens to be the aggressor who started the war. Right now, for no good reason of national interest, we are refusing to trade on a strictly commercial basis with countries who are in desperate need of our products and with whom, until the present embargo statute became practically effective a month ago, we had maintained friendly trading relations for more than a hundred years. Indeed, they have been our largest and best customers for so long that friendly trade with them has become an essential part of our national life.

These purposes that I have mentioned, which the American people and the supporters in Congress of the new statute desire furthered, are all legitimate purposes under international law and in no way conflict with our duty as a neutral. The mere fact that a foreign aggressor starts a war with another foreign country does not deprive us of those rights or freeze them so that they cannot be later asserted in a form not in conflict with the settled rules of international law. No foreign country or belligerent has the right or power to determine our national policy, or what is the same thing—to prevent us from changing our national policy as our national interests require at any time, provided we do not actively aid one of the belligerents and unfairly discriminate against the other.

As the clearly expressed intent of the new statute is to further our national defense and security, and maintain our neutrality by offering equal trading opportunity to both belligerents, it is immaterial that one of its minor or incidental effects is an economic benefit to one belligerent, resulting solely from the temporary inability of the other belligerent to send ships to us to buy and carry away the goods which we are offering to sell on the same terms to both belligerents. A neutral is under no duty to try to equalize the trading abilities of the belligerents. On August 12, 1915, Secretary of State Lansing, in a letter to the Austro-Hungarian Ambassador (State Department Document 113 of 1915), repudiated the "novel principle" that neutral nations are obligated to place an embargo on arms and ammunition because one of the belligerents cannot obtain them through commercial intercourse.[8] And trading with a belligerent has never been regarded as aiding or granting a favor or special privilege to that belligerent, provided the offer to trade is made to both belligerents on equal terms.

The statements in Congress by opponents of a bill, such as by Senators BORAH, NYE, and VANDENBURG in this instance, are of no weight or value in determining the intent of the supporters of the bill or of the majority in Congress voting for it.[9] This is a reasonable and necessary rule because it is common human experience that opponents of a measure have a tendency to state inaccurately the purpose or intent of their opponents, or to, if possible, further their own opposition or cause by charging bad faith or improper motives to their opponents, and thus draw a red herring across the trail of the real issue being discussed. A necessary curb on this tendency, especially in a legislative body, is to be impartial by accepting, in the absence of the clearest evidence of insincerity or bad faith, only the statements of supporters of a cause with respect to what the intentions of those supporters are, and with respect to the evil or problem of public interest which they see and which they are dealing with, and the remedy which they propose for the purpose of furthering that public interest or overcoming that evil. To charge a man or a people with an intention which they disclaim is to charge them with bad faith and imposes on the accuser a heavy burden of producing clear and convincing evidence to support the accusation. I have been unable to find in the present instance any such evidence which a court applying ordinary and reasonable legal rules and criterions would regard as admissible. Certainly the speculations of newspaper columnists regarding unexpressed administration intention, and the spontaneous expressions from time to time by individuals of natural human sympathy with an unjustly attacked people, do not constitute such evidence.

To anyone trained in weighing and assessing the proper value of evidence, or in historical or legal research on a scholarly basis, such scattered expressions of individual sympathy on humanitarian grounds are wholly extraneous to the evidence and facts necessary to be considered in determining the intent of a plainly worded statute designed to further our national defense and security and to maintain strictly our neutrality under the settled rules of international law. This being the state of the evidence, it borders on treason[10] and is detrimental to the welfare of the country to make an accusation of bad faith against a majority of Congress or the people in a national emergency when danger of war exists, and it further interferes with proper operation of the democratic process

---

[2] Re Kearney (7 Wheat. (U. S.) 38); George Van Camp & Sons Co. v. American Can Co. (278 U. S. 245); Matson Nav. Co. v. United States (284 U. S. 352); Magoun v. Illinois Trust & Sav. Bank (170 U. S. 283); United States v. Shreveport Grain Co. (287 U. S. 77); United States v. Raynor (302 U. S. 540); Helvering v. City Bank Farmers Trust Co. (296 U. S. 85); Humphrey v. United States (295 U. S. 602); Helvering v. New York Trust Co. (292 U. S. 455).

[3] Florida C. & P. R. Co. v. Reynolds (183 U. S. 471; Middleton v. Texas Power & Light Co. (249 U. S. 152); License Tax Cases (5 Wall. (U. S.) 462); Talbot v. Seeman (1 Cranch (U. S.) 1); East Saginaw Salt Mfg. Co. v. East Saginaw (13 Wall. (U. S.) 373); Planters' Bank v. Sharp (6 How. (U. S.) 301); Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Matthews (174 U. S. 96); Whitney v. United States (274 U. S. 357); Bird v. United States (187 U. S. 118).

[4] Chippewa Indians v. United States (301 U. S. 358); Anniston Mfg. Co. v. Davis (301 U. S. 337); National Labor Relations Board v. Jones & Laughlin Steel Co. (301 U. S. 1); Porter v. Investors' Syndicate (286 U. S. 461); United States v. Coombs (12 Peters (U. S.) 72); Russian Volunteer Fleet v. United States (282 U. S. 481); Federal Trade Comm. v. American Tobacco Co. (264 U. S. 298); Carey v. South Dakota (250 U. S. 118); Standard Oil v. Missouri (224 U. S. 270); Hylton v. United States (3 Dall. (U. S.) 171); United States v. Gue Lim (176 U. S. 459); Crowell v. Benson (285 U. S. 22); Richmond Screw Anchor Co. v. United States (275 U. S. 331); Reinecke v. Northern Trust Co. (278 U. S. 339); Northwestern Bell Telephone Co. v. Nebraska Co. (297 U. S. 373); Ann Arbor R. Co. v. United States (281 U. S. 658); United States v. La France (282 U. S. 568); Sproles v. Bedford (286 U. S. 374); Posades v. National City Bank (296 U. S. 497).

[5] The Paquete Habana (175 U. S. 677); Kansas v. Colorado (206 U. S. 46); Hilton v. Guyot (159 U. S. 113); Ware v. Hylton, 3 Dallas (U. S. 199); Shanks v. Dupont, 3 Peters (U. S. 242); Seton, Maitland & Co. v. Low, 1 Johns (N. Y.) 1, 5 (Kent, J.).

[6] Richbourg Motor Co. v. United States (281 U. S. 528); United States v. Great Northern R. Co. (287 U. S. 144); Wright v. Mountain Trust Bank (300 U. S. 440); Humphrey v. United States (295 U. S. 602); Atlantic Cleaners & Dyers v. United States (286 U. S. 427); Helvering v. Twin Ball Oil Syndicate (293 U. S. 312); Matson Nav. Co. v. United States (284 U. S. 352); McFeely v. Commr. of Internal Revenue (296 U. S. 102).

[7] Industrial Mobilization Plan, 1939 Revision, War Department Commerce Clearing House War Law Service, p. 50051.

[8] State Department Document 113 of 1915, Policy of United States Toward Maritime Commerce in War, 1914–18, vol. 2, p. 42.

[9] McCaughn v. Hersey Chocolate Co. (283 U. S. 483); Federal Trade Commr. v. Raladam Co. (283 U. S. 643); Wright v. Mountain Trust Bank (300 U. S. 440); United States v. Great Northern R. Co. (287 U. S. 144); Helvering v. Twin Ball Oil Syndicate (293 U. S. 312).

[10] It would certainly be a violation of the Sedition Act of 1798, passed during President Adams' administration.

by putting public discussion on an unsound basis. The constitutional right of free speech does not give the right of irresponsible attack on the good faith of our country not based on any substantial evidence which a court or reasonable man would accept.

So far as I have been able to ascertain, no one has questioned our right as a neutral to permit our citizens to trade with belligerents in any and all kinds of goods. There is no rule of international law prohibiting our doing so.[11] Indeed, that right cannot seriously be questioned, because our country and all other countries have always asserted it and have in almost every instance exercised it.[12] Article 7 of Hague Convention V of 1907 expressly recognizes the right. The charge is that we had that right and would have it still excepting for the fact that certain belligerents started a war, and at that time we were not asserting or exercising the right. As the right could be exercised only during a war, it is difficult to understand on what intelligent or logical basis a charge can be made that failure to exercise a right at a time when it could not be exercised constitutes a waiver of that right. There is surely no support in American jurisprudence or in any foreign jurisprudence with which I am familiar for a contention that a legal right is waived or abandoned by failure to exercise it in a situation in which there is no reasonable opportunity to exercise it. Furthermore, waiver of legal rights, like laches, election, and the statute of limitations, to which it bears a close resemblance, is not favored by the law. The rule of waiver originated in the English common law and, so far as careful research discloses, although applied in rare and so-called "hard" cases in our municipal law, has never been recognized as a part of international law. The rule of abandonment is also inapplicable. Under that rule the abandonment or failure to assert rights must have continued for such a long period of time, measured in years or decades, that every reasonable possibility of intent to assert the rights has been excluded by necessary inference by the great and wholly inexcusable delay in asserting them. The 1 month's delay since the war started in asserting our right is of no significance, because that was a necessary and incidental delay required to get Congress together, and is a wholly insufficient period of time on which to base a claim of implied intent to abandon legal rights. Any other interpretation would deprive democracies of most of their rights under international law. Only a dictatorship can act instantaneously.

Moreover, intent to commit an act is never equivalent to commission of the act itself.[13] Therefore, even if there were an intent to aid or make a gift to one of the belligerents, that would not be an unneutral act unless what was done constituted an aid or gift. A careful reading of the new statute discloses that there is no language in it which on any possible legal construction could be regarded as constituting an aid or gift to a belligerent or to anybody. It is limited to authorizing trading on a commercial basis with all belligerents. If a shopkeeper sells you a hat, he doesn't aid you or make you a gift of it; he sells it to you for value received, in exchange for its purchase price. When a country trades on a commercial basis with another country it isn't giving away anything. It is taking an equivalent for what it sells or delivers. The contention that by merely trading on a commercial basis with another nation we are aiding it or making a gift to it is novel and ingenious but without support so far as I have been able to find in either municipal law or international law. Indeed, Hague Convention V, concerning the rights and duties of neutral powers and persons in case of war on land, signed at The Hague on October 18, 1907 (36 U. S. Stat. L. 2310), to which both Germany and the United States were parties, expressly provides to the contrary in chapter III, as follows:

"ARTICLE 17: A neutral cannot avail himself of his neutrality—

"(a) If he commits hostile acts against a belligerent.

"(b) If he commits acts in favor of a belligerent, particularly if he voluntarily enlists in the ranks of the armed force of one of the parties * * *.

"Article 18: The following acts shall not be considered as committed in favor of one belligerent in the sense of article 17, letter (b):

"(a) Supplies furnished or loans made to one of the belligerents, provided that the person who furnishes the supplies or who makes the loans lives neither in the territory of the other party nor in the territory occupied by it, and that the supplies do not come from these territories; * * *."

Simply because two nations declare war against each other is no reason why the economic life of neutral countries should be destroyed or impaired by shutting off their commerce with the warring countries on which the neutral's national life in large part depends. Certainly this is so when the neutral is a large trading nation like our own and not committed to a nationally self-sufficient policy excluding commerce with other countries. If a nation trades in time of peace with one country rather than another, it is no ground for that other nation declaring war. There is no reason for any different rule in time of war. But the new statute is not subject to that kind of attack, because authority is expressly given by it to trade with all belligerents on the same terms. The new statute is not shutting off any trade between Germany and the United States. Indeed, the fact is that Germany in substance shut off that trade long before this war started by engaging in the barter system with other countries than ours and by imposing tremendous and almost insuperable obstacles to normal commercial trading with us. The 90-day credit provision in the new statute is the normal credit extended in commercial transactions of this kind both during peace and war and does not constitute a gift or loan without financial value received. And, anyway, that credit provision is not of the essence of the new statute.

The charge that the new statute aids or makes a gift to one of the belligerents is made in still another form. It is charged that international law prohibits our trading with belligerents in armaments because a month ago when the war started we were not trading with them or permitted by act of Congress to trade. The charge in substance is that an act of Congress or national legislation has enlarged or restricted international law or our rights under that law. This conflicts with the settled rule that no single nation's statute can amend or repeal international law. The charge further implies that Congress' power in furtherance of our national defense or interests over questions closely connected with war or peace is reduced or impaired and made impossible of exercise merely because a foreign aggressor has started a war against another foreign country. It is further urged in support of this charge that in a few isolated instances Secretary of State William Jennings Bryan and others have disclaimed the right to change the national policy of a neutral during the progress of a war for the purpose of aiding one of the belligerents. Of course, the tacking on of the words "for the purpose of aiding one of the belligerents" begs the question and makes those precedents irrelevant to the present discussion, in which that fact is not established. Moreover, those instances are outnumbered by the instances in which our country, while neutral, has changed its national policy during the progress of war, more particularly during the Napoleonic wars extending from 1792 to 1814 (with one short intermission), and during the World War in the period from 1914 to 1917, and by the instances in which other neutral countries have changed their policies during war. While neutral we changed our national policy and lifted or imposed embargoes during the progress of a war in 1793,[14] 1794,[15] 1795,[16] 1806,[17] 1807,[18] 1808,[19] 1809,[20] 1810,[21] 1811,[22] 1812 (2 months before June 18, 1812, when war was declared against [11] Department of State announcements on October 25, 1914 (State Department Doc. 20), and on January 20, 1915 (State Department Doc. 44; Policy of United States Toward Maritime Commerce in War, 1914–18, vol. 2, pp. 40–41).

---

[12] Hague Convention V, August 18, 1907 (36 U. S. Stats. at L. 2310), to which Germany and the United States were parties, Article 7: "A neutral power is not called upon to prevent the export or transport on behalf of one or other of the belligerents, of arms, munitions of war, or in general, of anything which can be of use to an army or fleet." (Senate Document, vol. 48, p. 2298, 61st Cong., 2d sess). Wheaton's elements of International Law (1904 ed., p. 671); Kent's Commentaries (vol. 1, p. 142); Seton, Maitland & Co. v. Low (1 Johns (N. Y.) 1, 5 (Kent, J.); Northern Pacific Ry. Co. v. American Trading Co. (195 U. S. 439); Kerr, Principles and Rules of Neutrality (2 Jurid. Soc. Papers, 629, 634); Hague Convention V, 1907, articles 7, 8, and 9 (36 U. S. Stats. at L. 2310, 2323); Hague Convention XIII, 1907, articles 6 and 7 (38 U. S. Stats. at L. 2415, 2428).

[13] Marine Ins. Co. v. Tucker (3 Cranch (U. S.) 357).

[14] Statement of legal adviser, State Department, to Senate Committee on Foreign Relations in 1936 at hearings in connection with the present Neutrality Act.

[15] The instructions of Secretary of State Randolph of May 6, 1794, to John Jay in regard to our position with respect to the rules of neutral commerce (State Department Doc. 29 of 1794, p. 183) were changed "greatly" in the treaty we entered into with Great Britain on November 19, 1794 (State Department Doc, 31 of 1794, p. 131). Policy of United States Toward Maritime Commerce in War, 1914–18 (vol. 1, pp. 14, 15). "France soon protested that this treaty violated the treaty of 1778" (ibid., vol. 1, p. 15). "The result was a stipulation (by Great Britain) that wherever provisions and other articles not generally contraband should become so, and for that reason should be seized, they should not be confiscated, but paid for. * * * He (Secretary of State Randolph) stated that the effect of this clause would be to encourage trade in provisions with France, as in the event of either arrival or capture the American merchant was assured a profitable voyage" (ibid., vol. 1, p. 16).

[16] The change of policy evidenced in our entering into the treaty of October 27, 1795, with Spain (State Department Doc. 68, p. 298). "The treaty was even more favorable to neutral commerce than the plan (of 1776), because it included no statement that enemy ships should take enemy goods." (Policy of United States Toward Maritime Commerce in War, 1914–18, vol. 1, p. 17.)

[17] Nicholson Act or First Nonimportation Act of 1806, prohibiting importation of various kinds of British goods.

[18] Embargo Act of December 22, 1807 (cf. The William King, 2 Wheat. (U. S.) 148), prohibiting American ships from leaving port on any foreign voyage and prohibiting foreign vessels from carrying any goods from American ports.

[19] Supplementary Embargo Act of January 9, 1808 (2 U. S. Stats. at L. 453).

[20] Nonintercourse Act of 1809, permitting trade with any country excepting the two belligerents, England and France.

[21] Macon Act of May 1, 1810, providing that as soon as Great Britain or France withdraws its decrees against our shipping the Nonintercourse Act would be revived against the other country.

[22] President Madison's two proclamations, one putting the Nonintercourse Act into effect again only with respect to England, and the other withdrawing that proclamation.

England),[23] 1914,[24] 1915,[25] 1916,[26] March 12, 1917,[27] and 1934,[28] Germany while neutral changed her policy during the progress of the Crimean War between England and Russia, and in 1870 asked England to change her policy during the Franco-Prussian War, and in 1914 and again in 1915 asked us[29] to change our policy during the progress of the World War. Austria-Hungary made the same request of us on June 29, 1915.[30] Spain while neutral changed her policy during the war of 1798.[31] The few instances cited to show invalidity are therefore insufficient to show a settled rule of international law and are rather exceptions to the rule than the rule itself. In none of the instances that I have mentioned in which neutrals changed their national policies during war did the change of policy result in bringing the neutral into war. The two instances which alone have been found and cited by Professor Jessup were instances in which the change of policy consisted in giving direct aid to one of the belligerents, and the result was merely the presenting of claims for damages after the wars had ended. One claim, that of the United States against England for breach of neutrality during the Civil War, was settled in 1873, and the other, England's claim against us for breach of neutral duties during the Napoleonic wars, was also settled after the war had ended. A careful examination of the facts in both of those instances shows that the breach of neutral duty involved was far different from anything that could reasonably be conceived of in connection with the new neutrality statute which Congress is now considering. Furthermore, those instances indicate that if the new statute authorized a direct aid or gift to one of the belligerents, and such gift were actually made, all that we would probably be confronted with would be a claim for such damages as the other belligerent could show after the war had directly resulted to it from our alleged breach of neutrality. All remote, inconsequential, and indirect damages would be nonrecoverable.

Looking at the whole matter therefore in the light of all the rules of international law, and of all the various conflicting precedents and statements of position not yet incorporated into international law, it is clear that the new statute does not constitute a violation of a neutral's duty as defined by international law or as defined by the rules of fair commercial trading between nations. It is important to note that in no case in which our Secretary of State has admitted that a neutral could not change its policy during war was there any set of facts presented such as exists in the present case, nor was there any situation presented which required him or our Government to make a determination or take a formal position in the matter. Bryan, in 1914 and in 1915, for instance, could and should have answered Germany's requests[32] that we change our policy during war by making the same reply that was made on August 12, 1915,[33] to a similar request by Austria-Hungary—namely, by merely declining to do so on the grounds that our existing policy did not violate international law and was the one which our Government regarded as best protecting our interests and maintaining our neutrality.[34] Such refusal would of course not be an admission or contention that we had no right to change our policy if in our Government's judgment our national interests of defense, security, or neutrality required it. In other words, what was said by the Secretary of State on those occasions was what in a court's opinion we would call dicta, and not necessary or essential to a decision of the matter presented. None of them therefore constitutes what in law would be regarded as a legal precedent, and even if they did those few precedents never became settled rules of international law and were overruled by later and more numerous precedents to the contrary. Not only is there no legal precedent but also there is, so far as careful search has disclosed, no statement in any standard publication on international law which supports the attack being made on the new statute. The nearest such statement is the one quoted by Professor Jessup, from the neutrality report, prepared largely by himself, of the Harvard Research in International Law, at page 316, where, without any citation of authority to support it, it is said:

"The task confronting the neutral state which takes action under this article (permitting changes during war to safeguard its neutral rights or to fulfill its neutral duties) is to make certain to itself and clear to other states that the motive inducing the adoption of a new rule or regulation, during the course of a war, is the product of its concern to act strictly in accordance with the laws of neutrality and not the result of a desire to aid one or the other belligerent."

That quotation is far from supporting the opposition to the new statute because it assumes that the purpose of the new law, or change of policy, is a "desire to aid one or the other belligerent." Indeed, Professor Jessup now admits that the new statute is valid and proper provided its intent or purpose is not to assist one belligerent side. He admits specifically that changes in a neutral's laws and regulations in time of war are not a breach of international law unless made with intent or purpose to assist one of the belligerents.[35] In view of that admission it is certainly incumbent on him to sustain the burden of establishing that the intent or purpose of the new statute is to assist one belligerent side, and nothing he has yet said or published seems to me to constitute a production of evidence or facts showing that that is Congress' intent or purpose in the new statute. Yet every statement he makes assumes that he has established that fact. He repeatedly stresses two factors—governmental control already achieved by act of Congress, and governmental desire to relax that control during progress of a war so as to help France and England.[35] The words "so as to help France and England" are pure assumption and require evidence which under recognized legal principles would be sufficient to establish them. Such statements and evidence as he has produced are clearly insufficient under either municipal law or international law to establish that fact of intent to aid France and England.

Professor Jessup asks whether those favoring repeal of the present neutrality statute would favor repeal if the situation were what he calls the reverse of what it is and if repeal would aid Germany instead of the Allies.[35] That way of putting the matter is merely another begging of the question and is not the reverse of the present situation. Of course, the American people do not wish to enter the war by aiding or making a gift to Germany any more than they wish to do so by making a gift to England. The real answer to his question is that irrespective of what any foreign country wants or needs we intend at all times, while keeping within the rules of international law, to exercise our right to trade on a commercial basis with all belligerents and to supply our own Nation's needs for security and adequate defense, and that is what the new neutrality statute will do.

Professor Jessup fails therefore on all three essential questions in dispute: First, whether evidence exists which is sufficient under recognized legal principles to establish that the intent of Congress in the new statute is to aid one of the belligerents and unfairly discriminate against the other; second, whether there has been a waiver of, or intent to abandon, the trading rights which he admits

---

[23] Embargo Act of 1812.

[24] Change of policy regarding armed merchant vessels visiting our ports. Letter of September 19, 1914, and November 7, 1914, from Acting Secretary of State Lansing to German Ambassador. (J. B. Scott's Diplomatic Correspondence Between United States and Germany, 1914–17, pp. 116–120), compared with letter of January 18, 1916, from Secretary of State Lansing to British and French Ambassadors, and with our actual reversal of that policy beginning shortly afterward as stated in Secretary of State Lansing's War Memoirs (cf. the Nercida, 9 Cranch (U. S.) 388).

[25] Secretary of State's letter of October 22, 1914, to the British Ambassador (State Department Doc. 26), repudiating our previous statement that the Declaration of London of February 26, 1909, which had already been accepted at our request by Germany and Austria, defined the duties of neutrals which the United States would follow. Policy of United States Toward Maritime Commerce in War, 1914–18 (Department of State publication, vol. 2, pp. 8 and 9).

New Working Arrangement Between United States and Great Britain of December 6, 1914 (State Department Doc. 37), changing our duties as a neutral as previously accepted and observed.

[26] State Department Documents 178, 201, 203, 204, and 211 of 1916. Also, on November 11, 1916, "after a lapse of 7 months, Secretary Lansing stated the position of the United States in regard to the contraband policy of the Allies" (Policy of United States Toward Maritime Commerce in War, 1914–18, vol. 2, p. 38).

[27] Department of State announcement of armed neutrality on March 12, 1917 (State Department Document 240 of 1917), that the United States was placing an armed guard on all American merchant vessels. Policy of United States Toward Maritime Commerce in War, 1914–18, vol. 2, p. 84. (At the time Congress convened in extra session on April 2, 1917, 66 American citizens had been killed as a result of submarine attacks on American vessels. Policy of United States Toward Maritime Commerce in War, 1914–18, vol. 2, p. 85).

[28] Arms Embargo Act of May 28, 1934, during war between Bolivia and Paraguay.

[29] Letter of German Ambassador of April 4, 1915, to Secretary of State (J. B. Scott's Diplomatic Correspondence Between United States and Germany, 1914–17, Oxford University Press, 1918, pp. 152–153): "This industry (the American maritime industry) is actually delivering goods only to the enemies of Germany. * * * If it is the will of the American people that there shall be a true neutrality, the United States will find means of preventing this one-sided supply of arms or at least of utilizing it to protect legitimate trade with Germany, especially that in foodstuffs. This view of neutrality should all the more appeal to the United States Government because the latter enacted a similar policy toward Mexico. * * * If this view were applied to the present case, it would lead to an embargo on the exportation of arms."

[30] State Department Document 99, Policy of United States Toward Maritime Commerce in War, 1914–18, vol. 2, p. 41.

[31] N. W. Stephenson's History of the American People (1934), p. 364.

[32] Letter of German Ambassador of April 5, 1915, to Secretary of State (J. B. Scott's Diplomatic Correspondence Between United States and Germany, 1914–17, p. 177).

[33] State Department Document 113 of 1915, Policy of United States Toward Maritime Commerce in War, 1914–18, vol. 2, p. 42.

[34] Letter of April 21, 1915, from Secretary of State William Jennings Bryan to German Ambassador (Foreign Relations, 1915, supp., p. 160; Policy of U. S. Toward Maritime Commerce in War, 1914–18, vol. 2, pp. 297–299).

[35] Letter, Philip C. Jessup and Charles Cheney Hyde, New York Times, October 5, 1939, p. 22.

we had at the outbreak of the war; and, third, whether the commercial trading with belligerents which is authorized by Congress in the new statute constitutes an actual aiding or making of a gift to one of the belligerents.

One of the longest established rules of the international law of war is the rule recognizing the right of a neutral's citizens to trade or not trade with belligerents as the neutral desires, or as its national interest requires, provided there is willingness to trade or not trade with both belligerents on the same terms.[36] If it keeps within that rule, a neutral is not chargeable either with a casus belli or a hostile or discriminatory act on which diplomatic protest would be warranted.

In other words, the matter of a neutral nation's deciding to permit its citizens to sell or not sell arms or other goods to belligerents is one which is entirely outside the recognized rules of international law, and therefore a decision one way or the other on that matter does not violate them.

Of course, this does not mean that a neutral can give money, or give direct economic aid, without financial value received to one belligerent to the exclusion of the other. That would be a casus belli. But so long as the transactions are of a strictly commercial nature, involving two-way benefits, there is no basis whatever for criticizing them on the ground that they violate international law, provided the neutral authorizes trade on the same terms with both belligerents.

If one of the belligerents is unable, because of weaker military force or temporary lack of vessels or naval command of the seas, to continue commercial trading with neutrals, that is simply one of the incidental vicissitudes of the war insofar as it is concerned, or, as they say in the vernacular, it's hard luck. It is surely no ground for complaint that the rules of international law are not being observed by neutrals. Indeed, any attempt by a neutral to shift its policies deliberately from time to time in an effort to equalize the abilities of the belligerents to carry on commercial trade with neutrals would logically and inevitably result in the neutral's being finally at war with the victorious belligerent.[37] On October 15, 1914, the State Department announced (in State Department Document 20 of 1914) regarding the sale of munitions to belligerents, that although these articles were considered contraband and were subject to seizure by an enemy of the purchasing government, it was the enemy's duty to prevent the articles from reaching their destination, and that if the enemy "should be unable to do this, that is for him one of the misfortunes of war; the inability, however, imposes on the neutral government no obligation to prevent the sale" (Policy of United States Toward Maritime Commerce in War, 1914–18, vol. 2, p. 40).[38]

The term "neutrality" in connection with trading with belligerents has an exact and well-known definition under international law. The term "neutrality" as used in our present Neutrality Act varies from that definition and is clearly a misnomer, and the only question involved in connection with the proposed repeal of that act is whether or not our national interest and security would best be served by repeal. That is, of course, a proper matter for Congress to determine, but that is the limit of congressional power, unless it wishes to impose as a condition to repeal that belligerents buy on a cash-and-carry basis, or that American vessels be excluded from war zones to prevent seizures or sinkings. Congress, of course, has power under the Constitution to declare war, but all other matters of carrying on our relations with foreign governments are entrusted to the Executive, excepting that any treaties must be ratified by the Senate.

A repeal of the Neutrality Act will not involve questions of international law and will not lead inevitably or to any extent to war. The matter, from either an international law or constitutional standpoint, has nothing to do with the question of declaring or aiding in a war.

For the reasons that I have given, therefore, the present Neutrality or Embargo Act should be repealed, and the new neutrality statute or Pittman-Connally bill should be passed by Congress.

---

[36] See footnote 12.

[37] State Department Document 113 of 1915, Policy of United States Toward Maritime Commerce in War, 1914–18, vol. 2, p. 42.

[38] Cf. Benjamin Franklin's two letters on June 3, 1780, and June 5, 1780 (in State Department Documents 11, p. 146, and 12, p. 147), that "for the sake of humanity" the rule of international law should be that neutral "traders in unarmed vessels" trading with belligerents should have their vessels and goods exempt from seizure by either belligerent unless the belligerent making the seizure should pay a fair price or compensation. "The statements of Franklin in these two letters contained the idea which made the treaty of 1785 between the United States and Prussia an unusual one in regard to commerce in time of war and marked the beginning of the development of the American principle of immunity of private property at sea." Policy of United States Toward Maritime Commerce in War, 1914–18, vol. 1, p. 5. On May 7, 1784, Congress adopted (State Document 21 of 1874, p. 157) a "new plan for treaties," under which in the event of war "contraband goods could not be confiscated but could be purchased." Policy of United States Toward Maritime Commerce in War, 1914–18, vol. 1, pp. 8 and 9. "The first American treaty made after the adoption of this plan was the treaty with Prussia, signed September 10, 1785. * * * Article 13 provided that 'the merchandise heretofore called contraband, such as arms, ammunition, and military stores of every kind,' could not be confiscated, but that the captor could purchase such merchandise by paying the owner its full value." (Ibid., vol. 1, pp. 8 and 9; and Miller, Treaties of the United States, vol. 2, p. 162). "Identical provisions are contained in the treaty between the United States and Prussia, July 11, 1799, art. 15, reaffirmed by the treaty between the same parties May 1, 1828, art. 12." Treaty Provisions Defining Neutral Rights and Duties, 1778–1936 (S. Doc. No. 24, 75th Cong., 1st sess.), pp. 9 and 10. Those treaties are still in effect between Germany and the United States (29).

Pulaski Memorial Day—Gen. Casimir Pulaski, Polish Hero—Polish-American Contribution to Our Republic

---

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. MARTIN F. SMITH

OF WASHINGTON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, October 11, 1939

Mr. SMITH of Washington. Mr. Speaker, President Roosevelt has very appropriately proclaimed today—October 11, 1939—as General Casimir Pulaski Day in honor of the memory of that great Polish hero and patriot who fought with Gen. George Washington's army in the American Revolution. President Roosevelt acted pursuant to a resolution which we adopted in the last session of Congress, and to which I was glad to give my hearty support.

President Roosevelt's proclamation stated:

We do honor to ourselves and our Nation in honoring those sons of foreign nations who assisted in the establishment of the United States * * * and one of these, whose name we hold in high esteem, is Count Casimir Pulaski, who met death on October 11, 1779, in consequence of his exploits in the assault upon Savannah.

Mr. Speaker, the Polish people who reside in my district are noted for their industry, thrift, and loyal Americanism. I esteem it a privilege to join with them in the faith and hope that Poland will arise again as a free and independent republic to take her rightful place among the cultural and progressive nations of the earth.

Well representing Polish nobility, Pulaski is often referred to as "Count Pulaski" in historical works. He was born in Podolia, Poland, at a time when that nation was undergoing a severe internal political battle. With rapacious neighbors beginning to conspire against the freedom of his people, the boy Pulaski was consumed with an early desire to ward off danger, and evinced a keen interest in military affairs at a very young age. Long before he reached his majority Pulaski joined in the guard of Duke Charles, and thus gained a rigorous and practical experience in the art of warfare.

In 1769 he joined his father, Joseph Pulaski, in what was termed "the Confederation of Bar," this confederation being a conjointure of Polish noblemen, each one of whom pledged his time, his fortune, and his life to the salvation of Poland. Casimir Pulaski and his brother, Francis, became the active leaders in the movement. The older leaders were soon dispersed, some going abroad; others were confined in dungeons. Pulaski's father was one of those confined in a dungeon prison, where he later died.

But, despite this, Casimir carried on, and at the head of a small force of cavalry he performed heroic feats. With his brother he became a constant terror to the Russians, who were trying to capture him. Against overwhelming odds for 4 years this great patriotic organization under their great leader fought to oust the enemies of Poland from his country. But all their efforts proved fruitless. During this time one of General Pulaski's brothers was killed before his eyes, the youngest brother taken into captivity, and many of his countrymen were doomed to misery.

Gen. Casimir Pulaski was the leading spirit of his countrymen in this unequal struggle to preserve the country intact. Although but 25 years of age, he was the acknowledged leader and the hero of his countrymen. Heedless of his foe, which was much more powerful, he fought with a zeal and tenacity that made him renowned as a cavalry leader throughout the Continent of Europe.

General Pulaski not only lost his father and brothers in this glorious attempt to save Poland from the first of her ignoble partitions, but his estates were confiscated and he was proscribed by King Stanislaus and had to travel to Turkey. Soon thereafter, in 1772, Count Casimir Pulaski issued his memorable manifesto, in which he said in part:

> I am not astonished that the enemies of my country resolved on her ruin, should direct their shares against those who most firmly resist their impetuosity, and that they should regard as such the brave Poles whom they have sacrificed and who are still repelling their most cruel attacks. * * * My destiny was clear, when at the age of 21, far from yielding to the amusements of youth, I regarded every moment as lost which was not employed in repelling the enemies of my country. * * * I have endeavored to mark my course by an invincible fortitude. Neither the blood of one of my brothers, which was shed by the enemy before my eyes, nor the cruel servitude of another, nor the sad fate of so many of my relations and compatriots has shaken my patriotism. * * *

Perhaps no better insight into the sturdy character of Pulaski, who is revered both in Europe and America, could be given than the above excerpt from his manifesto. He traveled to Turkey, but, repelled with the feeble notions of liberty entertained by the Sultan, he journeyed on to Marseilles, France, and from there to Paris. It was in the French capital that he made the acquaintance of Benjamin Franklin, and young America's struggle for independence. Benjamin Franklin, writing from Paris to General Washington on May 29, 1777, said:

> Count Pulaski, of Poland, an officer famous throughout Europe for his bravery and conduct in defense of the liberties of his country against the three great invading powers of Russia, Austria, and Prussia will have the honor of delivering this into your excellency's hands.

General Pulaski landed in America the middle of July 1777, and after presenting his letters to Washington and Congress, waited for Congress to take action. In the meantime Washington's army passed through the streets of Philadelphia. Spurred by the sight of marching soldiers, Pulaski, restless and eager to aid our cause, decided not to wait for his commission, but to follow the army as a volunteer. In Europe a member of the nobility, an officer of distinguished prestige, in America a private in the ranks. Such was Pulaski. Not self, but service, was his life's motto.

The night of September 8, 1777, Washington assembled a council of war to decide which position the army should take in defense of Philadelphia. The upland, across the brook of Brandywine, was chosen. The army moved to this position at dawn. The enemy's attack was expected on the 11th, and about 9 of that day the red uniforms appeared. The battle started. The vanguard, under General Maxwell, retreated under heavy pressure. The rest of the army was stretched out lengthwise, for a considerable distance along the brook. The right wing was under the command of General Sullivan, and the left wing, to the south, was under the command of General Armstrong.

General Wayne and General Proctor commanded the cannon and artillery. Washington remained with the reserve, which was commanded by General Greene, and Pulaski was stationed by the side of Washington.

Upon the withdrawal of General Maxwell the British kept up fire, but did not attempt crossing the creek. Washington was about ready to strike a blow at the enemy, but first wanted to be convinced that the opponent's main forces were not circumventing him for an attack at the rear. To that end a detachment was sent out to explore the region. About 2 o'clock an orderly dispatched the news that the enemy could not be seen on any of the roads on the opposite side of the creek. An order of attack was about to be issued when a man in a cart was noticed waving his hat and striving to reach headquarters. The man turned out to be Squire Cheney, with the startling news that the main forces of the enemy had crossed the Brandywine to the north and were fast approaching the army's rear.

Washington immediately directed the division of Sullivan, together with the brigades of Conway, Stirling, and Stephans, to meet the enemy. They hurriedly arrayed themselves for battle just as the British were spied on the road. Thereupon the British vanguard showed itself on the plain. The American artillery opened fire. Hessian riflemen were playing havoc with the American front ranks. At the same time a column of infantry rushed to the upland occupied by the Americans. The center was holding up under the bombardment, but both wings were fleeing. The enemy then concentrated on the center, which soon wavered. Chaos reigned.

At this juncture Pulaski secured Washington's permission to use his bodyguard, some 30 horse, and launched a furious attack at the pursuers. With great skill he wedged into the side of the pursuing column. Swinging their sabers from left to right, this small detachment brought confusion to the ranks of the enemy. The pursuit was momentarily checked. Pulaski's forces took shelter with General Greene's army and together they held the enemy while the rear of the American Army retreated to Dillworth. There the road narrowed, and the Americans gained a vantage point where they could withstand the onslaught of the enemy. Thus Washington's army was saved.

Within 2 months after his arrival on September 15, 1777, Congress elected Pulaski "commander of the horse, with the rank of brigadier."

General Washington's letter to Congress recommending the appointment of Pulaski read as follows:

> This gentleman has been, like us, engaged in defending the liberty and independence of his country and has sacrificed his fortune and his zeal for these objects. He derives from hence a title to our respect that ought to operate in his favor as far as the good of the service will permit.

Shortly afterward Washington's army was saved from an almost inevitable destruction at Warren Tavern, near Philadelphia, only by the war craft of Pulaski. He also engaged in the Battle of Germantown. On the day of the Battle of Germantown he was sorely disappointed and mortified. There were but four regiments of cavalry raised and not one of them completed. Three of them only, such as they were, had joined General Washington's army, and on the day of the battle guards were furnished out of those regiments to attend on the commander in chief and on other generals. This was a matter of deep regret and bitter chagrin.

When General Washington had taken his winter quarters at Valley Forge the Cavalry were sent over into New Jersey on account of forage and for other service on that side of the Delaware. Pulaski made his headquarters in Trenton.

Weary of the lapse in activity subsequent to these previous battles, and dampened by the pettiness of the command under which he was stationed, as well as the tardy tactics of Congress in carrying out his suggestions for the improvement of the Infantry, Pulaski expressed a wish to return to Europe. Washington persuaded him to remain, however.

In March 1778 he asked permission from General Washington and Congress to organize an independent corps, later to be known throughout the Colonies as the Polish Legion. In equipping it he is said to have spent $50,000 of his own funds. These horsemen, among other arms, bore the famous Polish lances, a new weapon on this continent. Rated as the most expert horseman in the American Cavalry, his service in leading and inspiring the cavalry was of inestimable value. From the time Pulaski took command it became a notable weapon of offense and defense. It is entirely possible that without it the cause of independence would not have been won.

Then followed the Battle of Charleston, S. C., when the city was sieged by 900 British troops from General Prevost's army. Although not altogether successful in his assault, Pulaski held the city 2 days until the arrival of reinforcements.

Probably Pulaski's most distinguished service was rendered in the siege of Savannah, Ga., although this move was made contrary to the sound advice of Pulaski, who pleaded a delay of a number of days due to their unpreparedness. Pulaski was here made commander of the entire cavalry, both French and American. During the battle their scheme failed. The French became entangled and their Admiral D'Esaing was wounded. Chaos resulted in the ranks. Hoping to rally the men and regain order, Pulaski rushed into the thick of the battle. Leading his men in a desperate charge, he received a wound in his right thigh and was carried from the field of battle fatally wounded. Pulaski died 2 days later while on board the brig Wasp, leaving Savannah Harbor on the way to Charleston. According to his friend and companion in arms, Capt. Paul Bentalou, he was buried at sea, and funeral services were held afterward in the city of Charleston.

In this manner, at the age of 31 years, ended the life of one of the most active and greatest patriots of his time. A man well born, of handsome physique, and liberal education, who abandoned a life of ease and complacency for a career of unnumbered hardships and much bitterness. His was a proud and magnanimous personality, but he had to contend with petty men and the crudeness of a nation in its genesis. His corps of lancers and light infantry, which were recruited mostly in Baltimore, has since become famous under the name of Pulaski's Legion. He is known as the founder of the American Cavalry. Pulaski, like Washington, could have chosen the easy course. They were both men of large means. But they recognized the responsibility of wealth and rank.

An equestrian statue, which stands between Thirteenth and Fourteenth Streets on Pennsylvania Avenue, Washington, commemorates this hero of two hemispheres.

The splendid funeral honors paid by the citizens of Charleston to the memory of the brave Pulaski, the united regrets of the people and of the Army at the loss of an officer no less beloved than he was useful, and the last tribute of respect offered to his memory by Congress, have already evinced the sensibilities and gratitude of our Nation. The gallant son of Poland had enthusiastically espoused the cause of America. He served that cause with zeal, ardor, and fidelity.

Pulaski died as he had lived, a hero, but an enemy of kings. Since the time of Pulaski others have come from his native land to mix their blood with the blood of other peoples to make one common country and to build a single destiny. Many Americans of Polish extraction have offered their lives in defense of this country on many battlefields, in the Civil War, the Spanish-American War, and in the great World War. The blood of Pulaski still flows in the veins of his countrymen.

N. Y. A. Building, Lonaconing, Md.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM D. BYRON

OF MARYLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, October 11, 1939

ADDRESS BY HON. WILLIAM D. BYRON, OF MARYLAND

Mr. BYRON. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address delivered by me at the laying of the cornerstone of the N. Y. A. Building, Lonaconing, Md., on September 30, 1939:

Mr. Administrator, Mr. Mayor, Judge Walsh, distinguished guests, ladies and gentlemen, I am particularly complimented at being asked to come to Lonaconing this afternoon to participate in the laying of the cornerstone of this community building. The fact that the Administrator of the National Youth Administration has considered this project of such importance that he has taken the time to come from Washington to address you is also, to my mind, particularly significant. It shows an interest in his work, no matter how large or how small, that augurs well for the success of his administration.

When I was campaigning for Congress in this district—Sixth Maryland—I spoke both in the primary and the general election of my special interest in public works in the building up of the physical side of the district and of my interest in youth and the unemployment situation. I do not recall, and I am sure that you do not, that I made a great many promises on what I could do to relieve this unhappy situation. However, I want to say on this occasion that I have conscientiously tried, and voted, to be of some help in relieving the situation, and have met with a fair success.

The National Youth Administration appropriation has increased from $449,276 in 1939 to $1,089,149 for the current year. I think the Congress acted wisely and humanely in appropriating this money.

Buildings and projects of the kind for which we are laying the cornerstone today do not just happen, they are the result of a lot of thought, energy, and hard work on the part of the people of the community and on the part of the organization which carries through. I noticed in a news report that this entire project resulted from the activities of the Allegany County Welfare Board, which established the National Youth Administration training center at Lonaconing, and the Citizens' Unemployed League.

At this time I want to publicly commend three ladies who were originally interested and worked for the project and through their efforts it is now coming into being—namely, Mrs. Emma Wagus, Mrs. Mary Cook, and Mrs. Clinton Spiker. While I am sure that every man and woman is interested in this project these three ladies seem to have been outstanding in their support. I want to also commend the mayor, Mr. D. Clarkson Laird, and the council for their foresight and activity in raising the funds to match the Federal Government appropriation. It seems to me the completion of this structure will be a monument to the cooperative spirit of the people of Lonaconing. Of course, the whole idea of a building of this kind is simply not in the finished structure of wood, stone, brick, and mortar. While this building is under construction the young people of this community will be learning valuable trades that will fit them for useful occupations in after life.

I sometimes feel that one of the things this country, or any other, has to fear is the fact that young people may not learn to work with their hands as well as their minds. I have often heard it said—and I believe it is true—we learn that mind accumulates knowledge through use of ones hands, and generally speaking, if you will show me a skilled artisan I will show you a sound mind.

This building will have a twofold purpose of filling a great need in your community—a library, medical center, nursery school, community hall, and a place where young people and the community as a whole can meet in good fellowship, and will also serve to train the youth of your community in more practical ways of making a living.

I congratulate you all upon your foresight, enthusiasm, and cooperation in what will undoubtedly be a highly successful community undertaking.

Of course, you know that practically every Government agency at one time or another comes under fire. This would be so, and I am frank to say will be so under any administration in Washington. One of the things I have heard is that at times young men are being put to work and wages being paid at the expense of men with families. This is not actually so and I want to defend, if need be, this type of work in Lonaconing or any other community in the United States.

I believe that my next remarks will appeal to young people as well as mothers and fathers. I do not have to remind you of the terrible events that are taking place overseas. It is really too horrible to contemplate, but I just want to ask you to consider what the youth of the warring nations are doing in their various countries today.

Instead of the C. C. C.—a very fine and worth-while organization and one which is doing splendid work in forest and wildlife preservation, especially in western Maryland—you have over there compulsory military training camps. I do not know what the average youth of warring nations, whose ages correspond with those helped by N. Y. A. are doing, but I feel sure it is not the constructive, peaceful work you will accomplish on this particular building.

So sum it all up the entire program of this or any other administration is built around the hope for peace in this country. This hope for peace, I feel sure, can be realized, as you know that Congress is now in special session and debating the highly controversial subject of neutrality. It is unfortunate, but it is never true that all men think alike on a subject of this kind.

We all—and I except no Representative or Senator and give them due credit—we all want to keep this country from the European conflict and stay out of war.

I myself as a veteran of the last war and as one who was brought up in the Army and know the terrible side of it, would go to any ends to keep us from becoming involved. After studying the whole matter very carefully, I am convinced that the best way to do this is to keep our ships and our citizens on this side of the Atlantic and to deal with all nations on equal terms. I do not want to send my own boys to fight on foreign soil, and you can rest assured that I will not knowingly vote for any program that would send yours. I cannot conceive of my voting to send young men of America to collect a debt for any manufacturer; I cannot conceive of my voting to avenge the injury of an American citizen who has been warned to stay away, or for the sinking of any American ship that has trespassed on foreign seas in an express violation of law.

I honestly and truly believe that the legislation now before this extraordinary session of Congress will do more to keep us out of war than anything yet proposed.

In closing, let me again express my interest in you and your problems and to congratulate all who have had a hand in the conception of what I know will be a fine and unusual building in this community.

Neutrality

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. W. O. BURGIN

OF NORTH CAROLINA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, October 11, 1939

LETTER FROM THE SECRETARY OF THE SOUTHERN COUNCIL ON INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS, AND ENCLOSURE

Mr. BURGIN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following letter received by me from the secretary of the Southern Council on International Relations, together with the list referred to therein:

THE SOUTHERN COUNCIL ON INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS,
Chapel Hill, N. C., October 2, 1939.

Congressman WILLIAM O. BURGIN,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. BURGIN: I beg to submit for your consideration a representative list of citizens of the Southeastern States—leaders in religion, education, journalism, the law, and business—who favor the repeal of the embargo on arms and other proposals made by the President to Congress in special session.

I am, with respect,

Sincerely yours,

KEENER C. FRAZER,
Executive Secretary,
Professor of International Law, University of North Carolina.

The proposals for the revision of the neutrality laws of the United States, as formulated by President Roosevelt and Secretary of State Cordell Hull, submitted to the Congress of the United States in special session, are approved and supported by a group of more than 100 men and women of the Southeastern States, representing the churches, journalism, business, the professions, civic interests, labor, and education.

CHURCH LEADERS

Bishop H. P. Almon Abbott, diocese of Lexington, Lexington, Ky.
Bishop Theodore D. Bratton, Jackson, Miss.
Bishop Thomas C. Darst, diocese of eastern Carolina, Wilmington, N. C.
Bishop J. Lloyd Decell, Methodist bishop of Alabama and Georgia, Birmingham, Ala.
Bishop Hoyt M. Dobbs, Methodist bishop of Louisiana and Mississippi, Jackson, Miss.
Bishop William M. Green, diocese of Mississippi, Jackson, Miss.
Bishop Robert C. Jett, retired bishop, diocese of southwestern Virginia, Roanoke, Va.
Bishop Paul B. Kern, Methodist bishop of Tennessee and Florida, Nashville, Tenn.
Bishop H. J. Mikell, diocese of Atlanta, Atlanta, Ga.
Bishop A. S. Thomas, diocese of South Carolina, Charleston, S. C.
Bishop John D. Wing, diocese of south Florida, Orlando, Fla.
Bishop Frank A. Juhan, diocese of Florida, Jacksonville, Fla.
Rev. John W. Frazer, D. D., Mobile, Ala.
Rev. M. Ashby Jones, D. D., Atlanta, Ga.
Rev. George Stoves, D. D., Mason, Ga.
Rev. R. P. Marshall, D. D., editor, Florida Christian Advocate, Lakeland, Fla.
Rev. John W. Inzer, D. D., First Baptist Church, Asheville, N. C.
Rev. James W. Jackson, D. D., Columbia, S. C.
Rev. Albert S. Johnson, D. D., First Presbyterian Church, Charlotte, N. C.
Rev. John Glenn, D. D., Edenton Street Methodist Church, Raleigh, N. C.
Rev. B. R. Lacy, Jr., D. D., president, Union Theological Seminary, Richmond, Va.
Rev. W. E. Rollins, D. D., dean, Virginia Theological Seminary, Alexandria, Va.
Rabbi Edward N. Calisch, D. D., Congregation Beth Ahabah, Richmond, Va.
Rabbi Joseph Rauch, D. D., Temple Adath Israel, Louisville, Ky.

JOURNALISTS

Mr. Julian Hall, editor, the Eagle, Dothan, Ala.
Dr. John Temple Graves, editor, the News, Birmingham, Ala.
Mr. David E. Smiley, editor and president, the Times, Tampa, Fla.
Mr. Tom Wallace, editor, the Times, Louisville, Ky.
Mr. Barry Bingham, publisher, the Courier-Journal and Times, Louisville, Ky.
Dr. Herbert Agar, the Courier-Journal, Louisville, Ky.
Mr. John D. Ewing, publisher, the Times, Shreveport, La.
Mr. Frederick Sullins, the News, Jackson, Miss.
Dr. Clarence Poe, editor, the Progressive Farmer, Raleigh, N. C.
Mr. L. S. Laprade, editor, the Herald, Durham, N. C.
Col. Santford Martin, editor, the Journal and Sentinel, Winston-Salem, N. C.
Mr. Charles A. Webb, president, the Asheville Citizen and Times, Asheville, N. C.
Hon. George F. Milton, president and editor, the News, Chattanooga, Tenn.
Mr. J. H. Nye, editor, the Tennessean, Nashville, Tenn.
Mr. Virginius Dabney, editor, the Times-Dispatch, Richmond, Va.
Dr. Douglas S. Freeman, editor, the News Leader, Richmond, Va.
Mr. Louis I. Jaffe, editor, the Virginian-Pilot, Norfolk, Va.

BUSINESS AND PROFESSIONS

Mr. A. W. McAllister, chairman of the board, Pilot Life Insurance Co., Greensboro, N. C.
Mr. P. H. Callahan, president, Louisville Varnish Co., Louisville, Ky.
Mr. J. Skottowe Wannamaker, president, American Cotton Association, St. Matthews, S. C.
Mr. John Sprunt Hill, Durham, N. C.
Mr. Algernon Blair, contractor, Montgomery, Ala.
Mr. Bennette E. Geer, manufacturer, Greenville, S. C.
Mr. John A. Law, president and treasurer, the Saxon Mills, Spartanburg, S. C.
Mr. F. M. Jackson, Sr., Birmingham, Ala.
Hon. Blanton Fortson, jurist, Athens, Ga.
Hon. Kemp D. Battle, lawyer, Rocky Mount, N. C.
Hon. Walter Stokes, Jr., lawyer, Nashville, Tenn.
Hon. James H. Hammond, lawyer, Columbia, S. C.
Hon. Devereux Lippitt, lawyer, Atlanta, Ga.
Hon. Helen Douglas Mankin, lawyer, member Georgia House of Representatives, Atlanta, Ga.
Hon. Charles Hall, lawyer, Macon, Ga.
Hon. Douglas Arant, lawyer, Birmingham, Ala.
Hon. E. Smythe Gambrell, lawyer, Atlanta, Ga.
Mr. L. O. Crosby, lumberman, Picayune, Miss.
Mr. Vance J. Alexander, president, Union Planters National Bank & Trust Co., Memphis, Tenn.
Mr. E. R. Malone, president, American National Bank, Pensacola, Fla.
Mr. Oliver J. Sands, banker, chairman, finance committee, church schools in diocese of Virginia, Richmond, Va.

CIVIC LEADERS

Mrs. Karl Bishopric, North Carolina Federation of Women's Clubs, Spray, N. C.
Mrs. R. H. Latham, General Federation of Women's Clubs, Asheville, N. C.
Mrs. C. T. Wanzer, Charlotte, N. C.
Mrs. J. U. Reaves, Alabama Federation of Women's Clubs, Mobile, Ala.
Mrs. Laura Smith Ebaugh, American Association of University Women, Greenville, S. C.
Mrs. J. Ralston Wells, Florida Federation of Women's Clubs, Daytona Beach, Fla.

LABOR LEADERS

Mr. John A. Peel, regional director, upper south region, Textile Workers' Union of America, Roanoke, Va.
Mr. T. A. Wilson, chairman, North Carolina Industrial Commission; ex-president, North Carolina Federation of Labor, Raleigh, N. C.
Mr. E. L. Sandefur, C. I. O. director for Carolinas, Winston-Salem, N. C.

EDUCATORS

President John Stewart Bryan, College of William and Mary, Williamsburg, Va.
President Julian A. Burruss, Virginia Polytechnic Institute, Blacksburg, Va.
President Francis P. Gaines, Washington and Lee University, Lexington, Va.
President J. N. Hillman, Emory and Henry College, Emory, Va.
President R. B. Montgomery, Lynchburg College, Lynchburg, Va.
President W. T. Sanger, Medical College of Virginia, Richmond, Va.
Dean J. Nelson Frierson, University of South Carolina, Columbia, S. C.
Dean James H. Hewlett, Centre College, Danville, Ky.
Dean W. C. Jackson, Woman's College of the University of North Carolina, Greensboro, N. C.
Dean Charles W. Pipkin, Louisiana State University, Baton Rouge, La.
Dr. Helen G. McDonald, Winthrop College, Rock Hill, S. C.
Dr. James W. Patton, Converse College, Spartanburg, S. C.
Dr. Calvin B. Hoover, economist, Durham, N. C.
Dr. Gilbert T. Rowe, professor of religion, Duke University, Durham, N. C.
Dr. Amry Vandenbosch, professor of international law, University of Kentucky, Lexington, Ky.
Dr. Mary Watters, Mary Baldwin College, Staunton, Va.
Prof. Keener C. Frazer, professor of international law, University of North Carolina, Chapel Hill, N. C.
Dr. E. A. Ziegler, professor of foreign economics and finance, University of Florida, Gainesville, Fla.
Dr. A. F. Harmon, Montevallo, Ala.
Dr. W. W. Pierson, dean, the Graduate School, University of North Carolina, Chapel Hill, N. C.
President Hamilton Holt, Rollins College, Winter Park, Fla.

President John H. Sherman, University of Tampa, Tampa, Fla.
President Dice R. Anderson, Wesleyan College, Macon, Ga.
President George C. Bellingrath, Rabun Gap-Nacoochee School, Rabun Gap, Ga.
President M. L. Brittain, Georgia School of Technology, Atlanta, Ga.
President Rufus E. Clement, Atlanta University, Atlanta, Ga.
President Harvey W. Cox, Emory University, Emory University, Ga.
President Guy H. Wells, Georgia State College for Women, Milledgeville, Ga.
President Pierce Cline, Centenary College of Louisiana, Shreveport, La.
President D. M. Nelson, Mississippi College, Clinton, Miss.
President B. L. Parkinson, Mississippi State College for Women, Columbus, Miss.
President H. G. Bedinger, Flora MacDonald College, Red Springs, N. C.
President Frank P. Graham, University of North Carolina, Chapel Hill, N. C.
President Gideon I. Humphreys, High Point College, High Point, N. C.
President Walter L. Lingle, Davidson College, Davidson, N. C.
President Howard E. Rondthaler, Salem College, Winston-Salem, N. C.
President E. W. Sikes, Clemson College, Clemson, S. C.
President Henry N. Snyder, Wofford College, Spartanburg, S. C.
Chancelor O. C. Carmichael, Vanderbilt University, Nashville, Tenn.
President Charles E. Diehl, Southwestern University, Memphis, Tenn.
Dr. Alex Guerry, vice chancelor, the University of the South, Sewanee, Tenn.
President Stewart W. McClelland, Lincoln Memorial University, Harrogate, Tenn.
President Ernest L. Stockton, Cumberland University, Lebanon, Tenn.
President E. A. Sutherland, Madison College, Madison College, Tenn.
Dr. M. D. Collins, State superintendent of schools, Atlanta, Ga.
Dr. A. H. Collins, State superintendent of education, Montgomery, Ala.
Dr. Willis Sutton, superintendent of schools, Atlanta, Ga.
Dr. T. H. Harris, State superintendent of education, Baton Rouge, La.
Dr. Clyde A. Erwin, State superintendent of education, Raleigh, N. C.
Dr. James H. Hope, State superintendent of public instruction, Columbia, S. C.
Dr. Sidney B. Hall, State superintendent of public instruction, Richmond, Va.

NOTE.—Name of Mr. C. A. Fink, president, North Carolina Federation of Labor, arrived too late to be listed with other labor leaders.

The Arms Embargo Issue

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JAMES C. OLIVER
OF MAINE
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, October 11, 1939

RADIO ADDRESS BY HON. JAMES C. OLIVER, OF MAINE

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. Speaker, under permission granted me to extend my remarks, I am pleased to incorporate herewith a radio broadcast made by myself on Saturday evening, October 7, over station WCSH, of Portland, Maine:

Citizens of the First District, once again it is my privilege and pleasure to address you in connection with national and international problems as they affect the welfare and interests of you and your families. Through the courtesy of station WCSH, for the past 3 years that I have held the office of United States Representative from the First Congressional District of Maine, it has been possible through the medium of these broadcasts to contact you each 2 weeks during the congressional terms and explain in some detail the various issues as they have arisen, but never in that time, despite the many unsolved domestic problems which still confront us, has this Nation of ours been faced with a more critical or vital situation or period than that in which we now find ourselves. I say that advisedly, because any undue meddling in this maelstrom of foreign war means intervention and eventual involvement for us. Such embroilment on our part will surely and certainly lead to military dictatorship with all of the dire and terrible consequences which the word "dictatorship" implies. Even today, with the limited emergency already proclaimed by the President, he has the power to take over full control of the radio broadcasting of this Nation, such power being available under the Federal Communications Act of 1934. Control of the radio in Germany and Italy and Russia made and makes it possible for the Hitlers, Mussolinis, and Stalins to rise and remain in power. Furthermore, other laws remain unrepealed from the World War which threaten our liberties equally. If we take one step toward intervention at this time, then it will only be a short time before we shall be sold the idea of taking the next step and gradually we approach the brink until as in 1917 we step over the precipice into the insanity of another World War to save the civilization of the world, as we are now told. Then rapidly will follow a draft law for our youth, the desolation of our firesides, the drafting of our wealth, the confiscation of our savings, the doubling and the trebling of our burden of taxation, the manifold increasing of our debt, and the eventual post-war pestilence, panic, economic and moral paralysis.

Every thinking man and woman of America knows this and every thinking man and woman of America fears this. Therefore, we hear from every home and every fireside the universal cry, "Keep America out of this war." Beyond any shadow of doubt every Member of the Seventy-sixth Congress is determined to do his share toward this end, and every Member of Congress knows that in this arms-embargo issue we are playing with international dynamite. In my opinion, the rank and file of our people know it also, and now a terrible responsibility falls upon the shoulders and the heads of all public officials. Fully appreciating the entire significance of this responsibility, I come before you this evening in complete humility, realizing the inadequacy of one human mind to grasp the entire ramifications of the international intrigues and diplomatic double-crossings of the Old World with all its historic treachery, its deceit, and its chicanery.

That is why I approach the whole problem of the suggested changes in our neutrality law with suspicion and misgivings. Remembering the basis of the selling propaganda of 1914–17, I listen, read, and observe with a continual question mark in my mind. Then it was, "Save the world for democracy"; now it is, "Save civilization for the world." Then it was the Kaiser; now it is Hitler. Then, at the start of that conflict, it was, "Sell us your supplies"; now it is the same cry. Then it was, "Loan us the credits—we do not need the men"; now in a few months it will be the same story. Then manpower will unquestionably follow our arms, our credits, and our financial interests. You, the thinking men and women of this district, in spite of the prevailing obvious sympathy for France and England, you sense this; you know it. The repeal of the arms embargo itself is not the real issue in this discussion. England and France can get along without these actual implements of warfare. The real issue is the point that this repeal will signify our intention to intervene and will signal to the whole world that once again the United States is taking a hand in the age-old struggle of Europe; that once again America is on the road to military intervention; that once again we are feeding the flames of war with the financial and physical resources of this great peace-loving Nation of ours. Why—for what conceivable reason—should I, as a Member of Congress, become a party to such insanity? Rather should I reason to myself thus:

America's frontiers are not on the Rhine, but they are the Atlantic and the Pacific. They are in Alaska and in South America. Within these broad limits lie more than 95 percent of our markets and practically all of the raw materials needed for the best material existence man could ever hope to enjoy. This country has never been invaded or threatened with invasion since 1812; and as long as we keep our American nose out of un-American affairs and our powder dry and plentiful, in my opinion, America never will be invaded. At the present time in all of Asia and Europe combined, there is not a single plane that could bring war to our land and return whole. We are geographically gifted for a position of isolation, and as long as we maintain in the form of our "Maginot" or "Siegfried" lines adequate naval forces, with a backlog of trained and fully equipped modern military forces, we are unassailable.

And so should I continue to remind myself as follows: That every time we have stepped beyond the limits of our immediate national interests we have been doomed to failure; and though we have never lost a war, we have time and time again lost our shirts. We fought Spain to free Cuba, and we won all in that military struggle; but all that we got out of that venture in foreign altruism in addition to the loss of millions of dollars and thousands of lives was a fertile field for the Chase National Bank to exploit native labor through sugar plantations.

In 1917 we ventured forth once again to beat up the Kaiser, preserve democracy, and stop war for all time. Once again we won all the battles but we lost 126,000 Americans, we maimed some 234,000 other Americans and we lost at least $41,000,000,000 directly with an indirect and cumulative loss of more than one hundred billions. Such a staggering sum devoted to domestic development would have paid off all mortgages on all farms, homes, and would have bought new farms for 3,000,000 of our homeless and wandering farmers and would have purchased every corporation, utility, and business house in the Nation. But we did win the war, and we did beat the Kaiser. But, today, he is living in Holland, presumably with his financial resources intact and his physical person untouched and unblemished through the terrible contact of war. But today our hospitals are filled with mentally deranged, blinded, and maimed men who were the pawns in that foreign embroilment of ours. What of the democracy we were to perpetuate? What of the madness of war which we were to end? You know the answers. You know that we were suckers, and you must know that we are being played once again for the same kind of suckers. Why should we stop Hitler? We stopped the Kaiser * * * for what? Let them stop Hitler, let the wily and suave diplomats of the Old World stop Hitler * * * they made him. Their greed is responsible for his rise. The national and international selfishness of the Versailles treaty kindled the fire which has forged this modern madman. Hitler nor any other dictator in Germany could ever have developed if 60,000,000 people had not been made paupers by the greedy and avaricious territory grabbers of the Old World who, after military victory, once again carried out their historic ambitions and practices of dividing and partitioning the territory of the vanquished. Those who divided the swag must now accept the responsibility for the consequences. We asked for nothing, although we gave plenty, and we, as a nation, accepted no part of the responsibility for the division of the spoils. We accepted no part of the responsibility for the future policing of the world for which we owe thanks and eternal gratitude to such patriots as Borah, Lodge, Johnson, and the others who defeated the League of Nations and the World Court in our Senate.

As I continue to remind myself of those events of 20 to 25 years ago, I can still hear the statements of President Wilson that he kept us out of war and after his reelection on that platform I remember that it was only 1 month from the time he assumed the presidential chair in 1917 that he read from the rostrum of the House of Representatives his proclamation asking the Congress of the United States for a declaration of a foreign war. Now, President Roosevelt talks the same strain, and I thoroughly believe that he is sincere, but I also believe that he is just as wrong as I think Wilson was, in his foreign policy in 1916 and 1917. It is not what men say that really counts, but it is the thing which they do that really matters. Once we start on the road toward the supplying of this foreign conflagration with the fuel of warfare, just so surely are we started on the road toward financial and physical embroilment.

Believing most thoroughly and sincerely in the foregoing I am opposed to the repeal of the arms embargo. This does not mean that I am pro-German, nor that I am anti-British, nor am I pro-any nation or anything except pro-keeping our American nose out of the age-old European struggle for the balance of power and domination of world trade. In 1937 I voted for the arms embargo and for cash-and-carry restrictions on all other commodities being shipped to belligerents. At that time the bill received practically unanimous consideration both in the House and in the Senate. From press releases it was also evident that British sentiment was not opposed to the enactment of this type of American neutrality. The same administration or its mouthpieces which are now advocating the repeal of the arms embargo, in 1937 sponsored the enactment of this same prohibition against the sale and shipment of arms, ammunition, and implements of warfare to belligerent nations. At that time only 13 Members of the House and 6 members of the Senate voted against the passage of the bill.

On May 1, 1939, there expired the provisions of the law with respect to the cash-and-carry provisions for all commodities other than arms, ammunition, and implements of warfare, which as I have stated were forbidden supposely for all time to belligerents. So this has left us with no restrictions as to commodities outside of the arms classification. Then during this last session of Congress there was introduced the Bloom bill, which undertook to repeal completely the embargo against arms, etc., but at the same time it provided for the reenactment of the cash-and-carry restrictions on other commodities which had been in effect from May 1, 1937, to May 1, 1939. Obviously, there was no real objection to the passing again of these cash-and-carry sections of the 1937 law, but there was a tremendous amount of opposition to the repeal of the arms embargo. Finally, in the House an amendment was inserted to the Bloom bill which provided for the continuance of the embargo against arms and ammunition but eliminated the prohibition against implements of warfare. This amendment was passed after a terrific fight and Democrats joined with Republicans to put it over. Then the bill was passed and sent over to the Senate. You will remember that in the closing days of the session the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations refused to report out the bill with a bare majority of only one vote. There the matter has rested until this special session of Congress was called to deal with it again. In the meantime, of course, a declaration of war against Germany has been made by England and France. This has complicated the issue even more, for now there enters into the picture the passion engendered by propaganda from both sides of the European conflict.

It seems to me that in order for a person to convince himself that the arms embargo should be repealed he must first convince himself that this Nation has a moral right to traffic in the industrial production of weapons for mass murder. Just because a fight is progressing between two persons it does not seem moral or right to me to step up and for the sake of profit equip them with brass knuckles and other implements of destruction. As a general proposition I do not believe that we should manufacture the means of mass murder except for the purposes of our own self-defense. Not only do I feel this way for the general moral principle involved, but I further believe that it is suicidal for us to furnish foreign nations with weapons which they may conceivably turn against us if the fortunes of war or the schemings of diplomats should change present friends to future enemies.

Secondly, for a person to convince himself that the arms embargo should be repealed he must satisfy himself that changing the rules after the war has started is not a serious breach of neutrality which even partakes of the nature of active intervention in support of one side to the conflict. In the days leading up to our participation in the World War our State Department quite definitely stated to Germany that a similar act would be contrary to all concepts of neutrality. Why is the situation any different today in this regard?

In the third place, for a person to convince himself that the arms embargo should be repealed he should convince himself that there is a definite and certain danger that Hitler will invade our shores when, as, and if France and England are defeated. When one considers that the conquering and physical possession of the Allies must come only as a result of a completely successful military invasion by troops, then it does not seem conceivable to me that Hitler could ever get across the English Channel to invade England or through the Maginot fortifications to invade France. In any event, even if his forces did eventually realize such a military mission, the German Army would certainly have taken a terrible beating and would scarcely be in readiness for a foreign invasion 3,000 miles from their homeland. Some folks are worried because of their fear that the British Navy would be available for the transport of the German forces after they had mopped up the British, but they do not visualize what the condition of the British Navy would be after such a terrific struggle as would be necessary before Hitler's cohorts could get into the British Isles. Then, again, could there be any doubt but that the commanders of the British Navy would order any remaining ships scuttled before they would permit their surrender to the German forces. In such an event where would Hitler get the ships to transport manpower enough to attack the Western Hemisphere? It can't be done.

In the fourth place, for a person to advocate the repeal of the arms embargo he should follow his hand through and advocate the next steps which logically follow such a declaration of intention to intervene. Supply the arms for cash until the cash runs out, then supply them the necessary credit; then follow the credit with men. That these progressive steps will lead to our actual participation in this holocaust is just as obvious and just as certain as the ebb and flow of the tide. Any person who is willing to advocate and follow this course is quite consistent in advocating the repeal of the arms embargo. Personally I do not want any part of it and shall actively oppose such a course.

In the fifth place, the person who advocates repeal must convince himself that we are now on the road to adequate preparedness in this country, for if we are not on such a road, then we certainly should be devoting all of our facilities to that end. Until this country is absolutely prepared to meet any possibility or probability of attack from any single nation or combination of nations, then we certainly should not ship any finished weapons, any essential raw materials of defense, or any component parts of weapons of warfare to any nation of the world. It is altogether obvious that this country is not in that condition, and until it shall be, then it appears to me to be criminally negligent to ship such articles to any foreign powers. The only possible excuse for the establishment of a wartime economy in this Nation is for the purpose of our own national defense. To that objective I have always applied myself and shall so continue as long as I am in public office.

I have attempted in these few minutes to explain as comprehensively as possible the present situation as I view it. I am opposed to the repeal of the arms embargo, but I am perfectly willing to vote for the restrictions on the shipments of other types of goods as they have been suggested. In fact, I did so vote in 1937. I am not only opposed to the entrance of this Nation into a foreign war, but I am opposed to any steps which may be the preliminary approach to such a calamity.

If this session of Congress continues for 2 or more weeks I shall follow my usual practice of addressing you each fortnight. If the opportunity presents itself to do so, I shall review the legislative situation as it develops and I shall take the opportunity to outline the various moves which I have and shall make to help the United States maintain a policy of isolation and insulation from the impacts of a European struggle in which, in my opinion, we have no business.

In the meantime, do not forget that the sordid scroll of war propaganda will continue to unroll. It is our duty to ourselves and to our families to deliberate dispassionately over each and every story that comes to our attention. Instead of the pinch of salt which you may use in viewing the unrolling of the anticipated propaganda, apply a whole barrel full.

Until 2 weeks from tonight at this time, good wishes and good night.

Mr. Aubrey Williams

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LYNDON B. JOHNSON

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, October 11, 1939

EDITORIAL FROM THE BALTIMORE SUN

Mr. LYNDON B. JOHNSON. Mr. Speaker, a great many people have long heard a great deal about Mr. Aubrey Williams, because Mr. Aubrey Williams has been the director of one of the greatest American programs ever put into effect—the National Youth Administration.

But a great many people during these last few years have been looking at Mr. Williams and, alas, seeing the little man upon the stair, celebrated in the current popular song, who was not there. Among those who have habitually looked at Mr. Williams from time to time and figured Beelzebub must be back from his vacation there is now occurring a tremendous change of heart. I suppose it is because at last the National Youth Administration has touched some heart and life close to theirs and, touching it, has touched them.

The Baltimore Sun took a look at Mr. Williams last Sunday when he visited and spoke in Baltimore—and it saw the real Mr. Williams.

Under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I append the editorial which appeared in the Baltimore Sun Tuesday, October 10:

[From the Baltimore Sun of October 10, 1939]

MR. WILLIAMS GOES TO THE RIGHT IN A NEW AGE OF PORTENTS

Sea-serpent weather in October is strange enough, but that is a merely minor prodigy in these cockeyed days. The Communists and the Nazis are now arm in arm, the world's No. 1 militarist wages peace, not war, and a National League team has held the New York Yankees off for eight innings, though the natural order of the universe then intervened in a Yankee win. We have not, it is true, had meteors in the sky, and the birth rate of three-headed calves continues comfortingly low. But Mr. Aubrey Williams, of the National Youth Administration, has come out flat-footed for private initiative and the demobilization, so far as possible, of Government relief.

Time was when Mr. Aubrey Williams was among the flamingest evangels of a new and quite radically altered order. He looked upon the businessman with the disdain then fashionable in certain exalted quarters; the Government, he seemed to feel, could extend its philanthropic embrace without stint or limit to all those who suffered, for whatever reason. For instance, "* * * the support of art, writing, and other artistic pursuits is going to be the business of government," he was certain; "the American people have tasted blood here," and retreat would be impossible. Not that the powers of darkness had been wholly dispersed in the Republic. "We have got to stick together. We have got to keep our friends in power," Mr. Williams assured the Workers Alliance, denying, however, that he meant anything political.

But Mr. Williams was in Baltimore on Sunday and the change in him was almost Jekyllian. Government, now, should merely see to it that "private industry works." The American people now fear a growing bureaucracy; and the permanent unemployment of millions, so long a favorite nightmare of Mr. Williams' more advanced colleagues, now seems to him wholly avoidable. Whirl, indeed, is king in a new era of portents. We wouldn't even be surprised now if Mr. Williams indorsed the profit motive.

Addresses at Dedication of New Gymnasium Building at Seton Hall College

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ALBERT L. VREELAND

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, October 11, 1939

ADDRESSES BY THE MOST REVEREND THOMAS J. WALSH AND REV. DR. JAMES F. KELLEY

Mr. VREELAND. Mr. Speaker, on Thursday, September 28, I brought to the attention of the House of Representatives the laying of the cornerstone of a new gymnasium building of Seton Hall College in my district. It is now my privilege to include herein copies of the speeches given at the ceremonies on October 1, 1939, by the Most Reverend Thomas J. Walsh, archbishop of the diocese of Newark, and the Reverend Dr. James F. Kelley, president of the college.

They are both to be highly commended for their untiring efforts and achievement toward the fulfillment of their dreams.

ADDRESS BY THE MOST REVEREND THOMAS J. WALSH

Your excellencies, most reverend bishops, right reverend and very reverend monsignori, very reverend and reverend fathers, venerable religious brothers and sisters and beloved brethren of the laity, and kind listeners of the radio audience, in the year 1853 the diocese of Newark, comprising the 21 counties of the State of New Jersey, was established by the Holy See. On November 1, 1853, the first bishop of Newark, His Excellency the Most Reverend James Roosevelt Bayley, took canonical possession and was solemnly installed in St. Patrick's Cathedral, Newark.

Bishop Bayley found in the diocese of Newark no religious community of priests or brothers or sisters; no Catholic school; no Catholic charitable institution of mercy; no funds; 41 unpretentious churches or chapels, many of which were burdened and loaded with crushing debts; 35 missionary priests and 40,000 Catholics, rich in faith and virtue, and poor—immensely poor—in financial means.

The first institution organized and put into operation in the diocese of Newark was Seton Hall College. Seton Hall College, instituted and founded as a diocesan college under the direction, supervision, and conduct of the bishop and diocesan clergy for the Catholic college education of male students, was formally opened in a purchased academy building located near Madison, N. J., on September 1, 1856. Seton Hall College was transferred to its present site in South Orange September 10, 1860.

Seton Hall College is civilly incorporated. Clergy and laity, under the presidency of the bishop, constitute its board of trustees.

Seton Hall College was chartered by the State of New Jersey as a college in the year 1861, and registered by the Middle States Accrediting Association on November 26, 1932. Seton Hall College receives day and boarding students.

Seton Hall College was founded in the year 1856, particularly and specifically for the perpetual use of all Catholics then residing or ever to reside for all time within the then diocese of Newark and now the province of Newark, the entire State of New Jersey.

Under the administration of the bishop and diocesan clergy, Seton Hall College has operated uninterruptedly and fruitfully during its venerable life of 83 years.

Many great and immortal scholars graced the professional and administrative chairs of Seton Hall College during the years. Seton Hall College is proud of her students and alumni.

When Seton Hall College was opened on September 1, 1856, 83 years ago, there were then, in the then diocese of Newark, comprising the entire State of New Jersey, 35 priests and 40,000 Catholics. On October 1, 1939, there are in this province of Newark, in this State of New Jersey, 1,250 priests and 1,200,000 Catholics.

May I recommend to the kind attention, consideration, and patronage of all the Catholics in this province of Newark, in the original diocese of Newark, in this State of New Jersey, their very own Seton Hall College.

Seton Hall Diocesan High and College Preparatory School for Boys was established as a distinct educational institution here on the Seton Hall College property in September, 1899. Seton Hall High School for Boys was registered in the Middle States Association in 1930. Seton Hall High and College Preparatory School is a boarding and day school for boys. Seton Hall Diocesan High and College Preparatory School, attended this current year by 535 boys, is recommended.

Seton Hall College now has 581 registered students. Seton Hall College extension schools for men and women in Newark and Jersey City now have a registration of more than 1,000 students, and are recommended.

I thank the most reverend bishops, the right reverend, very reverend, and reverend clergy, the venerable religious brothers and sisters, and all members of the laity—men, women, and children—for the esteemed honor of your appreciated presence at Seton Hall College for the memorable function of this day.

I bless Seton Hall College and you all.

ADDRESS BY REV. DR. JAMES F. KELLEY

Your excellency, Most Rev. Thomas Joseph Walsh, archbishop of Newark; your excellencies, most reverend bishops, right reverend, very reverend monsignori, very reverend and reverend fathers, distinguished guests, and all friends of Seton Hall; those of you who have braved these elements today and those of you on the radio, through the kindness of station WAAT:

On an occasion like this it is permissible and proper to take just a moment to express a word of sincere thanks to all friends of Seton Hall. On behalf of the faculty and student body, then, may I extend our grateful thanks, first to our presiding leader, his excellency, Archbishop Walsh; to the illustrious prelates who have honored us by their presence; to our distinguished guests and alumni, and to all of you, our friends. Seton Hall is indeed proud of the honor you pay her by your gracious presence and gratefully thanks you for the encouragement you inspire.

It is not saying anything new to remark that our civilization stands today at the crossroads. Newspapers, magazines, and radio all are shouting about the chaos in Europe and Asia; of wars declared and undeclared; of new empires striving against old ones; of governments overthrown by modern Neros; of Christianity and democracy being attacked by peculiar diabolical "isms." We seem to be living at the closing of one era and the beginning of some new strange economic and social and political epoch. What is going to happen, or, for that matter, what is actually happening, no one really knows. But one fact that will appeal to all of us is that if the foundations of society and culture are being destroyed, then whatever safeguards we can find to reinforce civilization should be welcomed and supported by every American.

Now, one of the most powerful bulwarks against anti-American, antireligious "isms" is a true system of education. There would be nothing to worry about in this country if every American student were being taught his real duties to God, to his country, to his neighbor, and to himself. Instead of that, however, while we nightly condemn dictators who use education simply to develop useful, unenquiring blind slaves of the state, still our own American education has been making the mistake for years of treating man merely as a material and intellectual animal. In denying or neglecting man's spiritual nature, we are endangering American democracy far more than any outside communistic or nazi-istic enemies by jeopardizing the origin and source of man's individuality, of his freedom and liberty, and of all those God-given rights so dear to America and to America alone.

If education is even half as important as all this, then today's event is an outstanding occasion not only in the life of Seton Hall, but for the community and the State which it serves. For these ceremonies in which you are taking part mark not merely the building of a new material gymnasium, but reveal the growth of an educational system built upon the philosophy of respect for God and country and fellow man, and built upon the old-fashioned idea that education should perfect the entire individual in his physical, intellectual, and spiritual faculties. Those have been the ideas and ideals guiding Seton Hall in her 83 years of service to science and religion and democracy. And because today is an important milestone for her, a bridge between her past traditions and her future glories, I would like your permission to take you back over the past history of Seton Hall and then to tell you of her present and future greatness.

The story of Seton Hall College is intimately connected with the early history of the Diocese of Newark. It was only 87 years ago—in 1853—that the State of New Jersey was divided from the Diocese of New York, and for the first time set up as a separate diocese. The Most Reverend James Roosevelt Bayley, descendent of two pre-Revolutionary American families—the Bayleys and the Roosevelts—was appointed as the first bishop of Newark. In this present great New Jersey of today it is hard to visualize the condition that existed here less than 100 years ago. While today we have approximately 1,250 priests for about 1,200,000 Catholic people in the great province of New Jersey, comprising the Archdiocese of Newark and the Dioceses of Trenton, Paterson, and Camden, only 83 years ago Bishop Bayley found but 35 priests and 40,000 Catholic people. The people were largely first generation immigrants from every land across the sea, poor in wealth and learning, but weighted down with the riches of faith. As far as can be learned there were but 41 poor churches or chapels; no Catholic charitable institutions of mercy; no religious brothers or sisters, and but three or four elementary schools in the entire State or diocese.

Midst these poor conditions the first institutions founded in the Diocese of Newark by Bishop Bayley were Seton Hall College and the Diocesan Major Seminary—two distinct and separate institutions, but both, then and still under the direction of the Ordinary of the Archdiocese of Newark. Seton Hall College, the first Catholic college in New Jersey, was from the beginning, and still is, staffed by the secular clergy of the Diocese of Newark and is one of the nine colleges in America conducted by diocesan clergy. Bishop Bayley's first assignment after his ordination in 1844 had been as the vice president of St. John's College in the Bronx, N. Y. He knew well then that the most urgent need in this new territory was to set up an institution which would ensure outstanding educated leaders. As he surveyed the destitute condition of his new diocese, one man stood out as the coworker who could carry out his educational dreams. He, too, had had experience as an educator; like his superior, had previously been an instructor in St. John's College in New York, and having founded the first permanent Catholic school in New Jersey during his pastorate in Madison.

In Morristown, too, he had been an ardent advocate of parochial schools, and Bishop Bayley chose him as his educator. Seton Hall was fortunate beyond words in having as its first president a man whose fiery zeal and indomitable courage and tireless energy gave it the initial impetus which carried it on through the Civil War and the World War and the crises of the late nineties and of our own times, and which rebuilt itself upon the ashes of three destructive fires. It was Bishop Bayley and the then Father McQuaid who together selected as the first site of Seton Hall the mansion building of Madame Chegarry's Academy in Convent Station, N. J. Courses were begun there in September 1856 with an enrollment of five students. Like most early American schools, it was born in poverty and reared in the determined efforts of its founders to spread the gospels of goodness and truth and knowledge. As institutions, like men, are oftentimes great because of the obstacles they have had to overcome, within 3 years, in 1859, it was found that the property in Madison was too small for the number of students applying for registration. So, together, once again Bishop Bayley and Father McQuaid set out, and after weary months of searching for adequate buildings and grounds, on April 2, 1860, they purchased the present property in the village of South Orange. Because the extensive white-marble mansion on the 60-acre campus would still be insufficient for the number of students who were now enrolled, the cornerstone of a new building was laid on May 15, 1860, and in September of the same year courses began for the first time on the present campus. Within a year, in March 1861, Seton Hall obtained a charter and was incorporated by a special act of the legislature, which was immediately approved by Gov. Charles F. Oldin, a charter as liberal as any ever granted by the State of New Jersey, giving to Seton Hall all the rights and privileges of a university. That charter expressly stated that Seton Hall was to have a personal existence as a college, and granted the right to confer every degree granted, then or in the future, by any college in the State of New Jersey. In the words of the charter itself, Seton Hall was to have the power of conferring the usual academic and other degrees compatible with the laws of the State of New Jersey; therefore, was to have the right to grant all academic degrees from the bachelor's to the master's and doctor's, and all other degrees, such as all other honorary degrees.

Such were the beginnings of Seton Hall 83 years ago. That is quite an old age as far as American colleges go. For in its 163 years of existence America has necessarily been more concerned with material growth and expansion than with the arts. Comparatively few of her colleges or universities go back more than a century. Of the 800 colleges in America today, Seton Hall is older than 600 of them. Only 2 institutions of higher learning preceded Seton Hall in New Jersey—New Jersey College (later Princeton), founded in 1746, and Queens College (later Rutgers), founded in 1776. Seton Hall was thus the first college founded in New Jersey as a State of the Union. With a longer record of service than 75 percent of the colleges in America today, she has seen hundreds of colleges come and go; she has seen many of those now existing close their doors for varying periods of years. Her 83 years of uninterrupted service have developed a system so outstanding that it deserves an explanation here.

For today this illustrious old institution has become one of America's finer colleges—old enough to have earned a heritage, yet young enough to learn and to keep progressing. One of the country's most progressive colleges, with spirit and vitality, she is breaking some old traditions by establishing new ones. Fifteen thousand two hundred and ninety-five students have gone through her classrooms from 1856 to 1939, and 1,666 of these have received their degrees. Originally the only Catholic college in New Jersey, she is still the only Catholic boarding college for men in the State, and in addition to boarding students, two-thirds of her enrollment are day students.

It is not the least bit of an exaggeration to say that Seton Hall today is the fastest growing college in the United States. In place of the 5 students in 1856, the enrollment for this year, 1939–40, is 2,295 in its campus and urban divisions. Her five classroom buildings and her six dormitory buildings are crowded to the walls, necessitating this year for the first time in her history the acquisition of dormitory facilities off the campus.

For this largest enrollment of students in her history, she offers courses and degrees in 11 distinct departments. To take care of these courses, in place of the faculty of 3 in 1856, she has an outstanding faculty of 170 professors, 25 of whom have their doctor's degrees, and 57 their master's degrees. Every department is under the direct supervision of a doctor in his specialty.

If it be true that no college is better than its faculty, Seton Hall is indeed one of America's best, for her faculty has been carefully selected from all over this country and from foreign universities including degreed representatives of 36 outstanding colleges and universities. Since the spirit of any organization is the composite of its members Seton Hall has a capable group of educators who still cling to the idea that man was made by God and for God and that the Deity had done a better work than the American educators who during the past century remade man and left out the soul. Believing with St. Augustine "Thou didst create us O Lord for Thyself and our heart is restless till it rests in Thee" the faculty of Seton Hall believes that the true purpose of education is the proportionate development of the entire man—mind and body and soul.

It is this understanding of education that Seton Hall attempts to impart to the candidates that it selects from its applicants. For several years now Seton Hall has been in the very desirable and enviable position of having more applicants than it has been able to accept. Not wishing to grow too rapidly and anxious to obtain the best possible college material those who would profit most from her years of schooling, an admissions' committee for several years has been laying down conditions for admission far more exacting than the average college could dare to demand. As a result of most rigid standards of entrance requirements, 33 percent of the college applicants were rejected in 1938, and 25 percent of the current year.

Most of this startling growth has occurred within the past decade. Much of it may be attributed perhaps to the greater demand for real college education. Some of the growth, too, may be explained by the increased facilities for reaching the college—scarcely any college could have a more enviable position, situated only 14 miles outside of New York City, and on the city line of Newark, in a suburban population that is well able to patronize college courses and able to gaze from its summit over the homes of more than 10,000,000 people; with suburban electrified railroad running into its municipality and bus service connecting it with all outlying areas.

But the factor most responsible for this phenomenal increase is to be found in the person of the president of the board of trustees, His Excellency Archbishop Walsh. This is neither the time nor the place for praise or flattery, but the record demands this statement of fact; that it was primarily his excellency's development and improvement of the quality of the curriculum and of the selection of her faculty which has been the major cause of this outstanding growth. It is without any semblance of platitude or flattery that one would say that what Bishop Bayley and Father McQuaid were to Seton Hall in its origin, Archbishop Walsh has been in its resurrection and renaissance of the past 10 years. No living memory can recall anyone who has shown more interest and who has done more for Seton Hall than our present archbishop. As president of the board of trustees of Seton Hall, his administrative and executive ability, his foresight and planning, vitalizing zeal and energy have raised Seton Hall to the distinction which it now enjoys. In spite of the multitude of works and worries that few men but himself could visualize, much less endure, His Excellency Archbishop Walsh has always found time for the administration of Seton Hall. My two distinguished predecessors now present, His Excellency Bishop Thomas H. McLaughlin, of Paterson, N. J., president of Seton Hall from 1922 until 1932, and His Excellency Francis J. Monaghan, Bishop of Ogdensburg, N. Y., president from 1933 to 1936, will agree with me that their outstanding development of Seton Hall was always inspired and aided by His Excellency Archbishop Walsh. He has been the driving force behind every progressive move made at Seton Hall since he first came to live on her campus 11 years ago. It was because Archbishop Walsh was unwilling to recommend anything but the very best in education that Bishop McLaughlin expended every effort to set up a complete college, including not only the bachelor of arts, as it has always done, but the bachelor of science curriculum as well, placing all departments under the supervision of a doctor in that specific subject, and finally, in November 1930, winning for the college the national recognition of accrediting agencies like the Middle Atlantic States Association. It was only after such recognition had been obtained that Archbishop Walsh on every public occasion at which he spoke, invited the Catholic young men of his diocese to support and attend Seton Hall College. Because he himself was never satisfied with minima requirements, he has ever encouraged and insisted upon constant improvement in the curriculum and facilities at Seton Hall.

No better proof of his interest in the advancement of all things pertaining to Seton Hall is to be found than in the definite example of the new auditorium-gymnasium. It was because of his own belief that education must aim at intellectual, spiritual, and physical development; because of his realization that man is a composite of body and soul with their mutual interdependence; because of his realization that in our modern age it is frequently necessary to approach the spiritual through the physical, that the long-dreamed-of building has taken form in this outstanding $700,000 edifice. For many long years alumni and friends of Seton Hall have talked of the absolute necessity for a gymnasium and for recreational facilities, but no decisive steps were ever taken until, under the inspiration of His Excellency Archbishop Walsh, a campaign was conducted in 1935. This fund was then deposited in the Newark chancery office and a printed list of the names and amounts contributed was distributed. In May 1939 his excellency the archbishop appointed a committee of five, under the chairmanship of the Very Reverend Monsignor John G. Delaney, to study the problem of a new gymnasium. In the course of the next 2 years this committee visited the outstanding gymnasia along the eastern seaboard and in the Midwestern States in its quest of features which they wished to incorporate in their own building. On May 2, 1939, the final meeting of this committee took place and contracts were awarded on June 23, 1939. Six days later, on June 29, formal breaking of the ground took place in the presence of many of you who are here today.

Those of you who are here, though you see only the skeleton of the building, can appreciate that when completed it will be one of the outstanding gymnasia here in the East. In the mezzanine basement, which is directly before you, can be seen the outline of a magnificent theater, equipped for stage or motion pictures, to accommodate an audience of several hundred, and alongside of it the cafeteria-dining room and modern kitchen, the many bowling alleys and squash courts and rifle ranges; the main swimming pool, 75 feet long by 35 feet wide, and alongside of it the beginners' practice pool, with its row of 350 spectators' benches, and over to the left the large exercising rooms, fencing, boxing, and wrestling rooms. Alongside of these the billiard room. Here on the level on which I am standing, 10 feet above the ground, to which a series of 8 limestone steps lead to a large platform, and another series of 8 steps up to a magnificent lobby, will be one of the largest basketball courts in the East, containing 2 practice courts of regular size, 48 feet by 84 feet, with a main exhibition court in the center running lengthwise, also of standard size. At the far end of the auditorium on the same floor will be the vast stage, 68 feet long by 25 feet wide, with huge scenery storage spaces to the right of it, and to its left the 4 dressing rooms, 2 on the main floor and 2 in the mezzanine balcony. On either side are classrooms for physical-education courses and adjoining them offices for the professors in these courses, and for the athletic directors, reception rooms for newspapermen and visitors, and offices for the coaches of various sports. These are only a few of the features that are incorporated in this tremendously large building, 225 feet long and 154 feet wide.

The site of the building was chosen because of its ideal location, lying as it does immediately on the city line of Newark and on the village line of South Orange, with an entrance on one side from South Orange and on the other from the city of Newark, permitting access to the building for all activities for a 5-cent bus fare. Two other roadways leading off from the huge parking space running clear ahead of us here some several hundred feet, taking care of 1,500 cars; one road leading directly to the main entrance of South Orange Avenue, while another leads out to the Ward Place entrance, bordering on South Orange and Maplewood. It would be impossible to conceive of a better location for a building; one more accessible to people in the community and people in the metropolitan area.

Since my assigned half hour is drawing to a close, very briefly and very quickly may I end as I began with a word of thanks to you all. Your presence here today has been a tribute to a glorious past that this old institution has compiled and will be an inspiration to it to serve in ever-increasing measures the present and the future. Seton Hall will try to keep pace with your tribute by serving both the community of Essex County and the entire State to the fullest capacity possible by offering to those who seek the best education an opportunity to find it right here at home. As the years go on the community should be still more proud of Seton Hall as it realizes that no college in the country offers more in the way of an outstanding faculty and diversity of courses, and degrees which are recognized universally, and, above all, in the thoroughness of the training which it affords to their youth. As she has done for more than one-half the lifetime of this country, Seton Hall will continue as one of the Nation's greatest custodians of true education, as the champion of truth and knowledge and goodness, as the defender of religion and liberty and democracy. May God grant her long, long years as His educator, leading the youth of today and the youngsters of tomorrow as she did her gray-haired sons of yesteryear against the frontiers of error and ignorance.

United States Does Not Pay Rent for Ground Where American Dead Are Buried in France

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN J. COCHRAN

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, October 11, 1939

LETTER FROM GEN. JOHN J. PERSHING

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Speaker, in these critical days when appeals are being made to arouse our citizens on the question of neutrality, many statements are made not based upon facts.

In a recent address a very well-known clergyman who uses the radio weekly made the statement that France charged our Government rent for the ground where American soldiers are buried in that country. I knew the distinguished clergyman was in error, but to make sure I was correct I wrote a letter to Gen. John J. Pershing, chairman of the American Battle Monuments Commission, and as part of my remarks I include his reply. General Pershing's letter follows:

[The American Battle Monuments Commission. Established by Congress, March 1923. John J. Pershing, chairman; Robert G. Woodside, vice chairman; J. B. P. Clayton Hill; D. John Markey; David A. Reed; Finis J. Garrett; Mrs. Henry Fenimore Baker]

WASHINGTON, October 6, 1939.

Hon. JOHN J. COCHRAN,
United States House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. COCHRAN: In reply to your inquiry of October 4, I wish to say that the United States Government does not pay rent on the graves of our American dead who are buried in France. In fact, the French Government has exempted us from the payment of taxes or duties of any kind whatsoever on the land on which our cemeteries and memorials are located and on the materials which we have sent to France for these establishments.

With best wishes and kindest regards, I am,

Sincerely yours,

JOHN J. PERSHING, Chairman.

Effect of Pending Neutrality Legislation on the Merchant Marine

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. KEY PITTMAN

OF NEVADA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, October 12 (legislative day of Wednesday October 4), 1939

STATEMENT OF HON. JOSIAH W. BAILEY, OF NORTH CAROLINA

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have published in the Appendix of the RECORD a statement prepared by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BAILEY], chairman of the Committee on Commerce of the Senate, supplying data with regard to our American merchant marine, and suggesting the effect on the merchant marine of the enactment of the proposed legislation. It is a very able statement and very clear. I may say that I do not agree as to the loss to our merchant marine, but that is simply a difference of opinion. There is no proposed amendment suggested, and, therefore, I do not feel in any way committed by the statement.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The joint resolution (H. J. Res. 306), as reported in the Senate, would repeal the Neutrality Acts of August 31, 1935, as amended, and of January 8, 1937, and prescribe in lieu thereof regulations restricting the activities of American vessels and American citizens in trade and intercourse with belligerent states in wars in which the United States is neutral.

It clearly appears from the hearings on neutrality bills of the Seventy-sixth Congress, first session, and the reports on House Joint Resolution 306, that the central objective of the pending legislation is to restrict the neutral rights of our citizens and ships in foreign commerce in order to maintain our Nation at peace. The worthiness of this objective is unquestioned. It is desirable, however, to examine the methods proposed in the bill to attain this objective, because the proposed restrictions would profoundly affect the merchant marine of the United States and would disturb and dislocate the flow of our commerce, with resultant losses and hardships not only to the shipping industry (both management and labor), but to producers, shippers, and consumers as well.

Under the law of nations the ships and the citizens of a neutral country have the right to engage in trade and commerce with any nation, belligerent or neutral, subject to rules as to blockade and contraband of war. The powers of the neutral state usually are exercised to maintain these rights of its citizens and its commerce. However, our national policy, as expressed in our existing statutes, restricts these neutral rights of our ships and citizens in certain respects affecting ocean shipping and travel. Under these existing statutes, when the President, as he has done in the case of the present European war, finds that there exists a state of war between two or more foreign states, he is directed to proclaim such fact, and it is then unlawful to export or transport (directly or by transshipment via a neutral country) arms, ammunition, or implements of war from the United States to any belligerent state named in the proclamation; it is unlawful for American citizens to travel on ships of belligerent countries except in accordance with rules prescribed by the President; and it is unlawful for any American vessel engaged in commerce with a warring nation to be armed. These provisions of law do not seriously disrupt our foreign trade, nor do they discriminate against American shipping to any material extent.

Under the pending bill (H. J. Res. 306), as reported in the Senate, if the Congress (by concurrent resolution) or the President finds that there exists a state of war between foreign states, and finds that it is necessary to promote the security or preserve the peace of the United States or protect the lives of its citizens, the President is directed to issue a proclamation naming the states involved (sec. 1 (a)). When such a proclamation is issued—

(1) It will be unlawful for any American vessel to carry any passengers or articles or materials to any belligerent state, with exceptions as to inland and overland trade with Canada (sec. 2 (f)), and certain limited exceptions relating principally to passenger and mail transportation in the Western Hemisphere (sec. 2 (g));

(2) (If the President also finds protection of our citizens requires it) it will be unlawful, except as prescribed in rules and regulations, for any citizen of the United States or any American vessel to proceed into or through any combat area defined by the President (sec. 3);

(3) It will be unlawful for any citizen of the United States to travel on any vessel of a belligerent state except in accordance with such rules and regulations as may be prescribed (sec. 5);

(4) It will be unlawful for any American vessel engaged in commerce with any foreign state to be armed (sec. 6); and

(5) It will be unlawful to export or transport from the United States to a belligerent state any articles or materials unless all title therein is transferred to a foreign government or national (sec. 7).

Both the present law and the pending joint resolution exempt any American republic engaged in war against a non-American state from the provisions thereof.

Other provisions of the bill, not directly affecting the maintenance of the American merchant marine, are omitted from this discussion.

Considering first the general effect of the bill on the American merchant marine, the United States has a definite long-established statutory national policy (now expressed in the Merchant Marine Act, 1936) providing for the development and maintenance of a merchant marine sufficient to provide shipping service on routes essential for maintaining the flow of its water-borne export and import foreign commerce, capable of serving as a naval and military auxiliary in time of war or national emergency, and owned and operated under the United States flag by citizens of the United States. For many years the United States persistently has encouraged private capital to invest in shipping in order to secure such a merchant marine. Under the Merchant Marine Act, 1936, the United States subsidizes the construction and operation of American vessels for use in essential trade routes in competition with foreign operators. Under the subsidy contracts, operators of subsidized vessels must maintain necessary shipping services on these essential routes. Provision is made for the employment and training of American citizens as officers and seamen. Under this act the United States has the fullest right to requisition American vessels for national-defense purposes. Section 9 of the Shipping Act, 1916, prohibits the sale or lease of American-flag vessels to foreigners or their transfer to foreign registry except with the consent of the Maritime Commission. Under this policy the shipping industry with the aid of the United States has embarked upon a program of merchant-marine development which since 1936 has made tremendous strides in attaining the objectives of the national policy.

The restrictions of the pending bill not only would seriously disrupt, curtail, and injure the American shipping industry, but would bring to a virtual stop this program to develop and maintain the American merchant marine as a great national benefit and asset.

The American merchant marine would be placed at great disadvantage in competition with foreign shipping. The bill would remove the embargo upon the shipment of arms and munitions to belligerent countries, an embargo which affects shipping in both American and foreign vessels. The restrictions proposed in lieu thereof prohibit the shipment of all articles and materials to belligerents by American vessels and would leave the foreign vessels, whether neutral or belligerent, free from such restrictions. American shipping would be prohibited from carrying any commerce, however innocent in nature, from the United States, or from any other country, to any belligerent country named in the proclamation, no matter how far such belligerent is removed from actual combat zones. American shipping is to be prohibited from proceeding into or through any combat area, as defined by the President, even though trade lanes to other neutral countries are thereby blocked. There is no restriction against carrying passengers, articles, or materials in American vessels from any state named in the Presidential proclamation to the United States, or to any other neutral state, but this privilege is subject to the prohibition against passage through a combat area.

It is impossible to foresee or appraise the precise effects of the proposed legislation upon the American merchant marine. For example, the legislation will undoubtedly affect American tanker operations; but the ramifications of the tanker problem are so great that no definite predictions can be made at present. Predicated upon combat areas, which might be prescribed in view of present conditions, upon the assumption that the list of belligerents is not enlarged, and enactment of the bill in substantially its present form, some fairly definite results can be stated.

Approximately 130 American dry cargo, combination or passenger ships of about 860,000 gross tons would be withdrawn from service. The lines upon which the great majority of these ships operate would be abandoned.

In addition to the 130 ships in foreign trade, 16 American ships of approximately 80,000 gross tons—dry cargo and tank vessels usually considered a part of our coastwise fleet but principally engaged in trade between Atlantic, Gulf, and Pacific ports of the United States and Canadian ports—could no longer operate as at present.

Estimates indicate that between 165 and 170 American dry cargo, combination or passenger ships of about 1,100,000 gross tons could continue to operate in foreign trade, much as at present, although more than half of these—in number and tonnage—would be adversely affected, some seriously. The uncertainty as to the future of some of these operations, however, is illustrated by the fact that if it became necessary to enter a combat area to serve Mediterranean ports, 20 vessels of 108,000 gross tons immediately would be withdrawn, and 7 other vessels of 74,000 gross tons would have to be rerouted so drastically, it is possible their continued operation might no longer be practicable.

The abandonment, curtailment, or injury to the American services above referred to will have far-reaching repercussions. Some of the more obvious consequences may be summarized as follows:

1. Those lines which would necessarily abandon their services would be forced to reduce their organizations and release personnel. They would bear heavy out-of-pocket expense for lay-up of the vessels as well as depreciation expense, unless such vessels could be employed in some other trade. The prospectus for such other employment is not encouraging, in view of the large number of American ships which would be thrown out of service and made surplus.

2. Many of the ships are subject to mortgage indebtedness, some in large amounts. If operations cease there would be no revenue with which to make mortgage interest and amortization payments. The mortgages then would be in default and the vessels subject to foreclosure. Insofar as these mortgages are held by the United States, it would be morally questionable to foreclose them, since the default would be due to governmental action.

3. Some of the lines involved have entered into long-range construction agreements with the United States. If their revenues are wiped out by governmental action, obviously they will have no money for new ship construction.

4. If the vessels under discussion are laid up for a long period, their usefulness in case of emergency would be seriously impaired. Some plan should be developed to the end that vessels removed from service will be kept in condition for immediate operation to meet possible national-defense requirements.

5. Thousands of American seamen would be thrown out of employment.

6. The merchant-marine training program would be adversely affected. It would seem idle to expect young men to continue to train for a career at sea on American vessels if such vessels are to be removed from the sea en masse each time a limited area might be dangerous.

7. Whenever the restrictions on operation become no longer applicable, the American shipping companies, if able and willing, would have to begin their services all over again and gradually build up in the face of many handicaps. The shipping business, being highly competitive, cannot be dropped and reentered at will. Shipping goodwill is an asset which is built up gradually. A period of pioneering must be gone through to secure business; good agency relations must be reestablished, and solicitation must proceed along definite channels. Should our vessels be laid up for even a year, it would be many years before they could regain their present position in the trades.

8. Many American steamship companies would no doubt be in such poor financial condition that they would not be able to reestablish operations.

9. Money spent for American ship wages, stores and supplies, feeding, repairs, insurance, etc., amounting to many millions of dollars a year, is largely expended in the United States. Similar expenditures by foreign ships are made abroad so far as is practicable. If a great number of American ships are laid up, the loss on these items to American business would be very considerable.

10. An examination of the prospects for rerouting American vessels affected by the proposed prohibitions shows very little prospect of profitable employment for such vessels in services from the United States to nonbelligerent countries and possessions. Very few foreign vessels have been withdrawn from the South American trade. The South American trade volume may increase, but steady employment for more than 100 additional American ships, or even a considerable portion of them, cannot be visualized. Similarly, trans-Pacific trade with the Orient has declined within the last year and there appears no room for any number of additional vessels in that trade.

This summary of effects of the proposed legislation should be qualified with respect to subsidized vessels, in view of section 611 of the Merchant Marine Act, 1936, as amended. That section provides that in the event the United States defaults on an operating subsidy contract or cancels the same without just cause the contract, upon compliance with the provisions of the section, may transfer its vessels to foreign registry. By reason of the sweeping restrictions of the proposed legislation many American vessels will be prevented from operating in accordance with the law and contracts entered into under the law. These conditions might be held a default on the part of the United States in carrying out its contracts. Transfer of these vessels to foreign registry probably would be beneficial to the American owners under the circumstances envisioned but questionable desirability from the standpoint of the merchant marine and the national defense of the United States.

The foregoing discussion has been concerned principally with the effect of the proposed legislation upon American ships and shipping companies. Its effect on American commerce in general should also be considered. Section 2 applies only to commerce carried to belligerent countries. (N. B.—It is not entirely clear whether commerce destined for a neutral port and carried to a belligerent port (and out again) en route to the neutral port is permitted.) Commerce from such countries may be carried in American ships.

A number of commodities which are vital to the industry and the national welfare of the United States such as rubber, tin, manganese, ore, chrome ore, etc., must be transported from belligerent dominions, colonies, dependencies, and protectorates which may be far removed from combat areas. If American vessels are prohibited from carrying any commerce (however unrelated to warfare) to these so-called belligerent sources of vital materials, the American vessels must proceed there in ballast, and charge a greatly increased rate on the vital import commodities to cover the entire expense of the voyage. This increased transportation cost must be passed on to American industry and the American consumer.

Whether foreign neutral or belligerent merchant ships will be available to engage in the trades under consideration cannot be determined at present. It is probable that merchant ships of the belligerent countries will be needed for their national wartime purposes. If the war conditions continue over a long period, it is likewise probable that merchant ships of neutrals can find more lucrative employment in or near the war zones than in such services as the United States-Straits Settlements, or India, or Africa trades, even though they could charge American exporters high rates for carrying out-bound cargoes to such countries, since American ships would be barred from such out-bound trade.

Materials and articles now purchased in the United States by foreign combatant and outlying belligerent countries will of necessity be purchased from our trade competitors if foreign-flag vessels cannot be found to carry them from the United States.

It appears probable that the net result of the proposed "shipping to belligerents ban" will be a return to the conditions of 1914–18, when American products of farm and factory were piled on wharves and in warehouses for want of adequate shipping facilities or for markets which could afford to absorb the shipping rates; also a return to scarcity and high cost of essential import materials. These results may be so damaging to our domestic economy that the proposed neutrality law, if enacted, will have to be changed. By that time, however, American industry, exporters, and shipowners will have suffered enormous losses.

The United States has invested large sums in the development of trade routes, from which it is now proposed to withdraw our ships. No record is found of any such withdrawal by any neutral country, whether strong or weak, in advance of actual danger. It is now proposed to write off this cost in the interest of neutrality on the assumption that American ships trading with belligerents will bring us nearer to war.

Even if it be assumed that the presence of American ships in war zones contributed in some degree to our involvement in the World War, it cannot be claimed with justice that those trading to outlying belligerent countries contributed to such involvement.

At the present time the insurance companies, convinced that Germany's submarine campaign against British and French commercial shipping has begun to lose effectiveness, have slashed (as of September 28, 1939) war-risk rates 16.6 percent on cargoes carried in English or French ships traveling to and from the United States and Europe. When experience is showing an increase in the safety factor of belligerent ships in the combat areas, why should the United States voluntarily withdraw its safer neutral ships from many of the principal trade routes of the world, some of these removed by thousands of miles from the combat areas, and that before the established right of our ships to operate on such routes has been questioned?

Undoubtedly the most far-reaching provision of the pending bill is the prohibition against shipping any article or material in American vessels to a belligerent country. It appears from the considerations above discussed that this provision will disrupt American commerce and will destroy much of the American merchant marine. This prohibition is highly artificial and arbitrary. It prohibits the transportation of cargo in American vessels to belligerent countries regardless of whether the cargo is loaded in the United States or in some other country; regardless of the nature of the cargo, whether absolute contraband, conditional contraband, or noncontraband; regardless of whether the port of destination and the waters traversed are in a combat zone or not; and regardless of whether or not the destination or the waters traversed are blockaded, patrolled, or mined. Inland and overland trade with Canada is excepted along with some minor exceptions as to the Western Hemisphere, but shipping to Australia, New Zealand, Hong Kong, South Africa, Straits Settlements, French Indochina, India, and other outlying countries far separated from the mother country at war is prohibited. No reason appears why our ships should keep off practically all the highways of the seas because a few sea lanes are blocked or purported to be blocked by belligerent countries, nor why normal intercourse between nations at peace should be disrupted.

Section 2 apparently goes considerably beyond the peace-safeguarding methods proposed by the President in his message on neutrality. The President proposed a restriction on American ships and American citizens from moving in danger areas to be designated by Executive action. To proclaim by statute that movement in American ships to any belligerent technically at war, regardless of the actualities of the war conditions, imposes a needless sacrifice on American shipping likely to be highly expensive and certain to be disruptive of American commerce.

Although the Senate committee having jurisdiction over the legislation has not seen fit to solve the problem by a withdrawal of the protection of the United States from ships and citizens traveling in danger zones, it is suggested that it does not necessarily follow that the restriction adopted should be so broad as to include countries only nominally at war, such as far-distant dominions, colonies, dependencies, or protectorates of an empire at war. If a discretion similar to that vested in the President under section 3 (c) were added to section 2, areas of a country only technically at war could be properly excepted.

Effect on Merchant Marine of Pending Neutrality Legislation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. STYLES BRIDGES

OF NEW HAMPSHIRE

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, October 12 (legislative day of Wednesday October 4), 1939

ARTICLE BY MARK SULLIVAN AND EDITORIAL FROM THE NEW YORK HERALD TRIBUNE

Mr. BRIDGES. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the RECORD an article by Mark Sullivan, published in this morning's New York Herald Tribune, and an editorial from the Herald Tribune along the same line. Both deal with the effect of the proposed neutrality legislation on American shipping.

There being no objection, the article and editorial were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the New York Herald Tribune of October 12, 1939]

DEATH BLOW TO MERCHANT MARINE SEEN IN PROPOSED NEUTRALITY BILL—MARK SULLIVAN SAYS CURB ON SHIPPING WOULD DRIVE HUNDREDS FROM SEA AND IMPAIR UNITED STATES DEFENSE—QUOTES WARNING GIVEN BY ADMIRAL LAND

(By Mark Sullivan)

WASHINGTON, October 11.—What Admiral Emory S. Land said to Congress over the radio Tuesday night—he said it in perfectly polite words, as becomes an officer and a gentleman and an Annapolis graduate, but, in the vernacular, what he said—amounted to, "Wait a minute, there! Do you realize what you are doing to those ships?"

It was merchant ships the admiral meant, not naval vessels. The admiral, after a fine career in the Navy, is now serving the Government in the field of merchant shipping. He is Chairman of the United States Maritime Commission, set up in 1936. Its business was and is to restore American merchant shipping to the sea. To that end, the Commission has spent hundreds of millions of dollars building ships, chartering ships, and subsidizing operation of ships.

Having this responsibility of building up an American merchant marine, Admiral Land was obliged to take notice of what would be the effect of the neutrality bill now in Congress. Because of what Admiral Land said and what others begin to say; because of the facts underlying what they say, it is necessary for the public to understand what the neutrality bill does about merchant ships.

RIGHTS WOULD BE WAIVED

In war our merchant ships, like merchant ships of all neutrals, have certain rights under international law. These rights we now propose to waive. The word "waive" is used rather than "give up," for in Senate discussion it is pointed out that we should retain the privilege of sometime reasserting our rights under international law, if we choose to. But for the present, in order to go great lengths in avoiding involvement in the war, we propose to waive the rights of our merchant ships.

What we undertake to do about our merchant ships, as provided in the proposed neutrality measure, is to set up great limitations, to put our ships under servere restrictions and penalties.

First, the proposed measure says, "it shall be unlawful for any American vessel to carry any passengers or any articles or materials to any state" that is at war.

Now, when the states at war include Britain and France, they take in much territory. This provision of the neutrality measure would make it unlawful for any American ship to go to any colony or dependency of France or England. It would be unlawful to go to Australia, or to India, or Hong Kong, or any French possession in the South Seas; or to Newfoundland, or to Bermuda, or any British or French possession in the West Indies or South or Central America.

It would even be unlawful for an American ship to go by sea to Canada. The bill contains an exception making it all right for an American ship to cross an inland water, to go from Buffalo or Chicago across the Lakes to Canada. But it would be unlawful for an American ship to go from Boston to Halifax or from Seattle to Vancouver.

(I have said in all cases "unlawful to go." Actually the words of the measure are "unlawful to carry passengers or articles to." This phrasing is probably inadvertent. Few ships would care to go empty.)

The measure does a second thing, an overlapping thing. It provides that the President, in his discretion, shall define "combat areas," and thereafter it shall be unlawful * * * for any American vessel to proceed into or through any such combat area.

Combat areas presumably would be most of the waters of western Europe—the North Sea, Baltic Sea, the English Channel, the waters west of France, and perhaps Mediterranean waters south of France. The setting up of such combat areas would keep American ships not only away from the nations at war but presumably from Norway, Sweden, Denmark, Holland, perhaps from some Mediterranean ports.

RESTRICTIONS ARE BROAD

These restrictions are imposed upon American ships without regard to the nature of their cargoes—they might be carrying toy balloons or baby rattles. And the penalties for violation are severe—5 years in jail, $50,000 fine, or both.

The effects of all this would be to drive hundreds of American merchant ships from the sea; turn the business and routes of these ships over to others, the Japanese or European neutrals—other neutrals who will stand on their rights under international law.

It will become difficult for America to get needed raw materials, such as jute, from India. The further, indirect consequences would be many. One consequence would be serious impairment of our national defense, for, as Admiral Land pointed out, merchant ships are necessary to a strong navy.

Fifteen years ago it was said that the 1922 Conference for the Limitation of Naval Armament at Washington sank more warships than all the battles in history. A current wisecrack says the proposed neutrality bill if not changed would sink more merchant vessels than ever were sunk by torpedo or cannon shot. This would not be material if it prevented our involvement in war. But are we sure it will?

Here, plainly, is a thing that few realize, which must be thought about, about which something must be done.

[From the New York Herald Tribune of October 12, 1939]

SACRIFICING AMERICAN SHIPPING

Senator BAILEY, of North Carolina, whose interest in the American merchant marine is well known, has rendered a service in calling attention to the probable effects on the merchant marine if no modifications are made in the initial draft of the neutrality-law changes. The Senator estimated that 130 ships, with a total tonnage of 860,000 tons, would be forced out of foreign trade and another 16 vessels, aggregating 80,000 tons, could not operate as at present if the law is passed as it now stands. In addition, there would be tankers amounting to an as yet undetermined tonnage.

What this would mean, stripped of technicalities, is that one of the most important sections of the American merchant marine would be badly crippled. If, incidentally, the provision against calling at non-European ports of belligerents were to be strictly interpreted, American shipping in other parts of the world besides Europe would be seriously crippled. Taken altogether, the new restrictions would go far toward driving American shipping off the seas. Only the lines to and from Latin America would remain virtually unimpaired.

Persons who brush aside the argument in behalf of the merchant marine make two serious mistakes: They assume that ships now engaged in the European trade could, by a mere order of their owners, be transferred to other routes, and they completely overlook the fact that the United States is dependent on the outside world for much of its indispensable imports. Ships can only be rerouted when the prospects of business warrant it. In the meanwhile, if the ships of the belligerents and the leading European neutrals are interfered with as a result of blockades and submarine campaigns, there will be a shortage of tonnage in which to carry from war zones the imports that the United States needs.

Everyone sympathizes with the point of view which Secretary of State Hull expressed that it would be worth the sacrifice of a part of our shipping if this would surely keep us out of war. But it does not follow that such a sacrifice would in any sense serve as a guaranty against the United States being drawn into the war. At best, it would only diminish the likelihood of misunderstandings arising out of injury to American ships in belligerent waters. But there is nothing in history to show that even complete nonintercourse with belligerents can necessarily keep a nation out of war.

The least that can be hoped is that, if Congress is determined to sacrifice American shipping, it should, at least, so draw the restrictions that they only affect ships bound to or from actual war zones in Europe in which there is direct danger of mines and of torpedoes. It would be shortsighted in the extreme to include the territories of belligerents on this side of the ocean, or in the Far East, among those at which American ships might not call. Not only is the danger of anything happening to American vessels in or near any of these ports small, but the admission of the principle of abstention would, in this case, amount to placing in the hands of other nations the power to virtually close all the seas of the world against American shipping. It is one thing to keep out of belligerent waters in the war zones. It is something quite different to withdraw from long-established trade routes simply because a German submarine might be lurking nearby and might torpedo an American vessel, even though it was not engaged in commerce with belligerents. If this is to be the criterion of American policy, it would be more logical to place the entire merchant marine in drydock.

Pending Neutrality Legislation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. KEY PITTMAN

OF NEVADA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, October 12 (legislative day of Wednesday October 4), 1939

RADIO ADDRESS BY HON. WILLIAM H. KING, OF UTAH

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have published in the Appendix of the RECORD a very able address on the subject of the pending neutrality legislation, delivered last evening over the Mutual Broadcasting System by the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING].

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE EMBARGO PROVISIONS OF THE ACT OF 1937 SHOULD BE REPEALED

In the limited time at my disposal I will be unable to but briefly refer to a few points arising in connection with the so-called neutrality bill now before the Senate. This measure seeks the repeal of the so-called Neutrality Act of 1937. The embargo provision of the act was regarded as the most important, and most of the discussion now occurring in the Senate is devoted to the question of the embargo. May I be permitted to state that I cpposed the act of 1937, contending that it deprived the United States and its people of rights recognized by international law as well as rights which an independent nation was entitled to enjoy and to assert. There has been great opposition to this act; and demands have been made by many of our citizens, as well as those in important positions in the Government, that it be repealed.

The President of the United States, on September 21 of this year, in an address to the Congress, asked it to assemble in extraordinary session to consider the repeal of the embargo provisions of the Neutrality Act of 1937, and he stated that in his best judgment that act "alters the historic foreign policy of the United States and impairs the peaceful relations of the United States with foreign nations." The address of the President emphasizes the importance of such policies and measures as will protect the neutrality, safety, and integrity of the United States, and at the same time "keep us out of war." The President referred to the constant efforts of the United States, in the face of the building up of vast armies, navies, and storehouses of war in other countries, to encourage peaceful settlements and bring about the reduction of armaments, and avert threatened wars. Reference is made to the efforts of the executive branch of the Government to protect our Nation from being involved in war, and to aid in averting the present "appalling conflict." The President referred to the historic record of the United States, and to its efforts to promote peace. In a number of eloquent paragraphs the President referred to efforts of conquest—military and economic—by nations, and of the challenge to religion, democracy, and to international good faith. He further added: "An ordering of society which relegates religion, democracy, and good faith among nations to the background can find no place within it for the ideals of the Prince of Peace. The United States rejects such an ordering and retains its ancient faith."

The President further stated that he "foresaw some time ago the trends of foreign affairs and their probable effect upon the United States, and recommended to Congress in July of this year that changes be enacted in our neutrality law." He added that international law has had as its primary objective the avoidance of the causes of war and the prevention of the extension of war, and that deviation from the sound principles of neutrality and peace through international law brought about disastrous results. With respect to the act of 1937, which the present measure seeks to repeal, the President expressed regret that Congress passed such an act and also that he had signed it. The President stated that the "embargo provisions of the act of 1937 are inconsistent with ancient precepts of the law of nations and are vitally dangerous to American neutrality, American security, and American peace."

The President further states that he seeks a greater consistency through the repeal of the embargo provisions "and a return to international law"; that he seeks a "reenactment of the historic and traditional American policy which served our country for nearly a century and a half." We cannot ignore the solemn words of the President when he said that he gives it as his "unalterable conviction that by the repeal of the embargo the United States would more probably remain at peace than if the law remained as it stands today; and therefore that the repeal of the embargo and a return to international law are the crux of this issue." The President, in addition, in urging the repeal of the existing law, submitted recommendations for legislation needed to meet the situation.

The measure before us meets the recommendations of the President with respect to the repeal of the embargo provisions of the existing law, and it also contains other provisions relating to the broad subject of neutrality.

On the 14th of July last the President submitted to Congress "with his full approval" a statement from the Secretary of State, and asked that it be given "earnest consideration." The Secretary's statement referred to the confusion and misunderstanding regarding the operation of the arms-embargo provisions of the law of 1937, and in order to make clear the situation, pointed out that the first concern of the United States must be its own peace and security, and that the policy of the Government should be to avoid being drawn into wars between other nations. Furthermore, the statement continued, there should be no entangling alliances "and involvement with other nations, and in the event of war the United States should maintain a status of strict neutrality." The statement further declared that the executive branch of the Government, when the arms embargo was originally adopted, "called attention to the fact that its enactment constituted a hazardous departure from the principle of international law, which recognizes the rights of neutrals to trade with belligerents and of belligerents to trade with neutrals." It further declared that neutrality means impartiality, and "that an arms embargo is opposed to the idea of neutrality" because in enacting such a measure, or by refraining from such enactment, it would be humanly impossible "to hold the scales exactly between two belligerents." It further stated that those who support the recommendations for the elimination of the embargo play into the hands of nations which have taken the lead in building up their fighting power and work against the interests of peace-loving nations, particularly those not possessing their own munitions plants."

The Secretary's statement contains strong arguments in favor of the position taken by the President in the address referred to, and justifies the averment that the embargo encourages a general state of war both in Europe and in Asia, and therefore its results are prejudicial to the best interests of the peace and security of the United States.

The Secretary's later statement, which was approved by the President, supports the policy recommended by the President, and which is consistent with the rules of international law and with the course of our country over a period of 150 years.

As I have stated, the most important provision of the pending bill is the repeal of the embargo provision of the act of 1937. I repeat when I state that the message of the President and the statement submitted by the Secretary of State are powerful arguments in favor of such action.

Undoubtedly the American people are concerned over the disturbed conditions in various parts of the world and are desirous that every effort be made by our Government to prevent the United States from being involved in international conflicts. The situation in Europe, as well as in Asia, reveals the tragic effects of war, and the democratic peoples throughout the world are determined, so far as possible, to prevent the fires of international conflict from continuing their devastating course. The destruction of Czechoslovakia, the devastation of Poland, with the slaughter of thousands of innocent men, women, and children, have so aroused the democratic forces throughout the world that they demand the cessation of the horrors and brutalities which attend modern warfare. Only a short time ago Czechoslovakia was a progressive republic, supported by millions of patriotic citizens; Poland was rising out of the mists and ruins of centuries of oppression. Now both Poland and Czechoslovakia are destroyed and nazi-ism has marshalled its armies to secure further conquests. Soviet Russia has collaborated in these recent tragic events and is now bringing independent states—Latvia, Estonia, and Lithuania—under its control—economically and, indeed, politically. It now demands that the brave and courageous Finns obey Stalin's commands. Other democratic nations in Europe are frightened at the specter of nazi-ism and communism, and their present preoccupation is to preserve their independence. These frightful conditions in Europe and in Asia cannot but arouse in this peace-loving land a feeling of horror and indignation. But withal there is a determination that every honorable means shall be taken to preserve our country against the subversive and destructive forces beating against the pillars of society and the foundations of democracy, liberty, and justice. Any legislation enacted by Congress must have as its purpose the protection of the liberties of the American people and the preservation of this God-given Republic.

The American people desire peace. The spirit of democracy is the spirit of peace and justice and equality for all. While our country has been a party to international conflicts, it can truthfully be said that the American people have desired to follow the principles of peace and fellowship and good will. The founders of the Republic and the American people have been influenced by the teachings of the Christian religion, which has fashioned our political and social life along spiritual and religious lines.

As indicated, they have sought to promote the most friendly relations with the peoples of the world. They seek no conquest; they desire to live in peace and be an example, if possible, to influence other peoples to accept democratic principles and follow in the paths of justice and righteousness. Undoubtedly they look with growing concern at conflagrations raging in various parts of the world, and they are determined that the fires of international conflicts shall not be brought to the shores of America.

As I have indicated, however, even though democratic peoples love peace and abhore war, they cannot help but express concern when they see liberty-loving people attacked by dictators and powerful aggressors.

The records of the past are replete with the destruction of small and liberty-loving nations by strong and powerful military combinations. But, as I have indicated, the American people are sympathetic with the oppressed and persecuted, but they sincerely desire that no situation shall arise which will result in this Nation becoming a participant in the conflagration now raging in various parts of the world, and for that reason the repeal of the 1937 act is sought.

It is believed by the proponents of the embargo provisions of the pending measure that it will tend to immunize this Nation against war. So solicitous are many who are supporting this bill to prevent war that they are willing to abandon at least for the present neutrality rights which are recognized by civilized nations.

The repeal will be in harmony with and will strengthen international law. That code protects the rights of neutrals, both upon land and sea. It recognizes the importance of trade and commerce, and throws the mantle of its protection around ships carrying the fruits of man's toils and labors. International law does not speak for isolation, nor does it require nations to erect barriers around their borders, or prevent international intercourse among people of the world.

The bill before us is an abridgment of some rights of our Government and of American citizens. But as I have indicated, many Americans are willing to yield some rights, if in so doing our country may not be drawn into war. I share that view and therefore give my support to the repeal of the embargo provisions of this bill. There are some persons who favor a renunciation of all rights provided by international law, and the adoption of a "scuttling" policy which seeks isolation by complete surrender of the rights which belong to civilized peoples and independent governments. I have contended that the rights of neutrals as well as belligerents, should rest upon the foundations of international law in times of peace as well as in war, and it should be made in the spirit of international law in relation to neutrals as well as belligerents.

The abandonment of conceded rights by a neutral may not prove advantageous to the nations willing to surrender such rights, and a unitary declaration of policy by such neutral may give a belligerent an opportunity to formulate policies aimed directly at the surrendering nation. Experience and history reveal the fact that nations which surrender rights under the law of nations, and also rights under treaties, have not been free from attack.

In my opinion, the United States, with its prestige and power, whenever and wherever opportunity affords, should take the lead in urging the maintenance of the sanctity of international law. Indeed, each nation should be concerned in the protection of neutral rights. Our Nation from the beginning stood for neutral rights; freedom of the seas; the right to carry on trade and commerce in wartime as well as in peacetimes.

Conditions may arise in which we will be willing to forego the assertion of conceded neutral and national rights, hoping thereby to prevent the spread of the fires of conflicts among nations; but if the United States announces in advance that it will claim no neutral rights, and will bar its citizens from traveling, its ships from sailing the seas, its agriculturists and manufacturers from disposing of their commodities, there is no certainly that all dangers would be averted or that domestic peace would be assured. There would still be the danger of involvement resulting from the conduct of belligerents or possibly by reason of opposition upon the part of nationals. There is no assurance that a renunciation of all rights accorded to neutrals would prevent our Government or any nation from being drawn into an international conflict.

Neutral nations have been assailed when they scrupulously adhered to the principles of international law, and they have been invaded when they did not assert the rights of neutrals or of their nationals. As indicated, waiving of the neutral rights of nationals, does not insure freedom from foreign assaults. When we are asked to renounce the rights of neutrals and the rights of our nationals, we must consider what the results would be—the benefits to be obtained and the evils which would follow.

As stated, the abdication of one right usually leads to the demand for further concessions, culminating in the ultimate destruction of the whole fabric of international law—the policies and principles of right and justice which exists among civilized nations.

It has been the policy of our Government to strengthen international law and not to whittle it away or to undermine it. The act of 1937, for which the pending measure is a substitute, cannot, in my opinion, be called a neutrality act. Certainly it was not a measure that tended to avert war or to promote or strengthen international relations. It did not make for neutrality because it sought to deprive Americans of freedom of action in the event of foreign wars and, as I have indicated, it notified in advance that our government would not differentiate between autocratic nations who violated international law and the victim of such violation. It certainly tended to undermine the Kellogg-Briand Pact and interfered with trade agreements which our Government had promoted. Undoubtedly it stimulated the world race in armament and greatly increased expenditures by nations great and small for armaments and preparations for war.

The embargo is not a neutral measure. It repeals in part the international law of neutrality. It is not the duty of neutrals to keep in even balance between both belligerents. If equal opportunity is afforded to belligerents the exactions of neutrals are met.

The important question before us is to determine what we are willing to sacrifice in the hope of escaping being drawn into the conflict. The United States, in considering its present interests, may conclude that the surrendering of rights, though precious and important, may avoid its involvement in international conflicts.

Obviously, a neutral nation is at liberty to waive a right, even though it may eventuate in some undesirable results. Under international law there is no question but that the United States has the right to carry on trade and commerce with belligerents as well as neutral nations, and an important question is whether the benefits to be derived by the American people from such waiver of conceded and recognized rights justify such renunciation.

If time permitted I could cite scores of authorities supporting the proposition that it is not unneutral for the United States to repeal the present Neutrality Act or to sell munitions of war and supplies to France and Great Britain or to other nations.

Unanimity of opinion does not always attend legislation, particularly where important issues are involved. The act of 1937 met with opposition, and it is now admitted that such opposition was warranted. And the measure now before us, though strongly supported by the President, and, I believe, by a majority of the American people, encounters opposition by sincere and patriotic Americans.

I am not in agreement with all of its provisions, particularly the one which may seriously affect our legitimate trade and commerce in the Pacific area. But, as indicated by the President, the repeal of the embargo is so necessary and vital that the pending measure will receive support from some who do not approve of all its provisions.

All Americans pray that peace may soon come to this disordered world, and I am sure it is the desire of all Senators to aid in that objective.

It may be said that there are other things more important than money or property or even life itself. I refer to honor and liberty, the triumph of justice, and the perpetuity of democracy. The American people joined in the World War because they believed that the cause in which they enlisted sought to preserve civilization and establish justice and liberty and righteousness and to advance moral and spiritual principles which must persist if a reversion to barbarism is to be averted.

It is to be hoped that they may not again be called upon to make such sacrifices.

Pending Neutrality Legislation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOSIAH W. BAILEY

OF NORTH CAROLINA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, October 12 (legislative day of Wednesday October 4), 1939

REPORTS OF CIVIL AERONAUTICS AUTHORITY AND MARITIME COMMISSION

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, I have a report of the Civil Aeronautics Authority on the effect of the proposed neutrality legislation, as well as a report of the Maritime Commission on the same subject. I desire to file these reports and ask that they be printed in the Appendix.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The reports are as follows:

MEMORANDUM FROM CIVIL AERONAUTICS AUTHORITY—EFFECT OF PROPOSED NEUTRALITY LEGISLATION ON INTERNATIONAL TRANSPORT OPERATIONS OF AMERICAN AIR CARRIERS

In enacting the Civil Aeronautics Act of 1938, Congress declared in section 2 that in the exercise and performance of its powers and duties under this act, the Authority should consider as being in the public interest and in accordance with the public convenience and necessity, the encouragement and development of an air transportation system properly adapted to the present and future needs of the foreign and domestic commerce of the United States, of the Postal Service, and of the national defense, and the encouragement and development of civil aeronautics. On September 29, 1939, House Joint Resolution 306 was reported from the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations. It is difficult to foresee the effect of such legislation on the international operations of American air carriers during a period when a state of war has been proclaimed by the President to exist between two countries.

The proposed legislation, by reason of the inclusion of the word "aircraft" in the definition of "vessel," found in section 15, is applicable to air transportation as well as to surface transportation. At the outset it should be pointed out that aircraft are limited in their operation by reason of their cruising range and available landing areas. Furthermore, except as provision is made by convention, treaty, or other international arrangement, aircraft of one country are not permitted to utilize the air space over or to land on the territory of a second country. Where such rights are accorded, they are generally given on a reciprocal basis. It is equally important to point out that if the landing rights are granted, the country so granting them expects to derive certain benefits by way of the carriage of its nationals and its mail.

From a technical standpoint, it is possible for present-day aircraft successfully to make the flight nonstop from the United States to Europe. However, to do so requires the transportation of such large fuel loads as practically to eliminate any pay load, thereby making the operation economically unsound. In the conduct of both the trans-Atlantic service and the South American services the American international air carrier makes regular stops at possessions of one or more of the present belligerents. Without such stops, the carrier would find it almost impossible to continue its operations.

The committee's draft of section 2 (g) provides certain exceptions with regard to transportation in the Western Hemisphere south of 30° north latitude. In other words, the American international air carrier is exempted from the provisions of 2 (a) and 2 (c) to the extent that it may be permitted, subject to such restrictions, rules, and regulations as the President may prescribe, to transport to any place in the Western Hemisphere south of 30° north latitude mail, passengers, personal effects of passengers and crew, and any articles or materials which are to be used exclusively by such aircraft. The carrier, however, is not permitted to transport air express or freight.

The legislation as presently drafted has a much more pronounced effect upon the existing trans-Atlantic service. The carrier operates over one of two routes, the northern or the southern. The northern route makes stops at Shediac, New Brunswick, and Botwood, Newfoundland, thence to Foynes, Ireland, and Southampton, England. The southern route follows a course by way of the Island of Bermuda to Horta, the Azores; Lisbon, Portugal, and thence to Marseilles, France. By reason of the European conflagration, the service on the northern and the southern routes has been terminated at Foynes, Ireland, and Lisbon, Portugal, respectively. Shediac, New Brunswick; Botwood, Newfoundland; and the Island of Bermuda are all British possessions. The language of section 2 (g) (1) and (2) as presently drawn is not broad enough to permit stops at these British ports under such restrictions, rules, and regulations as may be prescribed by the President, for only points in the Western Hemisphere south of 30° north latitude come within the exemption. Since all of these points are north of this geographical line, service conducted over the northern route must proceed nonstop from a point in the United States to Foynes, Ireland, and over the southern route from a point in the United States to Horta, the Azores. The effect of the legislation, therefore, would be practically to prohibit flight over the northern route and greatly to restrict operations over the southern route.

The distance between New York and the Azores is approximately 2,365 miles. For a time the carrier conducted nonstop operations over this sector of the trans-Atlantic route. From the outset it was admitted that by stopping at Bermuda a larger pay load might be carried. With the outbreak of hostilities and the resultant reduction of schedules operated by European merchantmen, there was a greatly augmented demand for passenger space on the trans-Atlantic air service. It was determined advisable, therefore, to authorize the carrier to make regular stops at Bermuda, for by doing so the carrier is able to increase its trans-Atlantic pay load and revenues by almost 50 percent. The shorter flight from the Azores to Bermuda does not require the fuel load that is necessitated for the longer flight from the Azores to New York. The gross load of the aircraft is limited; if the aircraft is heavily loaded with fuel, there is a corresponding decrease in the amount of weight which may be devoted to the transportation of revenue-producing traffic.

One other important consideration enters into the operations over the southern route. Not infrequently weather conditions between Horta, the Azores, and the United States are such that a stop must be made at Bermuda for refueling purposes. If the stop at that point is prohibited, the schedule must be held over at the Azores until weather conditions change, or the carrier, in order to complete the flight, must engage in a hazardous enterprise.

The air transportation service between the United States and Europe is particularly valuable during periods of emergency, for it offers a safe, expeditious, and reliable medium for the transportation of confidential communications between this country and Europe.

It is suggested that if the trans-Atlantic air transportation service is to continue, that an exception should be made in the proposed legislation exempting aircraft from the provisions of section 2 (a) and (c), permitting them to stop at the three points heretofore named, and to transport mail, passengers, personal effects of individuals on the aircraft, air express, and necessary supplies for the operation of the aircraft between New York or Baltimore and Bermuda or Newfoundland.

A third effect of the proposed neutrality legislation is to be found in the language of section 2 (g) (3). While the language permits American aircraft to transport mail, passengers, personal effects of passengers and crew, and necessary supplies for such aircraft from the United States to any port on the Pacific Ocean or the China Sea, it does not permit the transportation of air express or freight from the United States to these ports. It is not believed that there is any substantial reason for placing such restrictions upon air transportation services on the Pacific.

A further effect of the language of section 2 (g) is to be found in the words "from any port in the United States," in line 12 of said section. This language has a result which it is believed was not in the minds of the committee. As the bill now stands, an American air carrier could carry a passenger from Miami to Jamaica and could also carry a passenger from Jamaica to Colombia, but since the exemption is only for transportation from ports in the United States, the aircraft could not carry a passenger from Colombia to Jamaica. Since much of the traffic carried on American international routes in the Western Hemisphere is between and from points in the Caribbean from and to points in South America, it is submitted that there would be a real effect upon the revenues of the carrier.

To cure the effects which have heretofore been pointed out, it is suggested that the language of 2 (g), insofar as it applies to the operation of aircraft, should be amended to permit the transportation of air express and freight. Furthermore, it is suggested that the language of the present clause 3 of section 2 (g) might be amended to read as follows: "or (3) to transportation by aircraft to any point on the Pacific Ocean or the China Sea or in the Western Hemisphere of mail, passengers, personal effects of individuals on such aircraft, air express, and necessary supplies for such aircraft."

American international air carriers therefore would be able to continue operations on their present scale, except as they might be controlled by restrictions, rules, and regulations prescribed by the President.

The discussions thus far have assumed that service to England and France would not be conducted so long as a state of war exists. Obviously, when a country is at war, there is an effect upon air transportation. Furthermore, the combat areas which may be designated might be of such a nature as to prohibit the use by the air carrier of the terminal points Foynes, Ireland, or Lisbon, Portugal. If such be the case, the trans-Atlantic service, of necessity, would cease. Such, however, are contingencies which cannot be foreseen, nor can their effect be appraised.

The Neutrality Bill (H. J. Res. 306) and Its Effect on the Merchant Marine and Associated Industries, and on the Domestic Economy

[As revised]

The policy of the United States with respect to its merchant marine has been a positive one since 1916. It is designed to furnish shipping services adequate for maintaining the flow of American water-borne foreign commerce and capable of serving as a naval and military auxiliary in time of a national emergency. It provides, further, that the American merchant marine should be owned and operated under our flag, by our citizens. The Government has encouraged private investment in shipping. It has subsidized it so that American labor, industry, and commercial interests would benefit from its uninterrupted services in world markets. American citizens are trained to be its officers and seamen.

House Joint Resolution 306, as reported in the Senate, if enacted into law, would prescribe, in lieu of the existing Neutrality Act of 1935, as amended in 1936 and 1937, regulations which would sharply restrict American foreign trade and shipping during any war in which the United States is neutral. The prohibitions and restrictions imposed, however, upon our merchant marine by the pending legislation, if enacted, would seriously endanger the progress the Nation has already made in this direction.

It is the purpose of the Government to maintain our Nation at peace. This is a worthy objective, but the means employed should be carefully considered.

It is not believed necessary to arrest the progress we have made in creating a strong merchant marine by legislation as far-reaching as that proposed by House Joint Resolution 306 in order to preserve our neutrality. Neither is it necessary to disrupt our national economy and disturb labor conditions to the extent proposed.

The effect of the proposed law will be briefly examined in this survey as it relates to:

A. The American merchant ships;
B. The shipping and associated industries; and
C. The movement of commodities and the national economy.

Part A.—Effect of the Proposed Law on the American Merchant Ships

United States documented vessels of ocean-going size engaged in the transportation of passengers and dry cargo in our foreign trade (excluding the Great Lakes) number 326 of 2,150,000 gross tons. Forty-four of these vessels of 308,000 tons are owned by the Government, the remaining 182 of 1,842,000 gross tons by private American operators.

Of this foreign-trade fleet of 326 vessels of 2,150,000 tons, less than half, or 150 vessels of a million tons, are operating under subsidy contracts.

As of October 2, 1939, 29 of the 326 vessels under discussion were temporarily inactive (performing repairs, awaiting schedule in particular trades, or for similar reasons). Two hundred and ninety-seven vessels of 1,923,500 tons were actively engaged in serving the foreign ocean-borne commerce of the United States.

The figures stated do not include the American tanker fleet engaged in carrying liquid cargoes. A total of 365 such ships of 2,678,000 tons are documented under the laws of the United States. Such vessels often are shifted between foreign and domestic runs, and the operation of particular tankers is not generally associated with a particular trade route, as is the case with passenger and dry-cargo vessels.

It is impossible to foresee or appraise the precise effects of the proposed legislation upon the American merchant marine. For example, the legislation will undoubtedly affect the American tanker operations, but the ramifications of the tanker problem are so great that no definite prediction can be made at present as to how many of the 365 tankers will be affected, nor to what extent.

With respect to the passenger and dry cargo vessels, the effects of the proposed legislation can be predicted. Predicated upon "combat areas" which might be prescribed in view of present conditions, upon the assumption that the list of "belligerents" is not enlarged, and enactment of the bill in substantially its present form, some fairly definite results can be stated.

Approximately 130 American dry cargo, combination, or passenger ships of about 860,000 gross tons would be withdrawn from service. The lines upon which the great majority of these ships operate would be abandoned.

In addition to the 130 ships in foreign trade, 16 American ships of approximately 80,000 gross tons (dry cargo and tank vessels usually considered a part of our coastwise fleet but principally engaged in trade between Atlantic, Gulf, and Pacific ports of the United States and Canadian ports) could no longer operate as at present.

Estimates indicate that between 165 and 170 American dry cargo, combination, or passenger ships of about 1,100,000 gross tons could continue to operate in foreign trade, much as at present, although more than half of these (in number and tonnage) would be adversely affected, some seriously. The uncertainty as to the future of some of these operations, however, is illustrated by the fact that if it became necessary to enter a "combat area" to serve Mediterranean ports, 20 vessels of 108,000 gross tons immediately would be withdrawn, and 7 other vessels of 74,000 gross tons would have to be rerouted so drastically it is possible their continued operation might no longer be practicable.

On the basis of 130 dry cargo, combination, or passenger ships which would doubtless be withdrawn under the proposed legislation, it is apparent that more than 47 percent by number and 44 percent by tonnage of the American-flag active foreign trade fleet could no longer operate on present trade routes.

The trade routes affected and the approximate number of ships which would be withdrawn from them are as follows:

Route	Number of ships	Gross tonnage
United States North Atlantic-continental Europe	31	233,316
United States North Atlantic-United Kingdom and Ireland	4	21,148
United States North Atlantic-Mediterranean and Black Sea	4	37,438
United States North Atlantic-Australasia	4	24,171
United States North Atlantic-India	4	22,918
United States North Atlantic-Atlantic Canada	4	22,456
United States North Atlantic-Red Sea-Persian Gulf-India	7	42,146
United States North Atlantic-Baltic-Scandinavian area	6	32,824
United States North Atlantic and Gulf-South and East Africa	10	66,922
United States North Atlantic and Gulf-West Africa	6	32,449
South Atlantic United States-continental Europe	6	30,212
Atlantic United States-certain Caribbean ports	1	6,336
United States Gulf-United Kingdom and Ireland	13	80,409
United States Gulf-continental Europe	23	141,572
United States Pacific coast-Australasia	2	36,034
United States Pacific coast-United Kingdom and Continent	5	30,039
	130	860,390

An examination of the prospects for rerouting American vessels affected by the proposed prohibitions shows very little prospect of profitable employment for such vessels in services from the United States to nonbelligerent countries and possessions. Very few foreign vessels have been withdrawn from the South American trade. The South American trade volume may increase, but steady employment for more than 100 additional American ships, or even a considerable portion of them, cannot be visualized. Similarly, trans-Pacific trade with the Orient has declined within the last year, and there appears no room for any number of additional vessels in that trade.

During the past 2 years the Maritime Commission has ordered for itself or in conjunction with private operators 137 new vessels of more than a million tons. Twenty-two of these already have been launched, and those upon which trials have been held have proved to be the most efficient of their types in the world. The Government and the shipowners are investing about $300,000,000 in these 137 new vessels.

The benefits of this program extended to American labor and American producers of materials in every State of the Union.

The ships already ordered constitute only part performance of an orderly long-range replacement program involving a total of 500 new ships to be constructed over a period of 10 years at a total cost of $1,250,000,000.

Should the principle of House Joint Resolution 306 become the established policy of the United States, many if not all of the new ships ordered or planned would face a very doubtful future and represent extremely poor risk from the investment standpoint.

PART B.—EFFECT OF THE PROPOSED LAW ON THE SHIPPING AND ASSOCIATED INDUSTRIES

The withdrawal of the 130 American flag vessels which would be affected by enactment of the proposed neutrality legislation from the services in which they are now engaged without placing them profitably in other trades would result in losses to maritime labor, shipyards, suppliers of materials, insurance companies, and ship operators, and also in losses to the Government. Suitable reallocation of the ships is unlikely. The following analysis points out these losses.

Loss of business and unemployment (other than administrative personnel)

A conception of the loss of business and the resultant effect if the services under consideration were discontinued and the ships laid up, may be gained by considering the figures for the calendar year 1938. Gross revenues received by the steamship lines which would be affected, from freight, passengers and mail, amounted to approximately $73,000,000. This revenue was disbursed in part for wages, materials, supplies or services performed in the United States, as follows:

Wages	$10,500,000
Food, stores, supplies, and maintenance, purchased in the United States	6,200,000
Repairs performed in the United States	5,800,000
Insurance premiums	3,500,000
Fuel	8,500,000
Other vessel expense	1,000,000
Total vessel expense, including wages	35,500,000

In addition to the amounts shown above, amounts well in excess of $1,000,000 each were spent for use of terminals, the services of domestic agents, brokerage, employment of tugboats with their crews, pilots and many other services necessary for the operation of steamships. One of the largest items of expense was for the employment of stevedores. Because our records do not contain a break-down of the respective amounts spent in the United States and foreign countries, we can only give a rough estimate of the cost of such services, in the United States, viz, between $9,000,000 and $10,000,000.

Because of the large number of persons which would be affected by a disruption or curtailment of steamship services and because of the intermittent employment of some of them it is difficult to give actual data. It is estimated that between 8,500 and 9,000 seamen are now employed on vessels engaged in services which would have to be abandoned or curtailed. While a few of these men would be retained to preserve the vessels in lay-up, the vast majority would have to be released to seek other employment. Correspondingly, stevedores, repair yard workers, ship chandlers, and many others would be forced out of employment.

This loss or curtailment of employment as regards stevedoring and fuel cost presupposes that neutral or other foreign-flag lines would not be in a position to handle all of the commerce which would be relinquished by the withdrawal of American-flag vessels. The other items mentioned would not be expended in the United States to anything approaching the figures stated, even if foreign-flag vessels are available. The crews of foreign vessels are hired abroad; and repair, insurance, and other expenditures are made abroad whenever practicable.

Trained seagoing personnel for commerce and national defense

The merchant marine training program which has been inaugurated would be adversely affected. It is not likely that young men would wish to continue to train for a career at sea on American vessels in the face of the uncertainties which would attend the operation of such vessels if the proposed law becomes our national policy.

Governmental investment in trade routes

The United States has invested large sums in the development of trade routes from which it would be necessary to withdraw our ships if House Joint Resolution 306 were enacted. Regardless of whether the ships could be allocated to other routes, the Government's investment in the abandoned routes would be lost.

The enormous losses and expenditures occasioned by our lack of ships during the World War period convinced the people of the United States that an American merchant marine is a necessity. At the end of the World War period a great number of ships were constructed or under construction for the Government; and it was decided to operate these ships for Government account in the development of trade routes found essential to the flow of our foreign commerce until such time as the lines serving such routes could be sold to private operators, the Government absorbing the losses during that period. After the sale of many of the lines governmental aid in their operation was found necessary. This aid was first rendered in the form of ocean-mail contracts and more recently as differential subsidies.

Except insofar as the governmental expenditures for trade-route development may be considered written off as a premium to insure the availability of ships for the national defense, the sums expended may properly be considered an investment by the United States in the development of good will and in the absorption of pioneering and development expenses.

The amount of such governmental expenditure in the development of the routes it is not now proposed to abandon by reason of legislation which, if enacted, would necessitate the withdrawal of our ships is stated in the following table for the period from 1923 to September 30, 1939. This table includes operating losses sustained by the Government, ocean-mail payments, and operating-differential subsidy. Governmental ship operating losses prior to 1923 cannot readily be segregated by routes and services.

Governmental expenditure

Route:
U. S. North Atlantic–continental Europe	$65,426,000
U. S. North Atlantic–United Kingdom and Ireland	13,697,000
U. S. North Atlantic–Mediterranean and Black Seas	[1] 18,166,000
U. S. North Atlantic–Australasia	5,304,000
U. S. North Atlantic–India	6,302,000
U. S. North Atlantic–Atlantic Canada	4,616,000
U. S. North Atlantic–Red Sea-Persian Gulf-India	----------
U. S. North Atlantic–Baltic-Scandinavian area	8,810,000
U. S. North Atlantic and Gulf–South and East Africa	4,778,000
U. S. North Atlantic and Gulf–West Africa	5,709,000
U. S. South Atlantic–continental Europe	6,866,000
U. S. Atlantic–certain Caribbean ports	----------
U. S. Gulf–United Kingdom and Ireland	82,096,000
U. S. Gulf–continental Europe
U. S. Pacific coast–Australasia	8,801,000
U. S. Pacific coast–United Kingdom and Continent	----------
Total	230,571,000

[1] It is estimated that about two-thirds of the American-flag tonnage on this route could continue to operate for the present, but one-third would be immediately withdrawn.

Goodwill

As previously stated, the gross revenues derived from the operations of steamships which would be forced to lay up if House Joint Resolution 306 were enacted amounted to $73,000,000 in 1938.

The shipping business, being highly competitive, cannot be dropped and reentered at will. Shipping goodwill is an asset which is built up gradually. A period of pioneering must be gone through to secure business; good agency relations must be reestablished and solicitation must proceed along definite channels. Should the vessels be laid up for even a year it would be many years before they could regain their present position in the trades.

The business which has been obtained by these American-flag lines is the result of years of effort on the part of the American owners striving to obtain a portion of the water-borne export and import foreign commerce of the United States. Business which is presently being obtained has for the most part been wrested away from foreign competitors in spite of the handicaps of older vessels and higher costs than those of competitors. The odds against American-flag shipping have within the past few years been progressively decreased through the introduction of faster and more modern vessels; and Government aid, in the case of the subsidized lines, has tended to reduce the cost differential against us. Current shipbuilding activities within the United States promise still greater reduction of these odds.

The goodwill of shippers has been obtained not so much through patriotism, but through dependency, frequency, and regularity of service. The curtailment or abandonment of a steamship line will of necessity force the shipper to seek service elsewhere, and he will continue to patronize, even in normal times, a line which has best served him and protected his interests in emergencies. We are witnessing more and more a trend of American shippers to support American-flag vessels.

Although it is impossible to determine what would be the financial condition of American steamship companies affected by the proposed neutrality legislation at the end of the effective period of the law, it is likely that they would not be in position to reestablish operations on any trade route.

Organization

The steamship companies which would be affected if the operations of their lines were suspended by reason of House Joint Resolution 306, if enacted, have been built up over a number of years and comprise trained and expert employees. These companies also have well-established foreign agencies employing many American cititzens who have necessarily established permanent residences abroad. During the year 1938 the salaries of officers and employees allocated to the particular services which would be affected amounted to approximately $4,800,000. This figure does not, of course, include general office and other administrative expense, such as rent, light, heat and power, stationery, office supplies, etc. The figure does not include salaries of officers and employees of the various domestic-agency companies whose livelihood is dependent upon the steamship lines which would suspend operations.

The abandonment or serious curtailment of these steamship lines would result in almost complete disorganization of these operating companies and agencies; employees would have to be reduced to the barest minimum if the vessels were placed in lay-up; offices would be closed, and personnel be scattered to find or attempt to find other employment. This disorganization would be one of the most serious features involved in a restriction of these steamship services; and if normal service was resumed at some future time, these companies would have serious difficulty in again collecting efficient staffs.

Lay-up expense

The cost involved in the withdrawal of ships from operation, their preparation for a long period of lay-up, and their maintenance and preservation while in lay-up is almost impossible to forecast without a thorough and detailed study, which would take into consideration such factors as the policy of the owners, availability and location of points of lay-up, and methods employed in preservation. The preparation of a vessel for a long period of lay-up necessitates the opening up of machinery—coating machinery, deck and cargo gear, and other movable parts with proper lubrication; the removal to shore and storage of navigating gear, instruments, bedding, and other equipment which would be subjected to damage from moisture, etc. In the case of passenger vessels, depending on the location and the period of lay-up, it might be necessary or advisable to remove cabin, saloon, public hall, and other furnishings for protection against loss by theft or damage from moths, moisture, etc. When the vessels were again to be placed in operation it would be necessary to go through the reverse of this process. We are unable to give an estimate of the cost which would be involved in the process of preparing for lay-up and coming out of lay-up, but they would be very substantial.

The cost of maintaining the 130 vessels under consideration while in lay-up would be variable, depending upon the company's policy and methods employed. A reasonably low estimate of the cost would be in the neighborhood of $6,000,000 per annum.

Depreciation

The annual depreciation charges on the vessels involved amounts to substantially in excess of $5,000,000. If House Joint Resolution 306 were enacted, there would be no revenue accruing to the affected companies against which this amount could be charged, and the enforced idleness of the ships for a year or several years would not prolong their lives for a corresponding period because of the elements of obsolescence, and the more rapid deterioration of vessels while in lay-up than while in operation. The amount quoted does not include any estimate of depreciation on the vessels owned by the United States, since no depreciation is charged against them under Governmental accounting practice.

Amortization Payments and Interest on Mortgages

Additional charges which must be met by the owners in cash each year are the interest payments on mortgage indebtedness on the vessels as well as amortization of such mortgages. No earnings would be available from the operation of the ships out of which to meet these payments if the proposed legislation were enacted. It is estimated that amortization and interest on vessel mortgages would approximate $3,400,000 annually, of which approximately $2,600,000 represents payments on obligations held by the United States Government. It seems needless to point out that unless a moratorium is granted for the payment of this indebtedness that the steamship companies, without any income, would deplete all of their reserves, and undoubtedly many would be thrown into bankruptcy.

Reallocation

As previously stated with regard to the 130 vessels, which would be withdrawn from their trades as a result of enactment of the proposed legislation, prospects for their reallocation are not encouraging.

The problem is here considered, not from the standpoint of the effect on the owners of the vessels themselves, but with respect to the effect on the other elements of the merchant marine if the 130 vessels were allocated to other trades. The trades in which the vessels would be permitted to engage have, in normal times, had adequate tonnage, and thus far there has been no serious shortage of ships because of the withdrawal of foreign flag vessels. In the protected trades of the United States there is normally more than sufficient tonnage, and the same may be said with regard to the South American trade. The withdrawal of American flag vessels from trades serving belligerent ports would prompt the owners to seek employment for their vessels either in the protected trades of the United States or the South American trade, and inasmuch as the Commission would have little control over the operation of non-subsidized lines, the introduction of these vessels in other trades would be detrimental to the line now engaged in that trade, and would probably yield very little profit to the line which was added.

Shipyards and Shipbuilding

As previously stated, 129 ships are now ordered or under construction in the United States as a part of the Government's 10-year ship construction program which calls for 500 new vessels.

The necessity for this program is illustrated by the fact that of the 326 dry cargo, combination, and passenger ships comprising the foreign trade fleet, 287 vessels, of 1,740,000 gross tons (or 81 percent), will be 20 years old by 1942.

While the Commission does not contemplate cancelation of any orders already placed for new ships, the uncertain future of our shipping under the proposed legislation might interfere with the long-range program for the building up of a strong merchant marine, inasmuch as we are presented with a possibility of legislation which will doubtless seriously affect the carriage of foreign commerce in American-flag ships throughout the world.

The probable effect upon shipyard labor of any dislocations in our shipbuilding program is realized when it is recalled that the industry requires a large staff of technical employees skilled in the art and science of shipbuilding, as well as many semiskilled and unskilled workmen. Labor in industries such as the iron and steel, and other industries which supply materials which go into a ship, will likewise be affected. The cost of a ship is about equally divided into two parts—one half being the cost of construction and assembly within the shipyard and the other half representing the cost of materials and equipment purchased from allied industries. Considering shipyard labor and labor in allied industries, it has been estimated that about 85 percent of the cost of building a ship is labor.

The importance of shipbuilding in the national economy is indicated by the fact that materials and equipment used in shipbuilding involve directly or indirectly practically every known industry and are supplied in varying quantities from every State in the country.

Ship repairing is quite as essential to the maintenance of a merchant marine as the building of the ships. During the lifetime of a ship an average expenditure equal to at least three-fourths of its original cost is required for upkeep, surveys, modernization, and repair. Hence, not only would the taking out of service of 130 of our merchant vessels result in throwing out of employment many shipyard workers which normally would be given employment in connection with repair work, but if the long-range construction program were seriously influenced by the proposed legislation, the loss to our shipyards and repair yards will be felt for many years after the actual period of construction now contemplated.

PART C—EFFECT OF AMERICAN FOREIGN TRADE AND NATIONAL ECONOMY

The disruption of certain of our shipping services as a result of the enactment of the pending neutrality bill would unquestionably have a marked effect upon our national economy. The industries of the United States are dependent to a marked degree upon a number of strategic and critical commodities, many of which are not produced in this country and must be imported from abroad. Any factor which would tend to curtail the importation of these commodities or bring about substantial increases in ocean-freight rates would affect the price American industry would have to pay for its raw materials, and in turn, the price paid for the finished product by the ultimate consumer.

The following analysis of the more essential strategic commodities indicates the extent to which the United States is dependent upon foreign sources of supply as well as their importance in our national economy.

The most important strategic commodities in relation to key industries in the United States and from the standpoint of the shipping problems involved in the event a neutrality law similar to the bill now under consideration is enacted are the following: Tin, rubber, manganese, chromium.

Tin

In 1938 this country imported 52,166 long tons of tin ore which came principally from British Malaya. Approximately one-third of our consumption is used in the manufacture of tin plate. The remainder is used for the various alloys such as solder, babbitt, tin foil, etc. Tin is also used in the production of brasses and bronze, as well as in the production of tin salts, of which the latter product is important in the ceramic and textile industries. At the present time the United States is able to produce approximately one-third of its requirements from scrap tin plate and alloys.

In 1938 the steel industry produced 1,430,000 gross tons of tin plate, of which 79.5 percent went to the container industry. Considering the tin-can and other tinware industries, 1937 figures show that the wages paid the 33,145 wage earners amounted to $37,000,000, and that the value of the products was $359,000,000. In 1937 the canning and perserving industries handling fruits, vegetables, fish, and other sea foods, employed 155,000 wage earners to produce products valued at $867,000,000 paying them $101,000,000 in wages.

In 1938 American vessels transported 33 percent of our tin imports; the vessels of present belligerent countries, 34 percent; other foreign-flag vessels, 33 percent. In 1938, 89 percent of the tin imported into this country came from present belligerent countries.

Freedom of ocean transport is a vital factor in our supply and under present conditions it is believed that the requirements of American industry for tin plate will increase to a considerable extent.

It was estimated that at the end of August 1939 there was on hand in the United States 8,967 long tons of tin, which was sufficient under normal consumption for only 1½ months. (See appendix No. 1.)

Rubber

In 1938, 427,200 long tons of rubber were imported into the United States, of which the principal sources were British Malaya and Netherlands Indies. In this same year 70 percent of our rubber came from countries that are now belligerents; 52 percent was transported in vessels of present belligerent countries; 19 percent in American-flag vessels; and 29 percent in neutral foreign-flag vessels.

The manufacturers of rubber goods must depend entirely upon imports. Approximately 80 percent of the rubber consumed in our rubber manufacturing industry, which is the largest in the world, is used in the manufacture of tires and inner tubes. The remainder is utilized in the manufacture of boots and shoes, rubber hose, druggists supplies, and other miscellaneous products. On a value basis, crude rubber is the most important single commodity imported into the United States. About one-half of the total imports of this commodity have been carried in recent years by British vessels, and about one-fifth by American vessels. The total domestic stocks of crude rubber on hand, including those in transit is estimated at 160,000 tons, a supply sufficient to last from 2 to 3 months.

In 1937 the rubber products industries consumed 531,000 gross tons of crude rubber in the manufacture of products valued at $883,000,000; the wages paid the 130,000 wage earners amounted to $171,000,000. In 1937, the motor vehicle industry, which is dependent on the rubber industry, produced products valued at $3,096,000,000, and paid 195,000 wage earners $316,000,000. In that same year the motor vehicle parts and bodies industries produced products valued at $2,080,000,000, and paid its 285,000 wage earners $440,000,000. (See appendix No. 2.)

Manganese

During 1938 the United States imported 170,000 long tons of manganese ore, which came largely from Russia and the British Gold Coast. Thirty-four percent of this commodity was shipped from present belligerent countries. Thirteen percent was carried in vessels of European nations now at war, 14 percent in American-flag vessels, and 73 percent in neutral foreign-flag vessels.

This commodity is essential in the production of steel, and is one of the most important strategic materials in which this country is deficient. It is estimated that from 14 to 18 pounds of manganese is used in the production of each ton of steel. The United States produces normally about 3 percent of its requirements for the steel industry, and about 65 percent for the manufacture of dry cell batteries. Of the total amount of manganese used, however, imports supply over 75 percent of our industrial requirements. At the end of 1938 there were 840,000 tons of imported manganese ore in Government warehouses. It is estimated that this supply would be sufficient to last only about a year at the normal rate of steel production.

In 1937 the steel works and rolling-mill products industries in which manganese is used as an essential material employed 479,000 wage earners, who were paid $780,000,000 in wages. The value of the products of these industries amounted to $3,330,000,000. (See appendix No. 3.)

Chromium

During 1938 the United States imported 301,745 long tons of chromium, principally from East and South Africa, the Philippines, Turkey, New Caledonia, and Cuba. Fifty-nine percent of this commodity was shipped from ports located in present belligerent countries. Sixty-two and one-half percent was transported in American-flag vessels; 17½ percent in vessels of nations now considered belligerents; and 20 percent in neutral foreign-flag vessels. Chrome ore is used largely in the manufacture of ferrochrome for the alloy-steel industry. It is important for both military and peacetime industries. The United States is dependent upon imports for 99 percent of its requirements. This point, together with the fact that American-flag vessels are now transporting over 60 percent of our supply, indicates clearly the importance of American vessels in the transportation of this commodity for supplying vital industries in this country. (See appendix No. 4.)

Among the other strategic commodities necessary to American industry, tungsten is highly important. It comprises from 17 to 18 percent of the weight of high-speed tool steel. This commodity could be produced in the United States to take care of our industrial needs, although the cost would be great. One of the largest importers of tungsten in the United States specifies the use of American bottoms in all contracts which he is making at present for the importation of tungsten into this country from foreign sources, the reason for this being that he wants to insure the greatest safety in the transportation of this essential commodity.

More than 50 percent of the items we import may be classified as strategic or critical commodities either because we cannot produce them in this country or, if we can, the cost would be exceedingly high. For example, consider four industries that play an important part in our national economy—the automotive, drug, food, and communications. The automotive industry uses considerable quantities of tin, rubber, chrome, manganese, nickel, shellac, cork, and a number of other commodities which we may be able to produce only in small quantities, or not at all, and for which we must depend entirely upon foreign sources for our supply. In fact, it has recently been said that every State in the Union and 57 foreign countries contribute material for American-made automobiles.

The drug industry needs iodine, castor oil, opium, camphor, menthol, and quinine. A large part of our food industry is dependent almost entirely upon the importation of coffee, tea, cocoa, spices, tropical fruits, nuts, etc. The telephone industry needs flax, tin, rubber, mica, nickel, and platinum. It may be said that there are few industries that do not require commodities from abroad in order to carry on their business. Those employed in the tire, steel, automotive, oil, garage, trucking, taxi, and automobile-repair trades would be directly affected if the importation of one commodity—rubber—was substantially curtailed.

The total or partial withdrawal of American-flag vessels from certain of the essential trade routes would have the effect of placing American commerce moving on those routes in the hands of foreign-flag services. Experience in the last war taught that when we are forced to depend upon foreign-flag vessels to carry our commodities freight rates increase to high levels. It is to be expected that during the conflict in Europe vessels of foreign nations will be placed in the most lucrative trades, which may reasonably be trades other than those vital in supplying American industries with such products as rubber, jute, tin, manganese, chrome ore, and chemicals. Any curtailment of the normal operation of those industries engaged in the production of iron and steel, automobiles, machinery, tin products, rubber goods, chemical products, and drugs, to mention only a few, would probably affect to a considerable degree labor, industry, railway and highway transportation, agriculture, and commercial activities in general. Although it might be possible to obtain these essential imports by the utilization of foreign-flag services, rates might be expected to advance as a result of the functioning of the law of supply and demand. This was experienced in the last European war, and our national economy was severely affected as a result of the high shipping rates which were imposed. (See appendixes Nos. 5 and 5–A.)

Export trade

Normally our exports represent about 10 percent of the value of the movable goods produced in the United States, and the state of our national economy is in a large measure determined by our ability to sell this surplus in foreign markets. In 1938 it is estimated that 9 percent of our total production was exported to foreign countries. The indicated 1938 ratio was thus only 1 point lower than the 10 percent of production annually exported in the period from 1925 to 1929. The fact that foreign markets were able to absorb about 10 percent of our total production in 1938 was an important sustaining influence on the volume of production in the United States, particularly in the first half of the year, when domestic trade underwent a substantial shrinkage. The ability to export this 10 percent of our total production oftentimes may mean the difference between prosperity and depression in the United States. In 1938 exports amounted to $3,094,00,000, while imports amounted to $1,961,000,000.

If we do not import, or are prevented from importing essential requirements, foreign nations will not be able to buy as much of our cotton, tobacco, grain, oil, iron, and steel, and a great many other commodities that make up a large segment of our national economy. The following table shows the percentage export trade is of total domestic production for 11 important commodities:

Percentage export trade is of total production

Commodity:
Aircraft and parts, except engines	33.0
Cotton	30.5
Lubricating oil	30.2
Tobacco leaf	29.6
Tractors	19.4
Agricultural implements and machinery	14.5
Industrial machinery	14.4
Automobiles, including passenger cars, trucks and busses	14.0
Gas, oil, and fuel oil	9.8
Motor fuel	8.0
Crude petroleum	6.4

It was estimated, for example, that the amount of time devoted to producing for export in 1936 represented the equivalent of the full-time services of 2,000,000 workers, not including the thousands engaged in transportation, banking, brokerage, insurance, advertising, merchandising, and other services. Indirectly more than 1,000,000 additional full-time workers were estimated as being employed as a result of our export trade in supplying the necessary commodities to take care of the needs for the number engaged primarily in industries which do a large export trade.

If, as a result of the pending Neutrality Act, American ships will be prohibited from carrying articles or materials to ports of belligerent nations, a substantial number of persons now working in those industries and services directly connected with export industries may be thrown out of work or have their income drastically curtailed.

The following table shows the importance, on a value basis, of our 10 leading export groups:

Ten leading exports on a valuation basis for the calendar year 1938

1. Unmanufactured cotton	$228,700,000
2. Unmanufactured tobacco	155,700,000
3. Crude petroleum	111,700,000
4. Gasoline and other motor fuels	103,500,000
5. Wheat	101,300,000
6. Passenger automobiles	100,100,000
7. Corn	94,500,000
8. Copper	86,800,000
9. Motortrucks	72,100,000
10. Aircraft	68,200,000

Appendix No. 6 is a statement showing values of the 10 principal commodities exported to nations now considered belligerents in 1938. Appendix No. 7 shows the same type of information to nonbelligerent nations.

Distribution of total exports of trade regions

Europe, normally our leading export market, took 43 percent of our total exports in 1938. Latin America ranked second, with 18 percent; Asia was third, with 17 percent; northern North America fourth, with 15 percent; Africa fifth, with 4 percent; and Oceania sixth, with 3 percent.

Of the above exports, the countries which are now belligerents purchased quantities which aggregated in value $559,900,000. This represented 50 percent of the total exports of the 10 commodities listed above.

During 1938 we also exported lumber sawmill products valued at $36,000,000, 49 percent of which was destined to countries which are now belligerents. Our exports of naval stores the same year amounted to $12,000,000, 49.4 percent of which went to present belligerent countries.

In 1938 this country exported to countries now considered belligerents such agricultural and forest products as tobacco, cotton, corn, wheat, lumber, and naval stores in the amount of $380,000,000. It is thus seen that any disruption of the exportation of these commodities would seriously affect industries upon which thousands of our citizens are dependent for a livelihood.

Considering our total foreign commerce in 1937, it is found that imports in the amount of $1,314,735,000 were received from present belligerent countries designated in the President's proclamations; our total imports for that year amounted to $3,010,000,000. Exports to countries that are now considered belligerent nations amounted in 1937 to $1,673,204,000 out of a total trade of $3,299,000,000. The large percentage of our foreign trade with present belligerent countries accentuates the possible effect upon our national economy of the enactmnt into law of the neutrality bill.

The lack of merchant ships at the outbreak of the World War caused enormous losses to American business. American consumers were affected because retail prices of certain products, the manufacture of which was dependent upon the importation of such raw products as rubber, tin, chromium, tungsten, aluminum, and wool, advanced to high levels.

Great Britain commandeered 1,500 of her merchantmen for war purposes, and German ships were withdrawn from service, leaving the United States with inadequate means for shipping our products to foreign markets and getting essential imports from those markets. Left almost entirely upon our own resources, our products were piled up in warehouses and elevators, in freight cars and upon docks, with few ships to transport them.

During this emergency the price of transporting a bale of cotton from the Gulf ports of the United States to Liverpool rose from $2.50 to $50 a bale. It is estimated that it cost this country $750,000,000 more to produce the cotton crop in 1914 than was received for it. The major portion of this huge loss was due to our lack of shipping facilities.

At the same time the cost of transporting wheat from the United States to Liverpool jumped from 8 cents a bushel in 1914 to 27 cents in 1915, and during the war reached the peak of $1.36 a bushel. One dollar per pound was being asked and obtained for packaged freight from New York to Marseilles. In this expensive fashion we had brought home sharply to us the folly of depending on ships of other countries to carry our foreign commerce. The lack of merchant ships during the World War period cost this country billions of dollars lost in trade and paid out in excessive emergency prices for ship tonnage.

Although the conditions set forth above with regard to prices and rates were in part the result of the United States being deficient in merchant vessels sufficient to handle our import and export trade, the same effects might readily be felt as a consequence of withdrawing certain American-flag vessels from the trade with present belligerent countries far removed from war zones.

Rates

The rate structure of ocean shipping would in all probability be drastically affected if the pending neutrality bill becomes law. At the present time freight rates are higher than normal because world conditions have so upset established routes as to increase the multiplicity of costs inherent in shipping charges. It is axiomatic that balanced-cargo shipments tend to reduce freight rates. Should it be necessary for vessels to proceed in ballast to a port of a belligerent nation and return with cargo to the United States from that port, rates would necessarily increase out of all proportion than if cargoes were available for movement in both directions. The exigencies of war conditions and an unbalanced cargo movement can only result in an abnormal rate structure, the extent of which cannot at present be foreseen.

APPENDIX NO. 1

STRATEGIC COMMODITIES

Tin

The following table shows total United States imports for 1936, 1937, and preliminary 1938 data, as well as the important sources from which this commodity is obtained:

Country	1936		1937		1938 (preliminary)
	Pounds	Value	Pounds	Value	Pounds	Value
Total, all countries	170,305,359	$75,450,941	197,376,708	$104,284,762	111,326,139	$44,860,324
British Malaya	121,791,574	53,658,930	149,426,914	79,490,432	82,146,688	32,952,813
United Kingdom	18,903,632	8,708,923	16,137,467	8,432,401	7,362,734	3,200,669
Netherland Indies	6,133,848	2,669,369	9,194,566	4,793,256	6,936,024	2,716,274
Netherlands	10,044,284	4,613,776	5,481,231	2,958,631	4,963,335	2,062,990
China	2,305,726	997,879	10,006,714	5,126,838	4,668,589	1,807,756
Hong Kong	7,961,336	3,386,580	4,631,648	2,222,866	2,697,139	1,034,384
Australia	56,000	25,592	212,800	60,214	291,200	126,914
Germany	358,471	140,756	----------	----------	[1] 44,807	[1] 17,109

[1] Includes Austria.

APPENDIX NO. 2

RUBBER

(Crude rubber) other than latex, guayule, jelutong, and pontianak

The table below shows total United States imports from 1936 to 1938 from all countries, as well as the principal sources of supply:

Country	1936		1937		1938 (preliminary)
	Pounds	Value	Pounds	Value	Pounds	Value
Total, all countries	1,046,223,100	$152,072,496	1,287,104,961	$237,307,041	890,714,201	$125,373,864
British Malaya	740,025,596	107,485,693	802,841,635	146,612,872	536,786,703	73,771,167
Netherlands Indies	194,291,760	28,712,970	314,486,666	59,046,980	233,699,208	33,821,016
Ceylon	60,462,077	8,811,675	66,993,586	12,850,512	55,492,395	8,493,595
French Indo-China	29,527,904	4,068,092	36,503,326	6,235,210	45,253,662	6,746,806
Brazil	8,971,853	1,297,847	12,830,963	2,305,699	7,281,977	892,753
British India	1,931,624	259,403	47,267,046	9,214,215	4,735,730	684,957
Liberia	1,955,093	234,602	2,494,625	487,582	3,553,542	482,061
Philippine Islands	901,376	100,759	624,467	102,952	1,455,205	179,602
United Kingdom	4,997,471	779,574	692,597	159,435	695,322	127,532

APPENDIX NO. 3

MANGANESE ORE

United States imports from foreign countries of manganese ore containing 35 percent or more manganese[1]

[Manganese content]

Country	1936		1937		1938 (preliminary)
	Pounds	Value	Pounds	Value	Pounds	Value
Total, all countries	869,905,938	$8,190,429	873,710,740	$8,265,802	383,114,315	$4,632,897
Union of Soviet Socialist Republics	315,997,167	2,716,401	418,288,167	3,959,955	180,707,689	2,661,557
Gold Coast (British)	281,999,003	3,166,498	291,529,709	2,942,430	143,112,858	1,500,813
British India	147,165,719	1,307,436	81,812,028	679,232	29,390,247	236,945
Brazil	117,072,717	872,371	79,531,802	597,413	29,808,332	220,328
Cuba	39,112,241	521,370	126,301,155	2,185,800	137,836,658	2,242,425

[1] The rate of duty as of the act of 1930 is 1 cent per pound on metallic manganese content. Effective as of Jan. 1, 1936, our trade agreement with Brazil specifies that the rate of duty will be ½ cent per pound on metallic manganese content, while this commodity enters the United States duty free from Cuba under the act of 1930.

APPENDIX NO. 4

CHROME ORE OR CHROMITE

United States imports of chrome ore or chromite

[Chromic oxide content]

Country	1936		1937		1938 (preliminary)
	Tons	Value	Tons	Value	Tons	Value
Total, all countries	141,198	$4,431,898	247,056	$7,324,488	163,570	$4,851,892
Other British South Africa[1]	33,391	1,372,644	96,354	3,290,767	49,542	1,778,651
Philippine Islands	2,504	81,658	20,688	490,639	38,221	915,221
Union of South Africa	18,987	577,586	31,839	820,146	30,318	831,938
Turkey	9,186	364,668	18,480	750,509	9,650	469,145
French Oceania	33,347	1,163,192	28,384	927,063	15,270	388,534
Cuba	22,813	358,241	30,179	463,243	12,773	198,173
Greece	10,879	254,627	9,449	274,951	4,165	155,736
All other countries	10,091	259,272	11,683	326,870	3,631	117,493

[1] Other than Union of South Africa.

APPENDIX NO. 5

Statement of strategic commodities by flags of carriers for calendar year 1938

[In cargo tons of 2,240 pounds]

Commodities (strategic materials)	Total imports		American		Belligerent nations										Other foreign nations
					British		French		German		Polish		Total		Belgian		Danish
	Tons	Percent	Tons	Percent	Tons	Percent	Tons	Percent	Tons	Percent	Tons	Percent	Tons	Percent	Tons	Percent	Tons	Percent
Tin	52,166	3.8	17,304	33.2	17,860	34.2							17,860	34.2			729	1.5
Rubber	427,200	31.4	82,915	19.4	220,551	51.6	10		5				220,566	51.7			374	.1
Manganese (ferro)	25,736	1.9	3,436	13.4	2,986	11.6	651	2.5					3,637	14.1			980	3.8
Chromium	301,745	22.2	188,974	62.6	37,704	12.5			15,500	5.1			53,204	17.7			1,597	.5
Aluminum	460,867	33.9	25,095	5.6	13,111	2.8	285	.1	797	2			14,193	3.0			7,624	1.6
Miscellaneous: Antimony, coconut shells, charcoal, manila fiber, mica, nickel, optical glass, quartz crystal, quicksilver, quinine, and tungsten[1]	92,641	6.8	32,098	34.6	21,906	23.6	1,493	1.6	3,506	3.8	28		26,933	29.1	84	0.1	4,673	5.0
Total	1,360,355	100	349,822		314,118		2,439		19,808		28		336,393		84		15,977
Percentage by nationals			25.7		23.1		.2		1.4				24.7				1.2
Percentage by national groups			25.7

APPENDIX No. 5—Continued

Statement of strategic commodities by flags of carriers for calendar year 1938—Continued

[In cargo tons of 2,240 pounds]

Commodities (strategic materials)	Other foreign nations—Continued
	Finnish		Honduras		Italian		Japanese		Netherland		Norwegian		Panamanian		Swedish		Total
	Tons	Percent	Tons	Percent	Tons	Percent	Tons	Percent	Tons	Percent	Tons	Percent	Tons	Percent	Tons	Percent	Tons	Percent
Tin					72	0.1	5,066	9.7	10,001	19.2	1,004	1.9	50	0.1	80	0.1	17,002	32.6
Rubber			202	0.1			29,061	6.8	81,407	19.1	10,009	2.3	2,626	.6	40		123,719	28.9
Manganese (ferro)							43	.1	6,111	23.7	11,429	44.4			100	.4	18,663	72.5
Chromium							7,500	2.5			49,970	16.6			500	.2	59,567	19.7
Aluminum	5,182	0.7			366	.1			500	.1	401,522	87.1	2,413	.5	3,972	.9	421,579	91.4
Miscellaneous: Antimony, coconut shells, charcoal, manila fiber, mica, nickel, optical glass, quartz crystal, quicksilver, quinine, and tungsten [1]					1,856	2.2	19,403	20.9	388	.4	6,742	7.3	9		455	.5	33,610	36.3
Total	5,182		202		2,294		61,073		98,407		480,676		5,098		5,147		674,140
Percentage by nationals	.4				.2		4.5		7.2		35.3		.4		.4
Percentage by national groups																	49.6

[1] Some of these commodities moved in such small quantities that they are not separately identified and most probably were reported as "general cargo."

Source: Tabulation of cargo reports submitted to the Maritime Commission by the ocean carriers.

APPENDIX No. 5A

Statement of critical commodities by flags of carriers for calendar year 1938

[In cargo tons of 2,240 pounds]

Commodities (critical materials)	Total imports		American		Belligerent nations								Other foreign nations
					British		French		German		Total		Belgian		Brazilian		Danish		Greek
	Tons	Percent	Tons	Percent	Tons	Percent	Tons	Percent	Tons	Percent	Tons	Percent	Tons	Percent	Tons	Percent	Tons	Percent	Tons	Percent
Coffee	904,341	57.7	493,713	54.6	93,138	10.3	17,707	2.0	21,542	2.4	132,387	14.6	981	0.1	71,612	7.9	20,757	2.3
Cork	75,215	4.8	17,955	23.9	365	.5			74	.1	439	.6					5,992	8.0
Graphite	2,103	.1	68	3.2	890	42.3	36	1.7	119	5.7	1,045	49.7					70	3.3
Kapok	7,563	.5	797	10.5	3,995	52.8			65	.9	4,060	53.7
Tanning materials	111,453	7.1	52,705	47.3	14,898	13.4	65	.1	4,528	4.1	19,491	17.5					10,164	9.1	6,080	5.4
Miscellaneous: Flaxseed, fluorspar, hides, iodine, nux vomica, opium, platinum, titanium, vanadium, asbestos, and cryolite [1]	465,569		82,686	17.8	68,277	14.7	358		13,315	2.9	81,950	17.6			25		41,191	8.8
Total	1,566,244		647,924		181,563		18,166		39,643		239,372		981		71,637		78,174		6,080
Percentage by nationals	100		41.4		11.6		1.2		2.5						4.6		5.0		.4
Percentage by national groups	100		41.4								15.3

Commodities (critical materials)	Other foreign nations—Continued
	Honduran		Italian		Japanese		Netherland		Norwegian		Panamanian		Swedish		Union of Soviet Socialist Republics		Total
	Tons	Percent	Tons	Percent	Tons	Percent	Tons	Percent	Tons	Percent	Tons	Percent	Tons'	Percent	Tons	Percent	Tons	Percent
Coffee	21,071	2.3	7,119	0.8	4,776	0.5	25,451	2.8	99,559	11.0	3,581	0.4	23,334	2.6			278,241	30.8
Cork			40,185	53.4			91	.1	10,045	13.3					508	0.7	56,821	75.5
Graphite			15	.7	317	15.1	398	18.9	190	9.1							990	47.1
Kapok					33	.4	1,783	23.6	827	11.0	63	.8					2,706	35.8
Tanning materials			772	.7	280	.2	550	.5	21,402	19.2							39,257	35.2
Miscellaneous: Flaxseed, fluorspar, hides, iodine, nux vomica, opium, platinum, titanium, vanadium, asbestos, and cryolite [1]			1,388	.3	1,758	.4	709	.2	250,882	53.9	112		2,484	.5	2,384	.5	300,933	64.6
Total	21,071		49,479		7,164		28,991		382,905		3,756		25,818		2,892		678,948
Percentage by nationals	1.3		3.2		.5		1.9		24.4		.2		1.6		.2
Percentage by national groups																	43.3

[1] Some of these commodities moved in such small quantities that they are not separately identified and most probably were reported as "General cargo."

Source: Tabulation of cargo reports submitted to the Maritime Commission by the ocean carriers.

APPENDIX No. 6

STATEMENT OF VALUES OF PRINCIPAL COMMODITIES EXPORTED

Tabulation of exports by countries, $1,000,000 and upward, for calendar year 1938

Country	Unmanufactured cotton	Unmanufactured tobacco	Crude petroleum	Gasoline and other petroleum products	Wheat	Passenger automobiles, new	Corn	Copper	Motor-trucks	Aircraft
Total exports	$228,700,000	$155,700,000	$111,700,000	$103,500,000	$101,300,000	$100,100,000	$94,500,000	$86,800,000	$72,100,000	$68,200,000
Belligerent:
Australia		7,600,000		4,900,000		6,700,000			2,500,000	1,200,000
British India		1,800,000				1,800,000			2,400,000
Canada	12,300,000	1,200,000	35,700,000	6,000,000	5,200,000	8,700,000	38,000,000		3,700,000	3,500,000
France	23,900,000	3,000,000	25,400,000	6,500,000				7,000,000	3,500,000
Germany	16,900,000	1,400,000	1,800,000	7,000,000	2,600,000		9,600,000	16,800,000
Hong Kong									3,300,000	1,200,000
New Zealand		1,100,000		2,000,000		1,500,000
Poland	10,500,000					1,200,000		2,500,000	1,300,000
Union of South Africa				1,500,000		14,200,000			3,000,000
United Kingdom	41,200,000	111,300,000		18,800,000	23,900,000	3,300,000	20,000,000	6,500,000		3,900,000
Total	104,800,000	127,400,000	62,900,000	46,700,000	31,700,000	37,400,000	67,600,000	32,800,000	21,000,000	9,800,000

Source: Shippers' export declarations.

APPENDIX No. 7

STATEMENT OF VALUES OF PRINCIPAL COMMODITIES EXPORTED

Tabulation of exports by countries, $1,000,000 and upward, for calendar year 1938

Country	Unmanufactured cotton	Unmanufactured tobacco	Crude petroleum	Gasoline and other petroleum products	Wheat	Passenger automobiles, new	Corn	Copper	Motor-trucks	Aircraft
Nonbelligerent:
Argentina			$2,400,000			$10,100,000			$3,900,000	$6,200,000
Belgium	$6,700,000	$1,500,000		$2,800,000	$10,600,000	6,800,000	$3,400,000	$2,200,000	2,700,000
Brazil				3,900,000	3,900,000				2,500,000	1,900,000
China		6,500,000							2,600,000	6,400,000
Colombia					1,700,000				1,900,000
Cuba			1,400,000	1,800,000		2,100,000			1,200,000
Czechoslovakia	12,000,000							6,700,000
Denmark				1,400,000	1,900,000	1,000,000
Egypt						2,100,000			1,300,000
Greece					2,300,000
Hungary									1,100,000
Italy	19,300,000		9,700,000	1,700,000				4,400,000
Ireland		4,200,000			10,300,000		7,700,000
Japan	53,000,000		29,900,000	7,700,000				22,200,000	2,100,000	11,100,000
Kwantung			1,400,000	1,700,000						1,400,000
Mexico					2,900,000	2,100,000			1,200,000	1,200,000
Netherlands	4,400,000			4,600,000	12,500,000	1,300,000	10,700,000	2,000,000		3,300,000
Netherland East Indies										8,500,000
Netherland West Indies				6,700,000
Norway		1,100,000				1,600,000			1,700,000
Persia									1,500,000
Peru					1,200,000				1,400,000
Philippines				2,500,000		2,100,000				1,800,000
Portugal					1,900,000				1,200,000
Russia				2,200,000						5,200,000
Spain				4,800,000					1,900,000
Sweden		1,400,000	1,100,000	5,300,000		8,300,000		3,800,000		1,000,000
Switzerland		1,300,000
Turkey										3,200,000
Venezuela					2,200,000				3,700,000
Total	95,400,000	16,000,000	45,800,000	47,100,000	51,400,000	37,500,000	23,600,000	41,300,000	31,900,000	51,200,000

Source: Shippers' export declarations.

We need the products of other lands.

IMPORTS

	Percent
Rubber	100
Sugar	72
Coffee, tea, cocoa	100
Tin	100
Wool	31

We gain by selling beyond our borders.

EXPORTS

	Percent
Cotton	51
Lubricants	40
Lard	37
Tobacco	38
Kerosene	25
Agricultural machinery	20
Automobiles	12

The Crusade for Peace

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HIRAM W. JOHNSON

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, October 12 (legislative day of Wednesday October 4), 1939

RADIO ADDRESS BY REV. EDWARD L. CURRAN

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the RECORD an address delivered on October 7, 1939, over the Columbia network by Rev. Edward Lodge Curran, Ph. D., president of the International Catholic Truth Society. The subject of the address is The Crusade for Peace.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The crusade for peace is the most important issue before the attention of the American Nation today. It is a crusade to preserve our present constitutional form of American democracy. It is a crusade to intensify and expand the defenses of our country so that no "red" or "brown" aggressor may ever duplicate in the United States the cunning and cowardly rape of Poland. It is a crusade to keep the United States out of war. And it is a crusade to keep the United States out of the vestibule of war.

The crusade has expressed itself in letters, in phone calls, and in telegrams to Congress demanding that the present embargo on arms and ammunition to foreign belligerents be maintained, no matter what other changes may be made in our present neutrality legislation.

Professional columnists in some of our metropolitan newspapers have referred sneeringly to this expression of an awakened public opinion. The professional columnists should rejoice that we still live in a country where citizens still possess the freedom and the energy to convey their attitude on proposed legislation to the supreme lawmaking body of the United States. The professional columnists themselves are professional letter writers, receiving handsome salaries for their daily epistles in the metropolitan newspapers. In spite of the professional columnists, we of the antiwar crusade intend to increase and deepen and intensify the voice with which the American people is beseeching the Congress to keep us out of war.

There is no mistaking the message of our voice. It is the composite voice of American manhood and American motherhood—Protestant, Jewish, and Catholic alike. It is the composite voice of all American citizens who remember the blunder and the stupidity and the failure and the deceit of our participation in the last World War. We insist that the Congress of the United States heed our voice.

We shall fight, if need be, to the last drop of blood and to the last breath of our failing bodies, against any invasion by any aggressor against the continental, insular, or Territorial possessions of the United States. We shall fight against any dictatorship, either from the right or the left, that raises its hand within the gates and attempts to strangle our present constitutional form of American democracy. But we shall not fight for the European nations that took our money and our blood 20 years ago and then sneered at our peacetime idealism. We shall fight for the defense of our country along every American front, but we shall not fight, any time or anywhere, for foreign causes upon foreign battlefields.

We beg the Congress of the United States to keep us out of foreign entangling alliances, whether they be the alliances of international politics or the alliances of the international munitions trade. We recognize a difference between arms and ammunition, which are fundamentally and primarily commodities of death, and all other commodities, which are fundamentally and primarily commodities of life, even if the munitions makers and their allies, the foreign propagandists, refuse to do so. Therefore, we beg the Congress to keep us out of war by keeping us out of the vestibule to war. The contemplated repeal of the embargo on arms and ammunition to foreign belligerents means the entrance of the United States into the vestibule to war.

There is not a single argument advanced that can justify the removal of the embargo on arms and ammunition. Those who would sell arms and ammunition to all for "cash and carry" have already given the lie to the title of their amendment by providing for 90 days of credit to the very nations who have been our insulting debtors to the tune of billions of dollars for the past 19 years. If they have not paid in 19 years, how will they be able or willing to pay in 90 days?

Senator KEY PITTMAN, of Nevada, who is eloquent now on the Senate floor for repeal of the embargo on arms and ammunition, was eloquent 2 years ago for the maintenance of the embargo. We wonder who has whispered in his ear. What economic royalist has put pressure on the Senator through the White House? We should love to read the history of the psychological and political transformation by which PITTMAN the embargoist has become PITTMAN the repealist.

Stung by the concentrated expression on the part of hundreds of thousands of American citizens against removing the embargo on arms and ammunition, certain groups in the United States placed Mr. Alfred E. Smith, former Governor of New York State, before the microphone a week ago. There is no one who admires Al Smith more than I. As a fellow American, I love him for his Americanism. As a fellow Catholic, I love him for his catholicism. He is one of whom all Americans may be proud.

We listened to the speech of Governor Smith with feelings of sadness and surprise. There was not a single argument presented to justify the President's demand that the embargo on arms and ammunition be removed from our new neutrality legislation. Mr. Smith said that the "present Neutrality Act does not work." When, Mr. Smith, did it break down? How and where did it break down? How can an embargo on arms and ammunition cease to work? Even if all other clauses of the present Neutrality Act should be changed, why cannot the embargo on arms and ammunition remain? For the past several years, Mr. Smith, the embargo clause of our present Neutrality Act has helped to keep us out of declared and undeclared wars in both Europe and Asia. It kept us out of the Spanish civil war, when every "red" in this country was howling for its repeal in order that Stalin might have accomplished in Spain what he has already accomplished in Poland.

You are not true to the record, Mr. Smith. The present embargo on arms and ammunition has worked. "It has not," as you tried to suggest, Mr. Smith, "been weighed in the balance and found wanting." The only balance that has weighed it and found it wanting has been the Fairbanks scales of the Du Ponts and the other munition-making economic royalists in this country.

For the sake of the record, Mr. Smith, we agree with you that the transportation of any goods or any passengers in American ships to warring nations should be prohibited. For the sake of the record, Mr. Smith, we agree with you that American ships and American passengers should be kept out of the export business. For the sake of the record, Mr. Smith, we believe that American markets of international trade should be kept open to belligerent nations for all commodities save arms and ammunition. We should sell all commodities save arms and ammunition to any belligerent power that comes with cash and that takes away the purchased commodities in its own ships or the ships of other nationalities. But we are now and always dedicated to the retention of the embargo on arms and ammunition, no matter what the President desires and no matter how itchy the palm of the munition makers and the international bankers may become.

Again, Mr. Smith, for the sake of the record, we resent your statement that only those who lack an understanding of the issue will oppose the demand of the President that the embargo on arms and ammunition be repealed. The record of the President is open to the American people for the past 6 years. American citizens have the right to criticize, in public or in private, the record of any citizen or public official of the United States, including the President of the United States. Should any citizen be denied the right to express public criticism of public acts on the part of public officials, either over the radio or in the press or on the public platform, the moment of that denial is the moment of a collapsing democracy and an incipient dictatorship.

We of the Antiwar Crusade understand the issue. It is the issue of keeping us out of war by keeping us out of the vestibule to war. It is the issue of isolating and identifying those commodities which are clearly and directly and purposely and immediately weapons of death. It is the issue of refusing to become a party to the contract of wholesale murder by furnishing such arms and ammunition to any belligerent nation abroad.

It is the issue of refusing to allow the munition makers and the international bankers to wax rich and fat on the broken bodies and the bayoneted breasts of those who are done to death by arms and ammunition manufactured in the United States. It is the issue of remembering that the cash-and-carry policy applied to arms and ammunition 20 years ago became the policy of credit and carry and next, through the flotation of foreign loans in the United States the policy of float and carry, and finally the policy of being carried into the death and destruction and massacre and mutilation of actual warfare. It is the issue of amending and strengthening the present Neutrality Act without canceling a single word of the embargo on arms and ammunition to foreign belligerents.

This is not a Catholic question or a Protestant question or a Jewish question. This is an American question. We of the Antiwar Crusade, who are fighting for the retention of the embargo on arms and ammunition in all neutrality legislation, resent certain recent attempts to identify certain remarks in the Italian newspaper Osservatore Romano as semiofficial approval of the President's desire to remove the embargo. They are nothing of the kind. Let it be said to all the world that the Osservatore Romano is not the official representative of the Papacy. Let it be said to all the world that in matters purely civic and purely political no American Catholic takes orders from or is bound by the statements in any foreign newspaper no matter in what foreign country the statements may be printed.

This is not the time for participation in foreign affairs, either directly or indirectly. This is the time for preparedness. This is the time to perfect our coast defenses and our antiwar craft. This is the time to build an army capable of successfully defending every mile of our boundary line and capable of successfully stopping the advance of any "brown" or "red" aggressor across our Mexican or Alaskan borders. This is the time to build an air force that can plunge every enemy bombing plane reckless enough to attack us into oblivion. This is the time to build a navy that can successfully protect both our Atlantic and Pacific coasts at one and the same time. This is the time to protect our country from subversive activities within the gates by removing every Communist and every Nazi from public office in America. This is the time to legislate for peace and prosperity and preparedness here in the United States of America.

Peace legislation means keeping out of the vestibule of war by retaining the embargo on arms and ammunition to foreign belligerents. Preparedness legislation means keeping the products of American makers defenses for the air and land and sea defenses of the United States of America. Prosperity legislation means vitalizing the economic life of this Nation so that 10,000,000 Americans can be put back to work and so that every American family may be the recipient of a living annual wage.

This is the cause of our antiwar crusade. Billions for defense but not one cent of American money and not one ounce of American blood and not one item of American arms and ammunition for the foreign causes of foreign nations on foreign battlefields abroad.

Neutrality Problems

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GEORGE W. NORRIS

OF NEBRASKA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, October 12 (legislative day of Wednesday October 4), 1939

RADIO ADDRESS BY RT. REV. MSGR. JOHN O'GRADY

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an address delivered by Rt. Rev. Msgr. John O'Grady, secretary of the National Conference of Catholic Charities, in Omaha on the evening of October 10, 1939.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

After months of tension we awoke on September 4 to find the nations of Europe once more at war. We almost felt as if the end of the world were close at hand. People at first were loath to discuss it. Then they began to ask. What will hapen to modern civilization? What will be the fate of Christianity? What will war do to all that we have cherished throughout the years? Are we returning once more to an age of cruelty and barbarism? Every now and again some brave citizen would say, "This is no concern of ours." Then he would begin to brood. It was clear that he was not satisfied with his own statement. "We cannot," he would go on to say, "have any peace in the world until we get rid of those dictators."

This citizen was not speaking for himself, he was speaking for America.

In these past weeks we have given more and more thought to the implications of the war. We have asked ourselves, over and over, "What effect will the war have upon our lives in America?" "What influence will it have upon our whole social welfare program? Are we right in fearing that as public attention is concentrated upon the war that program will be overlooked? Are we liable to assume that a slight war boom will make an end of our whole problem of employment in this country, although the real chances are that a war boom would provide no more than 2,000,000 jobs during the next year?" That would leave us still with a large reservoir of unemployment, we would still need a Federal work program. Yet we must not forget that rising prosperity will create a further demand for reduced rates on unemployment compensation. The method suggested will be more and more merit rating. The system will thus be less capable of standing the shock of depression. The extension and increasing of benefit rates will be much more difficult than before.

In these 5 weeks of war we have asked ourselves also, "What part must America play in this tremendous struggle?" We understand the nature of this struggle. We know that it represents the revolutionary aims of two great powers to force their social systems upon the whole world. We are not wholly indifferent to those aims. No believer in our democratic institutions, no believer in the teachings of Christ can be wholly indifferent to them. We know that either democracy and the teachings of religion will survive or they will be supplanted by the rule of force and the ethics of paganism. Yet just as we are as one in regard to the principles involved, so we are as one in our desire to keep out of the war. We search in Europe for political leadership comparable to our own. We cannot find it. Until such time as that leadership emerges and the true voice of the people of Europe is heard we know that we have no part in the European war.

So in the last 5 weeks one question has dominated our thoughts: How is America to keep out of the war? We have listened to the wonderfully clear speech of the President in which he told us that the safest way to keep out of war was to revise the arms embargo in the light of existing conditions. We have listened to the opponents of the President, who wish to keep the Neutrality Act in its present form. The President has asked us not to distinguish between belligerents and to place no distinction upon the kinds of goods they buy from us. His opponents have argued that those belligerents may be permitted to buy anything they please except armaments.

In all the bitter struggle now going on in Congress the leaders of both sides are agreed upon one thing—that all actions which we take must be judged by whether their effects may strengthen or weaken our chances of keeping out. You and I, I think, would agree on a further point. We would agree that the longer the war lasts, the greater is the chance of our becoming involved. If we agree on this, then we must ask ourselves, Will the Neutrality Act lengthen or shorten the war?

There is one way in which the act might shorten the war, and that is by giving Hitler a quick victory. Would such a victory keep America out of war? According to the Gallup poll, 70 percent of the people of this country believe that after the Nazis and the Communists had conquered Great Britain and France, we would be their next objective. So we see that there is no peace for us that way.

Would the repeal of the arms embargo shorten the war? We cannot tell; but there seems good reason to suppose that it might. In any case, we know that on the all-important matter of our own safety it will give us the preparation that we need for our self-defense. It will gear our factories to producing the things we need for defense, and it will do so at no cost to ourselves. We will have no need to pile up huge stores of arms that may soon be obsolete. We will not need to transfer billions of our funds from our productive services of welfare and public works.

And think for a moment what would happen if we maintained the arms embargo. We must not underestimate the initiative of American capital and American enterprise. It will go always to places where it is most needed, and if it cannot operate upon American soil, it will migrate to soil upon which it can fulfill its functions. New plants, equipped with American machinery and built by American engineers, will be constructed in nearby countries to manufacture the armaments which we ban from American soil. And let us not imagine that Mr. Hitler will be any less angered because American armaments for Great Britain and France are not built on American soil.

Above all, in these 5 weeks of war we have come to realize with deeper gladness and devotion than ever before how unutterably precious to us are the blessings of American freedom. We understand how great is our fortune in living in a country in which there is freedom of religion, freedom of education, and freedom of speech and thought. With increasing determination we realize that we must dedicate ourselves anew to the struggle to make our democracy work more effectively than ever. With increasing determination we must see to it that so far as possible inner qualities within us must be remedied, and each person must be given a fair chance of securing the things necessary for human personality and family life. With increasing determination we realize that we must struggle for still greater security against the industrial hazards that bring such needless waste and suffering in human life. War makes it all the more necessary to rededicate ourselves anew to the Christian teaching and practice of brotherly love. It should make us reexamine our consciences in regard to what we are doing as individuals in the practice of personal services. We must not relax our efforts to build our private and public-welfare programs on a firmer foundation. Relaxation of efforts means a step backward.

In the midst of the greatest and most far-reaching conflicts of all time, the heart of man yearns for peace. Our holy father, Pius XII, prays and works incessantly for peace. Some day nations must again lay down their arms and sit around the council tables of peace, but it must be a different peace from that of Versailles. It must not be a victor's peace. It must be a peace based on justice and charity. It must be implemented by forces that make for its endurance.

Let us hope that America will play a great part in the moral and material rebuilding that must follow peace. Let us pray that by our understanding and our devotion we may find a real peace—one which is Christian and good and which will last forever.

Secretary of War Woodring and Assistant Secretary Johnson

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. STYLES BRIDGES

OF NEW HAMPSHIRE

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, October 12 (legislative day of Wednesday October 4), 1939

EDITORIAL FROM THE ARMY AND NAVY JOURNAL

Mr. BRIDGES. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the RECORD an editorial from the Army and Navy Journal of the issue of September 30, 1939. This editorial deals with the relationship between the Assistant Secretary of War, Mr. Louis Johnson, and the Secretary of War, Mr. Harry Woodring, which I think is of pertinent interest at this time. I think if there ever was a time when our Nation needed cooperation and harmony in the War Department, it is today. From my own experience with Mr. Woodring, as a member of the Military Affairs Committee of the Senate and a member of the War Department subcommittee of the Appropriations Committee, I have found him to be an able, capable, conscientious executive and member of the Cabinet supervising a very important department. He should have the support of all who are associated with him at all times, and particularly at a time like this. The editorial from the Army and Navy Journal is a thoroughgoing rebuke to Mr. Louis Johnson, The Assistant Secretary of War, and his undermining of his Chief at this critical time, and the stories coming from the Tom Corcoran and Ben Cohen group that he is soon to succeed his superior. I ask unanimous consent to have the editorial inserted in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Army and Navy Journal of September 30, 1939]

In the subtle and effective way the President has of dealing with squabbles in his administration he has ended the feud conducted by Assistant Secretary Johnson against Secretary Woodring. By his statement to the press, in disapproval of the book suggesting methods by which business should prepare for war, the foreword of which was written by Mr. Johnson, and by his dissolution of the War Resources Board, created by that subordinate during the Secretary's absence at Panama, the President has manifested publicly a lack of trust in his judgment and conduct, and has opened the door for him to resign, or to remain in office, as he may see fit. Evidently, the President's expressions of lack of confidence mean that the ambitions of the Assistant Secretary to obtain the war portfolio never will be realized. Thus ends ingloriously the campaign to bring about the resignation of Secretary Woodring. The single result of it is to strengthen the latter's standing with the President. The Secretary has shown extraordinary patience in connection with his Assistant's efforts to assume authority which belongs solely to his Chief, toward inspired published reports that he was to be transferred to a diplomatic post, and toward statements attributed to his subordinate that the latter had been promised the Secretaryship of War and was about to get it. Knowing in the end it would be his work and accomplishments that would count with the President and the people, the Secretary proceeded quietly in the performance of his duty. He maintained the closest personal as well as official relations with the General Staff. He saw that all matters of supply for which the Assistant Secretary is by law, responsible, were kept in line with the policies the President approved. He gave such sound advice to the President on military matters that it was invariably accepted. He made it a rule to make speeches only when he believed they would be timely and effective, and while forceful, they never irritated Congress. In fact, the Secretary's relations with the Vice President and Congress as a whole are closer, perhaps, than are those enjoyed by any other Cabinet member, a valuable asset which the President realizes. It is a pity that Mr. Johnson, who has real ability and energy, has failed to display toward his chief that loyalty, which the President regards as essential for efficient administration. Perhaps, the deserved rebuke Mr. Johnson has received, will cause him, if he continue in office, to revolutionize his conduct, and to appreciate that a successful administration of the Department in these perilous times will mean glory for all in which he will share with pride.

Abraham Lincoln

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ERNEST W. GIBSON

OF VERMONT

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, October 12 (legislative day of Wednesday October 4), 1939

ADDRESS BY GOVERNOR AIKEN, OF VERMONT, AT FAIRFIELD, ILL.

Mr. GIBSON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an address delivered by the Honorable George D. Aiken, Governor of the State of Vermont, before the Lincoln Club of Wayne County, at Fairfield, Ill., on October 6, 1939.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

For me to come here today to tell the people of Illinois any of the story of Lincoln would be more presumptious than carrying coals to Newcastle. But to attend this occasion as a representative of the State which gave a larger percentage of its vote to Abraham Lincoln than did any other State seems perfectly proper.

When the affairs of a nation, either through the exercise of tyranny or the adherence to outworn details of government, or because of fumbling and confused administrative efforts, reach the point where a change in the management or methods of government is necessary, then someone must be first to step forward.

It is to the credit and honor of Wayne County, Ill., that among the farm folks here was found the courage and foresight which prompted them to be the first to endorse that greatest of all our Presidents. All that can be said in praise of Abraham Lincoln has been said. All honor that can be paid to his name has already been paid. The greatest tribute that remains for us to pay the man today is that at each meeting convened for the purpose of honoring him we should derive inspiration from the principles expounded by this great American and consider their present-day application.

To represent the people well one must know them. Lincoln, born and raised in poverty and without the opportunity of education, did know them. More than any other man of our country he characterizes the American ideal that even the humblest have the opportunity to be great. Wealth and ambition are not the mark of greatness. It was the humility of Lincoln in the White House, his realization that he was only human and dependent on the will of God and the will of the people that made him the greatest of Presidents.

Humble of birth, he knew the meaning of poverty in such a manner that enabled him, during the deepest crisis of American history, to understand the suffering and needs of the people. He knew the meaning of work; the right and wrong of human conduct concerned him deeply. Human liberty and human rights were enunciated by him for all time. And when he passed on to the ages, the whole world knew him as a man of humanity and the epitome of Democracy. A true American—self-reliant, self-made, kindly, and simple—he personified the traits of character which must prove the foundation of any successful government.

As we meet here to honor Lincoln and commend the county which first officially endorsed him, we are likewise endorsing the form of government for which he labored. In thus honoring Democracy, let us in the crisis of today also consider the meaning of Democracy.

On July 4, 1776, when the representatives of the Thirteen Original States met in Philadelphia to sign the Declaration of Independence, they did not simply separate us from an Old World government, but they established on this continent a new form of government, the most truly democratic form of government to be found on earth, and one which has endured to the present day.

The essence of democracy, that indispensable element which distinguishes it from other forms of government, is the element of opposition—the right and duty of citizens to question their government and to express themselves freely one way or another on its policies.

In 1797 Congress enacted the alien and sedition laws, which, in effect, made criticism of government a crime. The uprising of the people against such presumptuous legislation resulted in the election of Thomas Jefferson and the repeal of the law. May I say here that the State of Vermont cast its vote wholeheartedly and enthusiastically for Thomas Jefferson—that the Vermont State Legislature memorialized him to accept a third term as President. One of our treasured historical keepsakes is the letter in which he replied, setting forth clearly and distinctly reasons why no man should aspire to a third term for President.

Two years ago a bill, having the support of the highest officials of our land, was introduced into Congress. Like the old sedition law, this bill, too, in effect, made criticism of, or opposition to, government on certain matters punishable by a $10,000 fine or 5 years' imprisonment. This bill was, fortunately, killed, but always and forever we must be on guard lest in one way or another we lose the right to question the intentions and actions of our Government.

Today the blight of war has spread over a large part of Europe and Asia. We know not where this pestilence will end. A limited emergency, whatever that means, has been declared here in America. We have been asked to drop partisanship in the present crisis—not to question the acts and proposals of officials in the highest offices. Partisanship implies a strong and biased devotion and adherence to a cause. It is often blind, passionate, narrow, unreasoning, or fanatical, and quite often conceals selfish political ambitions. As for the request to drop selfish political ambitions, regardless of party, whether this suggestion is intended for those who would perpetuate themselves in office or for those out of office who desire to regain control simply to redistribute patronage, I am all for it.

But if dropping partisanship means that we should not question the motives of our Government, that we should aline ourselves solidly behind those who during recent years have been anything but nonpartisan in word and deed, then I say that now, of all times, must men and women of America freely express themselves and guard the right to do so as they have never done before.

The people of Germany dropped partisanship; they surrendered their right to free speech and self-government in return for promised security. Shall we drop partisanship for promised neutrality? The people of Russia dropped partisanship. Willingly or not, they became subservient to a single group, and finally to a single man.

Would Lincoln drop partisanship today, when the voices of American people should be heard as never before? I think not.

The people of Russia and Germany dropped partisanship. As a result, there was established that very form of government which the world is now being immersed in bloodshed to wipe out. You and I cannot help but be partisan—but partisan, regardless of party or creed, to those principles of freedom enunciated by the great President from Illinois.

It is not unpatriotic to question the motives and policies of any government at this time. Patriotism is love of country and devotion to its welfare. It cannot be considered unpatriotic to do our utmost to keep our country out of war, especially when the danger of war constitutes a menace to our form of government and our American institutions.

We are all concerned about the part America will play in the war now spreading over Europe. Our people demand peace. Our people demand continued neutrality in the strictest sense of the word. The hospitals constructed during recent years are not yet sufficient to care for those who lost their health or reason in the last World War. We have not recovered from the economic disaster which that war visited upon us. We remember too well the boys who left the farm and home and went away and did not come back.

We are not neutral in our thought. Nearly every one of us sympathizes with the democratic powers in this struggle. Our own Government has definitely on more than one occasion evidenced its desire to aid these nations in their conflict against totalitarian government.

But I want to repeat now what I have said on many occasions during the last 4 or 5 weeks that America's peril lies not in the danger of losing a war but in the fact that while defeating dictatorship abroad we would inevitably be losing democracy at home.

Politics and policies are two different things. I am only too glad to abandon politics. In fact, so far as possible, I have conducted my state duties on a nonpolitical basis. But the policy of this country is the fundamental support of democracy first at home. It is laudable to want to support it abroad. It is natural to want to lick the dictators of the world. But if we try to support it abroad, to defeat all those nations where the people have lost control of their government, we will soon find ourselves hopelessly entangled in the intrigues and bloodshed of the world, and our own Government lost in the process.

Modern war is essentially economic and obviously completely alters a nation's economic structure. We are told frankly that our Government has for months been preparing plans for streamlining the economic functions of our Nation in order to more efficiently fight the forces of totalitarian states. They admit that if we are to meet these nations successfully in war that we must become their counterpart in our operations. If all the people knew the plans already developed for this country in the event of war, there would be no war. If to them were revealed the already published and admitted economic war plans of our Government, they would plainly see the evil end to which we would bring ourselves.

It would take stronger men than Abraham Lincoln to protect the individual liberty against the ravages of a modern war. I would like to call your attention to a book called Adjusting Your Business to War, written by Leo Cherne and published by the Tax Research Institute. The book contains a foreword by Louis Johnson, Assistant Secretary of War, who would have the responsibility of regimenting the material resources of our Nation in event of war. Therefore, the book acquires a semiofficial nature. Two features of the book cannot fail to impress the readers. The first is information compiled by the International Business Machines Corporation showing what could have been done with the amount which participation in the World War from 1917–19 cost the United States.

This money would have wired for electricity the 9,400,000 homes in the United States now without current. It would have paid off every farm mortgage in the United States. It would have installed modern plumbing and bathrooms in the 5,750,000 farm homes in the United States now without these conveniences. It would have established an educational and endowment fund equal to all present endowment funds of our schools and colleges combined. It would have built four consolidated schools at $250,000 each in every county in the United States. It would have built airports to the amount of $1,000,000 in every county of the United States.

It would have provided $5,000,000,000 for flood and soil erosion control. It would have established a trust fund which, yielding 3-percent interest, would give every blind and deaf person in the United States $100 a month for life. It would have provided for 10 bridges equal in size to the $60,000,000 Triborough Bridge. It would have built another canal across the Isthmus of Panama to cost as much as the one already there. It would have paid the entire cost of the recovery and relief program of our Nation from 1932 to 1938. It would have created an endowment fund which at 2 percent would give an income to support a world peace organization larger than the League of Nations, the World Court, and the International Labor Office combined.

All these things could have been done and at the same time wealth would be created for ourselves and posterity with our share of the cost of the last World War. And now what is planned in the event of another war which would be even bigger and more costly?

In the event of hostilities the President will ask for, and undoubtedly receive, emergency power, because it would be partisan and unpatriotic to oppose that request. He would be given complete control of all facilities of industry, all labor, all power, all agriculture, all commodities, all material resources, all financial institutions, and all methods of transportation.

Farmers would be told what to plant, where to plant, and what price to sell for.

Labor would have its wages and hours set for every type of work, and men would be told where they must work.

Industry would be told what each factory could make and a price fixed by Government on both raw material and finished product.

War profits would be absorbed by Government by methods already devised; and I am wholeheartedly for this part of the program.

There would be no $1-a-year men as in the last World War. Their places would be taken by men receiving $10,000 a year. And this, if past operations of our Government is any indication, would mean political conduct of the material side of war.

Surveys have already been made, production schedules drawn up and methods already devised to impose price fixing, priorities control, the issuance of compulsory industrial orders, the commandeering of materials, the licensing of all business and proportioning of commodities and raw material. The plans call for such a regimenting of all our resources, industrial, human, and natural, as would make the war lords of Germany and Russia blush for their inefficiency and thoughtlessness.

And no one in this country seriously believes that the power thus delegated to the administration in Washington would ever be wholly returned to the people at the end of the war. No administration and no central government that has used every means at its command short of war to appropriate for itself the resources of our States, to subserve the courts of the land, and to take undue control of our local affairs would fail to use the excuse of war to attain ends which the American people would not grant in times of peace. American businessmen of today oppose war because they know that at its conclusion there would be but one business—government.

War under the present Federal administration would be the shortest route to the loss of our liberties and the destruction of democracy at home. We can't hope to chastise every nation ruled by a dictator no matter how much we sympathize with the people of that nation or of neighboring countries. The best way to preserve democracy is to show the world that democracy is the best form of government under which to live. And our military efforts should be directed solely toward an adequate defense of America. We must not let this threat of war, which for years hung constantly over Europe and is now held over our own heads, take our attention from those repairs that need doing in our own yard.

Are the boundary lines of Latvia more important to us than fair prices and a decent living for 30,000,000 farm dwellers? Is the liberty of Estonia more precious to us than the fate of 10,000,000 unemployed in our own country? Is the destruction of Hitlerism more dear to us than our own democracy and the traditions of freedom?

The Forces Against Hitler

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GEORGE W. NORRIS

OF NEBRASKA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, October 12 (legislative day of Wednesday October 4), 1939

EDITORIAL FROM MANCHESTER GUARDIAN WEEKLY

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial from the Manchester Guardian Weekly of September 15, 1939, entitled "The Forces Against Hitler."

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Manchester Guardian Weekly]

THE FORCES AGAINST HITLER

The full strength of Hitler's power is immediate and visible. Nobody can doubt it. Germany is, after Russia, the most populous state in Europe. Her exceptional capacity for organization has been directed to a single aim. Her ruler has persuaded or compelled her to adapt her whole life to preparation for war. That ruler has certain advantages over Wilhelm II. The Kaiser ruled by divine right, whereas Hitler rules by personal spell. To the ordinary German he is the author and symbol of national recovery and of the restoration of German prestige in German eyes. There are, of course, unknown quantities in German politics. The ruthless persecutions, the suppression of some of the most vigorous elements in the nation, the banishment of so much skill and science from the service of the state, these have to be set against Hitler's success in organizing and mobilizing German power. The stability of a system based on such violent foundations must be uncertain. But for the moment he stands before Europe in all his might, master of an immense army and of all the instruments of destruction that science has given to man's evil passions, known to all his neighbors for his ruthless treatment of all who oppose him. Gibbon observed that barbarism could never upset civilization, for civilized man would have gunpowder, whereas the barbarians would depend on their primitive weapons. He had not foreseen a day when those conditions would be reversed, when the most savage manners would be combined with the most efficient machinery. It is not surprising that every small state in Europe has to hide its sympathies in this struggle.

The forces against Hitler are less easy to measure because they are not all above the surface. Nor can they be so easily collected and organized in a concrete form. Nazi-ism is an armed and militant doctrine, and it has the strength of a religion. But it is necessarily in conflict with other faiths and other ways of life. The dictators despise western Europe because they think that liberalism—and liberalism, in its widest sense, is the spirit and basis of the life of western Europe—is decadent and effete. They see only the weaknesses of the democracies. Those weaknesses are manifest, and nobody will deny their importance. But the attack of nazi-ism is not an attack on their weaknesses but on their strength. The feeling for liberty, the belief in the dignity of man, the respect for civilized law—these are great moral and political principles that are directly challenged by nazi-ism. What is wrong with the democracies is not that they hold these truths, but that in the difficult art of politics their application is sadly imperfect. Nazi-ism denies the truths themselves. These truths belong to the inheritance of Europe, and they are the bonds that unite peoples diverse in race in a common culture. For they belong to the Christian tradition of Europe which by teaching the underlying equality of all human individuals gave a new meaning and a new sanction to the Greek ideal of liberty and the Roman sense for law. Hitler has thus against him all that is vital in democracy both as a religion and as a way of life; as a faith and as a habit.

To measure this force we must remember the place that the struggle to vindicate and establish those principles takes in the great moments and the great documents of history. The Declaration of Independence by the American Colonies, so aptly quoted by the Liberal leader the other day, is rightly regarded as a landmark in history because it told feudal Europe that liberty and self-government are rights that attach to all men as children of a common Father. When Washington said that the concentration of power in one hand was the essence of tyranny he was opposing a king who was a very mild and amateur tyrant in comparison with Hitler. The dictators, looking at parliamentary government, with all its weaknesses and failures, see nothing grand or firm in the politics of western Europe. They cast derision on the French Revolution and the history of the British Parliament. But the latent strength of the principles that have inspired so much heroic history, religious and political, may easily escape the men who, having built their own power on confusion, think that arbitrary force is a universal remedy. If you remove from the history of Britain and of the United States, of France and Italy, of the Netherlands and the Swiss all that has been done to establish the rights of man by Christian prophets, liberal thinkers, and by rebel movements, what would be left? And this belief in liberty is the basis of the life of western Europe. What kind of life does nazi-ism offer in its place? Let anybody consider what life is like in Scandinavia and Switzerland, as described by Sir Ernest Simon in his recent book, The Smaller Democracies, and compare it with the life of Nazi Germany with its mass drill of mind and manners, its concentration camps, and its silenced thinkers, its homes and streets haunted by spies and eavesdroppers. Then let him consider what it would mean to the peoples of those states to be submerged in the Nazi system. Let him measure their loss in dignity, in freedom, in happiness, in their respect for themselves and for their nation. All of these states are formally neutral, but their history and their system of life forbid indifference. A world with so much of the passion for freedom in its blood and so much of the habit of freedom in its life will not easily submit to a tyrant, however ruthless his power.

Nothing to Mediate, Yet

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ESTES KEFAUVER

OF TENNESSEE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, October 12, 1939

EDITORIAL FROM THE CHATTANOOGA TIMES

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Chattanooga Times of October 10:

[From the Chattanooga Times of October 10, 1939]

NOTHING TO MEDIATE, YET

Few political developments in this country in the past 20 years have been more amazingly contradictory to the policies of the Government and the sentiment of the people than the one which finds an element of the Senate suffering peace jitters. Isolationists who have contended for 20 years that the United States cannot hope to affect the course of European politics are urging that President Roosevelt intervene as a mediator between Nazi Germany, on the one hand, and Great Britain and France, on the other. Members of Congress who have supported as a cardinal point of this Nation's foreign policy a refusal to condone aggression as an instrument of national policy are now urging Mr. Roosevelt to accept Hitler's conquest of Poland as a fait accompli and to take the position as the elected representative of the people of this country that Hitler can be depended on to agree to an honorable peace.

The attitude of some Members of the Senate is incredibly fantastic. When Senator JOHNSON of Colorado tells the Senate, as he did on Monday, that the whole world would "be gratified" if the Senate recessed for 3 days, that such an act would be considered a sign that the United States desires peace, and that the people are counting on the Chief Executive to do what he can to effect it, he suggested a course which in the adoption would wipe out with one stroke every principle upon which this country has based its position as a world power.

Adolf Hitler has given Europe and the world two choices—peace on his terms or a destructive war. Hitler has asserted that the world must accept his conquest of Czechoslovakia, his annexation of Austria, his seizure of Memel, the disintegration—fourth partition—of Poland. The peace he would accept, or impose, would have to be based on the acknowledgement that Germany and Russia dominate all of Europe east of France's Maginot line and that, in addition, Germany's lost colonies would be restored to the Reich. It is small wonder that Russia supports Hitler's peace terms.

Neither Hitler nor any of his spokesmen has asked, directly or indirectly, that President Roosevelt become a mediator. No controversy can be mediated unless good faith on both sides is conceded and unless it is understood that in the interest of peace each side is prepared to yield ground which in the process of mediation is found untenable. Hitler has not offered to yield anything; indeed, what he seeks is not a mediator but someone—almost anyone with any standing—to take the position that he ought to be upheld.

Not even Mussolini, who has a military alliance with Germany, will undertake to mediate in those circumstances. Yet there are Members of the Senate apparently prepared to turn their back on every declaration of the American Government against aggression, and place President Roosevelt in the intolerable position of suggesting that Hitler's every aggressive act be condoned. Senators who support an appeal that Mr. Roosevelt intervene at this juncture cannot understand the implications of their position.

In effect, they say that the American people are more interested in the cessation of warfare than they are in any principle for which they may previously have declared. The American Government has refused formally to accept the German conquest and dismemberment of either Czechoslovakia or Poland; because the tragic fate of those unhappy states resulted from aggression, and because the United States has steadfastly refused to condone aggression, this country continues to recognize the Czechoslovakian Government and has more recently recognized the Polish Government now established in France. Yet those who want Mr. Roosevelt to grasp Hitler's "outstretched hand" ask him to say for the American people that Poland's destruction and the conquest of Czechoslovakia must be accepted as a basis for an enduring peace.

Except as an apologist for Hitler, President Roosevelt could not act as mediator, for there is nothing to mediate. The alternative to a war in which the aim of Germany's enemies is to stamp out Hitlerian aggression is a peace which puts the stamp of approval on every aggressive act of Hitler's brutal regime. Unless it is decided that a cessation of hostilities coupled with a pious hope that Hitler will keep the peace is worth purchasing at the cost of abandoning every principle for which this Nation has stood in world affairs, the American Government can concern itself with the European situation only to the degree of speeding the work of strengthening its own defenses. For Congress to take any step which had the effect of weakening the stand Britain and France are making would be to perform a monstrous disservice to every American who has regarded his Government as a force for just and honorable relations among all countries.

Citadel of Civilization

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FRANK W. FRIES

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, October 12, 1939

EDITORIAL FROM THE WASHINGTON TIMES-HERALD

Mr. FRIES. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Washington Times-Herald of October 8, 1939:

[From the Washington Times-Herald of October 8, 1939]

CITADEL OF CIVILIZATION

"Destiny first made us, with our sister nations on this hemisphere, joint heirs of European culture. Fate seems now to compel us to assume the task of helping to maintain in the western world a citadel wherein that civilization may be kept alive." (From President Roosevelt's message to special session of Congress, September 21, 1939.)

The above-quoted lines occurred in the last paragraph of the President's masterly speech opening the special session of Congress, called to consider Neutrality Act revision. In our opinion, those lines were as important as anything else the President said in that speech.

Certainly in North America we have just about all the building materials needed for the citadel of civilization of which the President spoke. We print again the most encouraging set of statistics we have ever seen about the United States:

"The United States contains 6 percent of the world's area and 7 percent of its population. It normally consumes 48 percent of the world's coffee, 53 percent of its sugar, 72 percent of its silk, 36 percent of its coal, 42 percent of its pig iron, 47 percent of its copper, and 69 percent of its crude petroleum.

"The United States operates 60 percent of the world's telephone and telegraph facilities, owns 80 percent of the motorcars in use, operates 53 percent of the railroads. It produces 70 percent of the oil, 60 percent of the wheat and cotton, 50 percent of the copper and pig iron, and 40 percent of the lead and coal output of the globe.

"The United States possesses more than $12,000,000,000 in gold, or about half the world's monetary metal. It has two-thirds of civilization's banking resources. The purchasing power of its 130,000,000 population is greater than that of the 500,000,000 people in Europe, and much larger than that of the more than 1,000,000,000 Asiatics.

"The United States also has 95 percent of the world's bathtubs."

What we lack South America has—coffee, rubber, tropical fruits and drugs, tin.

South America is just a trifle smaller than North—7,570,000 square miles as against our 8,000,000—while it is much more underpopulated than North America; about 80,000,000 people to North America's 160,000,000 or so.

ALL COULD LIVE WELL

If the two continents could somehow pool their resources and develop an adequate system of distribution, every man, woman, and child in the Western Hemisphere could be well fed, well clothed, well housed. Or make it 98 percent of all the people in the Western Hemisphere—there are eternally a few morons, subnormals, and criminals who have to be kept away from some of civilization's benefits for civilization's and their own safety.

In the United States we have achieved this ideal for about two-thirds of the population. There remains the one-third that is ill-fed, ill-clad, ill-housed, in the President's famous phrase. But a beginning has been made toward passing around more of the good things of machine civilization to these people. The W. P. A., home relief, T. V. A., the food stamps, farm-mortgage moratoriums, Federal housing subsidies—all these New Deal measures and many others have been steps in that direction.

The New Deal may have gone too far and too erratically in some of these reforms, but the basic idea has been right. Unrestricted competition, 100 percent rugged individualism, proved themselves failures in 1929, when they brought on widespread misery and 100 percent panic.

SEVERAL BIG "IFS"

If the United States can keep pushing ahead along the general lines mapped out by the New Deal, and if its influence can help the rest of the Western Hemisphere to make essentially the same kind of progress, the Western Hemisphere should be able to become the citadel of what civilization may be left in the world. And it should become the most prosperous and the happiest large slice of territory ever to flourish in the history of the world.

The above paragraph is a pretty "iffy" paragraph. But the biggest "if" in this beautiful vision is this: That it has a chance of coming true only if the Western Hemisphere can keep out of war. If we get dragged into the latest European war, Mr. Stalin will most likely capitalize the bankruptcy of the entire world after the shooting stops.

We need endlessly to renew our resolution to keep out of the European war, and we need enough naval and air defenses to protect our hemisphere against any conceivable combination of nations bent on bringing war over here.

Hitler's Boasting to Bolster Nazi Courage Offers No Basis for Peace Except Surrender

---

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ESTES KEFAUVER

OF TENNESSEE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, October 12, 1939

EDITORIAL FROM THE CHATTANOOGA NEWS

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Chattanooga News of October 7:

[From the Chattanooga News of October 7, 1939]

HITLER'S BOASTING TO BOLSTER NAZI COURAGE OFFERS NO BASIS FOR PEACE EXCEPT SURRENDER

What is the real intent and meaning of the speech Adolf Hitler made Friday to the Nazi Reichstag? This is a question which people all over the world cannot help but ask themselves.

Hitler's speech took an hour and 20 minutes for its delivery to his hearers. The Nazis made the most elaborate preparations, that every German would have the chance to hear it. All work was suspended, stores closed, loud speakers put up everywhere through the Reich. Unquestionably the German Government felt it of the utmost importance that their people hear what Der Fuehrer had to say.

We printed the speech in full in our paper yesterday. It occupied 13 columns of closely printed type. But a reading of it leaves one in great doubt as to what was the real, fundamental purpose Herr Hitler had in making it.

The first half of the speech was devoted to a discussion of the Polish war and Poland. It is a strange picture that Hitler sought to present. He termed the "blitzkrieg" against Poland "a great victory * * * unique in history." He sought to extol the strength of the Polish Republic and therefore to parade what the German Army had done as extraordinarily remarkable.

In so doing Hitler did not compliment the Poles. The closest he came to doing so was to admit that "the Polish soldiers as individuals fought bravely on many occasions." But from this he turned to a scornful description of the Polish officers as a class. "Their officers," he said, "beginning with the command, can only be described as irresponsible, unconscientious, and inefficient." He ridiculed the defense of Warsaw, insisting that any comparison of Warsaw and the Alcazar in Spain's civil war "is entirely out of place."

Der Fuehrer cited instance after instance in which he claimed numerically inferior German forces had defeated and routed greatly superior Polish forces. He gave no hint that Germany had used four times as many men as Poland had. Why was Hitler so ungenerous, so lacking in charity, actually so despicable, in his verbal assaults upon the Poles?

A friend suggests that actually his reason was that the true German spirit is not one of confidence and strength but one of fright, that can easily turn into despair. Therefore Hitler deliberately selects the mechanism of deriding an army and a people almost destroyed in order to overcome the German fear and to inspirit a worried folk. There may be a good deal to this explanation of an attitude that otherwise is strange indeed.

In regard to Russia, Hitler put the best face he could upon the pact with Stalin. Reversing completely the things he has said for 20 years about the stupidity, brutality, treachery, and villainy of the Communist state and its leadership, he referred to "the similarity of the problems affecting the two states," Russia and Germany, wherefore "every reason for any mutually hostile attitude has disappeared." He went on to say that Germany no longer hungered for the Ukraine or the Urals, surely a generous proclamation to Stalin, who has a "red" army twice as large as Hitler's Reichswehr.

Then he indulged in veiled threats about further remaking of the map of Eastern Europe, insisting that Germany and Russia together intend to procure "tolerable conditions" in that region; that they would "establish a new order of ethnographic conditions" resettling nationals so that minorities problems in the south and east of Europe would be avoided. He recognized that this whole region was "filled with splinters of the German nationality," whose independent existence could not be maintained. Therefore "resettlement" of these minorities must be undertaken.

Turning to the western world, he indulged in considerable fawning toward the French and appeal to the British. He insisted that he had the utmost respect for France and desired to bury forever the ancient enmity between the two nations. He denied that he had ever acted against British interests, and said one of his life aims had been "to reconcile these two peoples not only through mutual understanding but through inner sympathy."

So far as Britain is concerned, all the Nazis now want is the restoration of all their colonies and adequate living room. Germany has an "elementary right to a share of the world's resources of raw materials."

He has six points, he says, that now need to be settled. They are:

(1) A new Reich frontier which corresponds to the economic and racial needs of the Nazis.

(2) "The disposition of the entire living space according to the various nationalities.

(3) "A solution and settlement of the Jewish problem."

(4) Reconstruction of the economy of Poland and all southeastern Europe.

(5) Some sort of guaranty for the Polish area.

(6) The mitigation of the effects of war.

In essence, this means that what Hitler proposes is that France and England stop fighting and turn over the control of all Europe to him—that is, so far as Stalin will permit him to control it. As a program for peace, it is about as unsuitable a statement as could have been made. Undoubtedly peace could be made on these terms. But these terms are those of complete surrender of the democracies to the dictators.

The Arms Embargo

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. MARTIN L. SWEENEY
OF OHIO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, October 12, 1939

EDITORIALS FROM THE GAELIC AMERICAN

Mr. SWEENEY. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include timely excerpts from the Gaelic American, New York newspaper, on the subject of the pending neutrality issue, as follows:

[From the Gaelic American, New York, October 7, 1939]

AN OLD SORE IS REOPENED BY CHURCHILL

Mr. Winston Churchill, First Lord of the British Admiralty, in a world-wide radio broadcast on October 1, in which he pictured England as the defender of human liberty, reopened an old American sore—the Civil War.

"All the heroism of the South," said Mr. Churchill, drawing a parallel with Nazi Germany, "could not redeem their cause from the stain of slavery."

In all fairness to the Confederates, who had the backing of England in their fight to smash the Union, Mr. Churchill should have pointed out that they inherited the slavery issue from England. Its doom was sealed when the Declaration of Independence was written, proclaiming the principle that "all men are born free and equal." With this slogan of emancipation, the Colonies went to war and broke forever the link that bound America in thrall to the British Empire.

Does Mr. Churchill hope to stir up another civil war on the arms-embargo issue?

[From the Gaelic American, New York, October 7, 1939]

LINCOLN GAVE THE ANSWER TO INVASION BUNK

In a drive to stampede Congress into repealing the arms embargo, many of the editorial writers, columnists, and correspondents associated with newspapers and interests that worked to embroil the United States in the last war are again "ringing the changes" on the danger of an American invasion by Germany. President Lincoln long since gave the right answer to this silly propaganda. Here's what the Emancipator said of it:

"Shall we expect some trans-Atlantic military giant to step the ocean and crush us at a blow? Never! All the armies of Europe, Asia, and Africa, with all the treasure of the earth (our own excepted) in their military chest, with a Bonaparte for a commander, could not by force take a drink from the Ohio or make a track on the Blue Ridge in a trial of a thousand years."

President Lincoln at Springfield, Ill., on January 27, 1837, gave that measured opinion, be it remembered, at a time when our population was less than 20,000,000.

[From the Gaelic American, New York, October 7, 1939]

A BOGEY REVAMPED

The many letters appearing in the press, and particularly in the New York papers, are to a large extent unneutral and the writers take sides covertly or openly with England and France in the present war. What a contrast with the letters with which the Congressmen are being bombarded from all parts of the United States, advocating nonparticipation in all foreign wars. It is estimated that 95 percent of the letters to Washington oppose the repeal of the arms-embargo provision of the Neutrality Act. The letters to Congress are written by average Americans, while those to the press emanate from bureaus established here by foreign governments.

As there are three well-equipped English bureaus in this city, their output is considerable, and their letters to the press are couched as if the writers were of old-time American stock. Perhaps the main headquarters of English propaganda is the British Library of Information, 270 Madison Avenue, New York, ostensibly a research bureau to which newspaper writers sometimes look for facts and figures relating to the British Empire. This office is not, however, for the convenience of those preparing copy for publication. It has other duties, and letter writing to the American papers is one of them.

In many of the letters appearing in the New York papers the writers try to alarm the credulous by emphasizing that in the event of the defeat of the two empires, the next object of attack by Germany would be the United States. This very item of the foreign propaganda was stressed during the World War. Such slogans as "If you do not fight Germany in Europe you will have to fight her in America" were kept up for 3 years. This absurdity, strange to say, was believed by the credulous and unthinking, who were convinced that it would be safer and more desirable to fight Germany in Europe. The English propagandists are again stressing this bogey that misled the gullible 22 years ago. Day after day we read in letter after letter that Hitler contemplates to invade America after he has disposed of the two democracies. Is it not plain to any person of common sense that the European powers will have their hands full to fight each other, and that no military leader or dictator would, in his wildest dreams, contemplate an invasion of America or any one of the Central or South American republics? No group of imperialists in the Old World would harbor such a wild project as the invasion of America. All the nations of the world combined, in the improbable event of such a combination, could not with any hope of success invade the United States. What did Abraham Lincoln say of a potential invasion of America? Speaking at Springfield, Ill., on January 27, 1837, he said:

"Shall we expect some trans-Atlantic military giant to step the ocean and crush us at a blow? Never! All the armies of Europe, Asia, and Africa combined, with all the treasure of the earth (our own excepted) in their military chest, with a Bonaparte for a commander, could not by force take a drink from the Ohio or make a track on the Blue Ridge in a trial of a thousand years."

When Lincoln spoke these thrilling words the population of America was less than 20,000,000. Today it is 130,000,000. The propagandists will, however, advance the argument that Lincoln lived before the age of fast ships, ocean cables, radio, airplanes, and all the modern inventions which have almost annihilated time and space. In all modern progress, however, America has kept well in the lead and the latest engine of warfare, the airplane, is an American invention. Today, as well as in Lincoln's time the Atlantic and the Pacific Oceans secure the United States from the danger of invasion.

The American who believes that one European country can invade America, and who fears that the contest would be doubtful, is unworthy of his heritage. Let him memorize Lincoln's words and imbibe the spirit of the great American who believed that all the nations combined could not conquer the United States.

Preservation of Peace and Democracy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. LEE E. GEYER
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, October 12, 1939

ARTICLE FROM THE YORK (PA.) GAZETTE AND DAILY

Mr. GEYER of California. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I insert in the RECORD an article from the Gazette and Daily of York, Pa. It is very pleasing to me to note that others are also stressing the importance of other things than the embargo alone, when it comes to the all-important problem of keeping this country out of war. Surely under the cry of national crisis, we are not going to allow this great Nation to scrap all the gains made in social legislation and create such a hysteria that we will be willing to scuttle the civil liberties guaranteed to us under the Constitution. I must confess that there are times when I am a bit alarmed when I follow the recent trends.

The article follows:

[From the York (Pa.) Gazette and Daily]

JOINT LABOR COMMITTEE RECOMMENDS GEYER PLAN

The joint labor committee, of York County, comprised of unions affiliated with the American Federation of Labor and the Congress of Industrial Organizations, last night recommended a program to keep the United States out of war and to extend democracy at home. The joint labor committee decided to recommend the program proposed by Congressman LEE E. GEYER, of California, to members of American Federation of Labor and Congress of Industrial Organizations unions and to the people of the community at large, to maintain peace and to extend democracy. The recommended program follows:

1. Take all the profits out of war.

(a) Nationalize, if possible, the munitions industry. That failing, limit the profit thereon.

(b) Curb all profiteering, particularly on food and other necessities of life.

(c) Continue the protection of labor's right to organize and bargain collectively in order that they may defend their wages and living standards against war profiteers.

2. Guard against incidents such as the sinking of the Lusitania likely to incite war fever in this country.

(a) Keep American citizens out of war danger zones.

(b) Keep American ships out of war danger zones.

(c) Prohibit the travel of American citizens on belligerent ships.

(d) Require belligerents to take title to all commodities, including food and clothing, as well as raw materials of war, such as scrap iron, oil, and cotton, before they leave American ports.

(e) Require belligerents to transport all commodities in their own ships.

(f) No credits, either public or private, to warring nations.

(g) Continue the Munitions Control Board requiring all purchases of war supplies to be licensed by the Government.

(h) Treat the finished product the same as the raw materials of which "arms, ammunition, and implements of war" are made by replacing the embargo with "title and carry" on all, thereby treating all nations alike. This is real neutrality.

3. Preserve and extend democracy at home.

(a) Protect the civil liberties (freedom of speech, press, and assembly) of all Americans in order that the desire of the American people to remain at peace may continually be voiced.

(b) Allow every group, regardless of whether they are in the minority or the majority, to continue to exercise the rights of freedom of speech, press, assembly, and worship as guaranteed under the Constitution, lest this denial become contagious and spread until the privileges be lost, as was the case in Germany.

(c) Insist on the right of a job at a decent living wage for every man able to work, and an adequate pension to those past employment age, not as charity but as a right. This will provide the economic basis of real national unity and patriotism, giving no chance for un-American doctrines to gain headway.

Problems of Law Enforcement

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOSEPH J. O'BRIEN

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, October 12, 1939

ADDRESS OF J. EDGAR HOOVER, DIRECTOR, FEDERAL BUREAU OF INVESTIGATION, BEFORE THE ANNUAL CONVENTION OF THE INTERNATIONAL ASSOCIATION OF CHIEFS OF POLICE, SAN FRANCISCO, CALIF., OCTOBER 10, 1939

Mr. O'BRIEN. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address by J. Edgar Hoover at San Francisco October 10, 1939:

There have been few times, if any, in our history when law enforcement faced a more serious ordeal than today. Not even in the turbulent World War days were there greater problems. We then battled only subversive forces and sporadic crime, not a widely flung underworld often highly organized in racketeering and destruction. There has never been a greater need for progress, development, and improvement within the ranks of law enforcement. Widespread cooperation must be marshaled if we are to meet the difficult problems that lie before us.

We have a habit in the International Association of Chiefs of Police of speaking frankly, of rolling up our sleeves at these annual meetings and talking over our problems man to man, striving always to face the truth, no matter how unpleasant that may be. In this spirit of frankness, I ask that we face the fact together that the demand for improvement must start within the ranks of law enforcement, for it will come only through our own efforts. Glaring irregularities which public apathy may have glossed over in the past will be brought into the foreground in the future. Our house must now be put in order through vigorous and concerted action, both for national defense and self-defense.

The President of the United States has instructed the Federal Bureau of Investigation to take charge of all investigative work in matters involving espionage, sabotage, subversive activities, and violations of our neutrality regulations. He has asked all law enforcing agencies to refer promptly to the F. B. I. any information obtained by them relating to such matters. I am confident that each and every law-enforcement agency in our Nation will realize its responsibility in this national emergency and will whole-heartedly respond to our President's request.

You are assured that the F. B. I. will carry on this special work in the same way in which it has functioned in other phases of its activities in recent years—in a calm, impartial, vigorous but unhysterical manner. Constitutional guaranties of American citizens must be protected. We must proceed in an orderly, lawful manner.

Just as the old-fashioned dragnet never served as a cure for crime, neither will similar "drives" be an effective inoculation against espionage. The paramount task is to secure the facts and establish the guilt of those who owe their allegiance to a foreign power before invoking the authority of the law. This is the function of duly constituted, capable, and efficient law-enforcing and investigative bodies, but, of course, we need the aid of loyal and thoroughly honest, patriotic citizens at all times.

If the internal defense of the Nation is to be preserved, there must be a coordination and centralization of responsibility such as the President of the United States signified by his recent request directed to American law enforcement. Every effort must be directed in an orderly manner by thoroughly responsible, well-trained, professional law-enforcement officers, totally devoid of hysteria. The evil spirits which would destroy America must be met and conquered. In this there can be no middle ground.

In the wave of patriotism that is rising in the country there lies the danger of overzealous groups or individuals engaging in acts which are distinctly un-American in method, no matter how patriotic in aim. We need no vigilantes in this situation. The vigilante method is distinctly contrary to American ideals of justice. The Federal Bureau of Investigation has been called upon to investigate all matters relating to espionage, sabotage, and violations of the neutrality regulations. In turn, the Federal Bureau of Investigation has requested cooperation of all law-enforcement officers in the United States.

This combined attack by Federal and State forces should be sufficient so far as investigation and prosecution are concerned. Beyond the efforts of these law-enforcement agencies there is a need, of course, for the individual cooperation of all sincere and earnest Americans. This cooperation should be limited, however, to passing on to the proper officials all questionable facts or rumors which may come one's way. An alert public is the best defense against traitorous or inimical conduct. Let us be realistic and practical, ever alert to the dangers which we know lurk in practically every community in the land, but always calm in our judgment between the real and unreal.

Therefore, I place before you as the prime requisite of progress in law enforcement the urgent current need for reconstruction, of improvement, of the weeding out of inefficiency and a spirit of grim determination to face the problem of all crime with a resolution never before known in our history. This cannot be done for us; we of law enforcement must do it for ourselves.

In proof of this I have only to point to the development of the F. B. I. Today, through the selection of proper personnel, through a Gibraltar-like stand against outside interference, through constant battling for the better things in enforcement, the Federal Bureau of Investigation, I am proud to say, has demonstrated that obstacles can be overcome. No favored friend of the underworld makes appointments to the F. B. I. No power is great enough to swerve this body from its sworn duty, nor from its tenets of fidelity, bravery, integrity. And I insist that the experiences of the F. B. I. are within the grasp of every law-enforcement organization in America. Many of you have been resolute in your determination to mold your organization upon the same principles of efficiency and decency. This of necessity requires unrelenting persistence, a spirit of self-sacrifice, and unwavering faith and courage to dig in and fight for that which is right. It requires the fearlessness emulated by the Attorney General of the United States, Hon. Frank Murphy, in his stand against corruption and his burning zeal to do something about the situation.

It is the unfortunate plight of America in this period of chaos in world affairs to become the jousting ground for the subversive forces which work against our best interests, even our national existence. That these may go beyond the ordinary espionage activities and into the realms of sabotage and the fomenting of outbreaks and riots is, of course, not beyond possibility. Such things have been tried before. They are a part of the plans of those who, like termites, bore from within. I need not tell you men of law and order that the underworld will take every advantage of the added burdens upon law-enforcing bodies. This is an inevitable certainty. Beyond that the minions of lawlessness will be used at every opportunity by those who seek to undermine our national defense.

Therefore, as a battleship's decks are cleared for action in the face of an enemy challenge, so must law enforcement be ready for any emergency, armed with the best of ideals, courage, personnel, and equipment.

The maintenance of law and order has always been one of our most important governmental functions, warranting the highest type of personnel and facilities that a community can provide. If your community has failed in its duty, it is now your solemn obligation to insist that the opportunities be provided whereby lecherous barnacles—the lazy officer, the corrupt officer, the cheating officer, or the ignorant officer—may be eliminated. Facilities long lacking must be made available if our people are to be protected. The handcuffs of corrupt politics must be struck from your wrists in order that you may be allowed to place the profession of law enforcement upon a high plane of efficiency, honesty, and integrity. Decency demands that this be done in every community in America.

To do this our profession in its entirety must be able to go before the public with clean hands. We must be able to prove, in asking that corrupt politics in law enforcement be cast aside, that we are not tainted by partisan political machinations. When we ask for cooperation and demand efficiency, let us be sure that there are no cheap jealousies or lack of cooperation to weaken our case. Unfortunately, there is not enough cooperation among the law-enforcement bodies of America. Lip service does not suffice. There is too much petty jealousy among officers. There is too much eagerness to capture the headline instead of the criminal.

You men of experience can recount instance after instance of how a lack of cooperation has brought about added expense, difficulties of apprehension, and often the escape of a desperado. The chase of practically every major criminal has presented outstanding examples of unselfish effort of law-enforcement officers, eager to lift the banners of law and order above all other aims. At this time I would be remiss if I did not publicly express the appreciation of the F. B. I. for the efforts of those officers who have aided us in the discharge of our duties. And we have been proud of the opportunities which we have had in helping you.

Since we are frankly considering the problems and difficulties of law enforcement, let us examine another evil wrecker of popular public respect. I refer to the matter of corruption. There have been instances wherein vicious criminals, even professional murderers, have been allowed to go free by persons who blemished the name of law enforcement by calling themselves peace officers. It is true that law enforcement has been stifled by crooked politics.

Truthfully, no single criminal can correctly be given the title "Public Enemy No. 1." That appellation can be claimed only by "Old Man Corrupt Politics." And he lives in practically every community in the land. No officer can truly promote law enforcement when he follows the precepts of crooked politics and himself indulges in corruption, whether it be petty graft, the acceptance of bribes for the freeing of arrested men, or for the weakening of testimony in court or engaging in acts of criminality, which has been the case all too often and is evidenced unfortunately by men in uniform having been convicted of every type of crime from petty thievery to bank robbery and rape.

It should be an inviolable rule that every law-enforcement officer in America should be fingerprinted before he is given a shield of authority, and those prints sent to the F. B. I. in Washington for search against the criminal records. Not until the International Association of Chiefs of Police goes on record as demanding this protection can it be truly said that the police departments of this country are making a determined effort to free the inner ranks of law enforcement from those destructive agents who do so much to stain its name.

It certainly should be no matter of pride to any of us when a chief of police is found to be a fugitive from justice, or when ex-convicts are discovered in the ranks of law enforcement. The time long has passed when a thief should be set to catch a thief. Thieves and all other criminals can best be brought to justice by honest men. Only men of integrity and decency can shake the complacency of the underworld.

It must be taken for granted that the average law-enforcing body is most eager for improvement. Nevertheless, the status of the majority is lowered by those retrogressive bodies which still adhere to the outmoded and disproved theory that enforcement of law truly rests in the end of a night stick. Police training is now available to practically every law-enforcement officer in America who desires it. The F. B. I. National Police Academy already has graduated over 400 officers, the majority of whom are qualified police instructors. And the doors of the academy are open to every community in the Nation. The entire facilities of the F. B. I. are at the command of American law enforcement.

Yet it is a grievous fact that there are a number of communities which absolutely refuse to take advantage of police training. In others it has been found that certain officers have been sent to the National Police Academy as a mere sham and a sop to public opinion. They have gone there, many of them, under personal sacrifice; they have given of their time and their efforts and returned to their communities only to find themselves blocked at every turn by jealousies or by an absolute aversion to advancement in police methods. Sometimes the stumbling block has been an older officer, too set in his ways to admit that there is such a thing as scientific crime detection, but all too often the obstacle has been the intrusion of corrupt politics. In case after case the graduate has been shunted from one job to another, or pigeonholed with the promise of later activity, or the excuse of insufficient funds with which to conduct the necessary schools.

Why law enforcement, in certain instances, should deliberately, and sometimes maliciously, refuse to take the channels which inevitably will lead toward a weakening in the ranks of crime is more than any intelligent advocate of law and order possibly can understand. In spite of all this, however, progress has been constant and gradual until today law enforcement is regarded as having surpassed all other public services in the advancements which it has made.

Consider for a moment the possibilities of the F. B. I. National Police Academy. The primary purpose of the F. B. I. National Police Academy is to train selected officers in order that they may return to their respective police organizations and impart the training received at Washington, D. C., to the members of their local departments. With the completion of the twelfth session of the F. B. I. National Police Academy, over 400 graduates have returned to their communities and have made instruction available to almost 100,000 police officers. In addition, officials have graduated from the academy representing the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, the Quebec Provincial Police, New Scotland Yard, London, England, and the Shanghai Municipal Police, Shanghai, China.

I am happy to report that those officers attending the next session of the academy will be housed in a modern, air-conditioned barracks building at Quantico, Va., during their 3 months of training, free of charge except for actual subsistence. In addition, we are building the most modern pistol and rifle ranges at Quantico to be found anywhere in the world, where daily the Police Academy students may receive the finest training in all practical uses of firearms and protective devices known to law enforcement. The F. B. I. training center at Quantico fulfills a dream of many years—it establishes a veritable "West Point of law enforcement."

Certainly here is the forerunner of a new day in law enforcement. Here is a tribute to the foresightedness of you outstanding officers who have cooperated so efficiently with the Bureau in this work. I am grateful to your committee on police education and training for its support of our training project and I desire to pay my respects to those officers who have attended the F. B. I. National Police Academy at great personal sacrifice. I cannot praise too highly the determination and absolute heroism of such men in continuing their studies against every possible effort to turn them from their chosen path.

Progress can come only in a lawful manner. No law-enforcement body which stoops to entrapment or illegal or unethical tactics can possibly deserve anything but contempt. The catching of a criminal is one thing, his conviction is another. No law-enforcement body can call itself properly efficient unless it is so equipped that it can follow through in court what it has begun in the field of apprehension.

It has always been my belief that peace officers should fight for the right, not only in the actual apprehension or detection or conviction of offenders, but in all matters as well. It was for this reason that I subjected myself to the sneers and jeers of sentimental piffle purveyors by decrying the scandals of parole. It has been for this reason that I have constantly abjured the average citizen to be ever alert in his own community for his own protection. An officer's sworn duty to himself should be to fight day and night, no matter what his hours of duty may be, for improvement of conditions about him. This means that passive inaction no longer can be tolerated.

The world today is in a death grapple for the preservation of democracy. It has been the record of history that dictatorships, whether in villages, states, or nations, have been founded upon gangster tactics. Our fight against dictatorships must begin at home—in every crossroads in the land. If a chief of police is hampered in his work by a venal politician then it is his duty to stand up like a man and let his community know that fact. If criminals go free because a prosecuting attorney is subject to bribe taking, then it is a solemn obligation to get the evidence and prove this man to be what he is, for after all, a crook in public office is 10 times as devastating as any crook who ever roamed the underworld. There is no stain that can soil civilization more, no viciousness more deadly, no stench more vile, than that of a criminal who masquerades as a protector of his community.

There is a great need for wide extension of crime-prevention activities. One of the most important of all law-enforcement activities is the building of a closer bond of cordiality and of understanding between the law-enforcement officer and the child. There is no greater saving in life, property, or human qualities than that which comes in the prevention of crime. The subject must be approached scientifically and realistically. There is no place in it for the sob sister or the charlatan, the faker, or the quack. Neither is there any place for the weak-kneed Casper Milquetoast who is unwilling to face the facts.

The youth problem in crime is a national disgrace. The figures compiled by the Federal Bureau of Investigation must make one stop and think. They point to a definite increase in youthful criminals. So far this year more persons 19 years of age have been arrested than of any other age. They are closely followed by the 18-year-olds. It is not pleasant to walk through any penal institution or jail in America and look into endless rows of youthful faces. Over 19 percent of all persons arrested this year have been under voting age. These individuals constitute 12 percent of all murderers arrested, 29 percent of all robbers, 46 percent of all burglars, 33 percent of all thieves, and 54 percent of all automobile thieves. We cannot dodge the issue or argue that these facts result from youthful folly. America no longer can refuse to face the causes behind this rising tide of juvenile crime. It is a definite challenge.

I have been condemned for insisting upon bringing to light many phases of youthful crime, and because I have dared to speak the truth—that crime rests at the doorstep of the American home. Some individuals believe we should keep all of this behind a curtain, but I insist that no concealed evil can be remedied. The way to cure a plague is by quarantine, by ferreting out the carriers of disease and either eradicating them or placing them where they cannot infect the populace. The same realistic approach to crime prevention must be made.

I believe the time is approaching, unless we block it, when the subject of probation will be open to as many charges of scandal as that of parole. This applies particularly to the power which certain judges have taken upon themselves, either through egotism, sentimentalism, corrupt politics, or other causes, to decide whether or not a man should serve his sentence or ever be tried. I have the case before me of a motor thief who was not even taken into court because a judge decided that the case was merely one of youthful folly. In another instance, a teacher—an instructor of youth—was found quite by accident to have a criminal record, which included embezzlement and the forgery of United States Treasury checks. Yet she had never served a day of her sentence. In another case a bank embezzler who stole Christmas and vacation savings was allowed to go free on probation after serving a 1-day sentence. Again, a bank official, who, it is estimated, stole more than $100,000, walked out of court without serving a day, having been put on probation. Such perversions of ordinary justice poison the springs of public confidence in law enforcement.

Not for a moment must we lose sight of the fact that sure detection, swift apprehension, and certain punishment are the three time-proven ingredients which provide a remedy for crime. Any weakening in this attitude places us at the mercy of the underworld. We are constantly surrounded by nitwits and porous-brained sentimentalists who, either through powder-puff perspective or actual affiliation with the criminal element, seek to undermine the foundations upon which we must stand if we are to protect the American home.

Just why certain individuals who intrude themselves upon law enforcement seem to give the major part of their attention to getting criminals out of prison instead of putting them there, where they deserve to be, is a mystery we never will be able to solve. We must fight them with every atom of strength we possess and bestow upon them the contumely they deserve as first aids to crime. There must be a rededication to not only fight crime but to prevent crime.

I have said before and I say again—America has room for only one ism—Americanism. All other isms are inimical to the best interests of our Nation. Let no smoke screen descend upon you, blinding your vision from the pitfalls that lie ahead. Let there be no misunderstanding as to the meaning of true Americanism. It is an abiding adherence to our democracy that sprang from the Declaration of Independence and is defined by the Bill of Rights and the Constitution. Loyalty to those principles is Americanism.

Its ideals are translated in a wholesome respect and obedience to the laws of the land. It is holding high the banners of law and order. Americanism represents liberty. It is respect for all nations without entangling alliances. It is free worship without bigotry. It is truth without distortion of fact. Americanism is love for our time-honored institutions. Americanism is that desire, that willingness, that determination that motivates our citizens to stand ready to defend our liberty against every subversive force, whether it come from within or without. Again, I say, our spacious land is big enough only for the one true ism—Americanism—first, last, and always.

The maintenance of law and constituted authority is our surest and safest protection against the scheming aggression of the unlawful and godless enemies of the stability of our social order. Let us keep a united front for its preservation.

An Open Letter to the Gallup Poll

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. KARL E. MUNDT

OF SOUTH DAKOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, October 11, 1939

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. Speaker, under leave extended to me I am inserting in the RECORD at this point a copy of a letter, which I yesterday sent to Dr. George Gallup, of Princeton, N. J., the manager of the American Institute of Public Opinion and the so-called Gallup Poll, which appears in a number of American newspapers.

My reason for inserting this letter in the RECORD will be obvious to all who read its contents. I have written Dr. Gallup because I am frankly disturbed by the unscientific and inaccurate conclusions reported in the publication of this poll in the Washington Post and other newspapers under date of October 11. Heretofore I have never had any reason to doubt the motives or impartiality of the Gallup poll; I do not know that I doubt them now, but it must be apparent to all who study the analysis made in the body of my letter that the findings of this particular poll reflect some gross errors of reasoning, and I am sure you all join with me in the hope that Dr. Gallup will replace the loosely worded question carried in this poll by one which will enable his interviewers to make a careful and accurate analysis of American public sentiment on what is probably the most important question ever analyzed by Dr. Gallup's organization.

A poll of the size and significance of the Gallup poll can be a great power for good or a tremendous influence for evil. If the questions are meticulously phrased, the answers honestly recorded, and the samplings generously enough taken such a poll can help legislators understand the true sentiments of their constituents. However, should such a poll ever be used for purposes of propaganda or political preferment, it could render a genuine disservice to America until such time as its corruption and bias were exposed. It is with the sincere hope that Dr. Gallup will desire to maintain his regular polls on a high plane of impartiality and fairness with which they were originally started that I have written him with these constructive criticisms and that I have offered to insert his reply in the RECORD, because I am sure that you will all join me in being gratified at his anticipated willingness to reexamine American public opinion on the arms-embargo question with an interrogatory so phrased as to accurately probe the sentiments of our constituents.

My letter to Dr. Gallup follows:

CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., October 12, 1939.

DR. GEORGE GALLUP,
Manager, the Gallup Poll, American Institute of Public Opinion, Princeton, N. J.

MY DEAR DR. GALLUP: It is because I have always defended the Gallup poll as an unbiased and scientific effort to sample public opinion without design or prejudice and because I have every confidence in your sincere desire to conduct such a sounding of public sentiment that I am writing you this letter of what I hope you will consider constructive criticism.

I have reference to the poll published in the Washington Post, and I presume other daily newspapers, of October 11. The text accompanying the statistics of this poll indicates that the same question has been asked in similar polls on at least three occasions. My purpose in writing this letter is to call to your attention and to the attention of my colleagues in the House and Senate the strange conflict existing between the statistics of these polls and the conclusions you draw therefrom in the text accompanying them. I am sure this conspicuous error in logical findings is an oversight on the part of one of your associates and not a willful effort to paint into the picture something which your question entirely and clearly fails to reveal. It is because I have this confidence in your integrity and sincerity of purpose that I am calling these fallacious findings to your attention in the belief that you will want to take steps to bring your figures and your conclusions into harmony with each other.

The question asked by your interviewers was, "Do you think Congress should change the neutrality law so that England and France or any other nations can buy war supplies here?" Your findings show a range of from 57 to 60 percent favoring such a change. I have no fault to find with these findings or this question, but when the text which you print with these statistics draws such startling, irrelevant, and disassociated deductions as the following quotations from your statement, I cannot help but call attention to such fallacies. For example, the statement, "During the past few days, after Senators BORAH and VANDENBERG had presented their case against repeal of the arms embargo and Senators CONNALLY and PITTMAN had presented the opposite case, institute interviewers were busy gathering the opinions of voters throughout the country." The implication is clear-cut to the effect that "interviewers were busy gathering the opinions of voters throughout the country" on proposed repeal of the arms embargo. But the institute's question avoids mention of the arms embargo; asks simply about selling war supplies (which could be wheat, cotton, beef, razor blades, or any other nonmilitary commodities) to England and France or "any other nations" (and the field is left all the way open and not even limited to belligerent nations). So conclusions that America wants repeal of the arms embargo cannot validly be made on the basis of such a leading question.

May I submit another example or two of how your findings do violence to the conclusions your reporter deducts from them? I quote: "Even though a majority of voters may favor selling war supplies to belligerent countries * * *." There is no basis for such a conclusion in the interrogatory quoted in your article since it says "so that England or any other nation can buy war supplies here." Opening the field to "any other nations" does not limit it, certainly, to "belligerents," and those answering your interviewers were not given a clear-cut choice.

Even a more obvious example of how the statistics and the statements of this report fight against each other is the following quoted from this article of October 11: "Among those voters who want to see the arms embargo lifted the chief reason is an economic reason" and "Those voters who think the neutrality law should remain unchanged and the arms embargo kept in force argue principally that to lift the embargo would lead the United States into war." Your interrogatory states: "Do you think Congress should change the neutrality law so that England and France or any other nations can buy war supplies here?" Nothing there about lifting the arms embargo. Nothing asked and nothing answered by which it can scientifically be concluded that any percentage of those questioned did or did not favor selling "arms, munitions, and implements of war" to "belligerent nations." The person interviewed is asked one question and his answer is interpreted to mean something entirely different.

Now, Mr. Gallup, were it not for the fact that your poll of public opinion has come to have a reputation for impartiality and accuracy, such erroneous conclusions as above cited would not be serious. However, I am sure you are most zealous to maintain the reputation of your fact-finding organization and I feel confident you will want to rectify the false conclusions above referred to and for that reason I am calling them to your attention. I personally have every confidence in your sincerity of purpose and believe you are as eager as I that no false assumptions be based upon the findings of your interviewers. While studying statistics in my postgraduate work at Columbia University, I was impressed with the ease with which unintentional errors can creep into questionnaires and how important it is that conclusions harmonize perfectly with the findings secured from specific inquiries.

I have heard your poll quoted in Congress to show "the American public favors repeal of the arms embargo" and have wondered at the sharp disparity between your findings and the mail received in practically every congressional office indicating the American public wants the arms embargo retained. An analysis of your findings and conclusions, as above briefed, clearly explains one possible reason for such a difference. Careless readers conclude, "The Gallup poll shows Americans want the embargo lifted." Actually the Gallup poll shows no such thing by the widest stretch of the imagination although the text, erroneously, does make such conclusions. The poll itself simply shows that Americans favor selling England and France or other nations (not necessarily at war) "war supplies" (which no authority limits to the arms, munitions, and implements of war which are the crux of the fight on embargo repeal). It is most unfortunate that such a glaring discrepancy occurs in such a highly respected poll on one of the most important issues ever explored by your interviewers. I hope your zest for accuracy and your desire to maintain the reliability and reputation of the Gallup poll will lead you to correct this unhappy situation.

Many Congressmen join with the writer in coveting for ourselves an accurate analysis of just what the American public does desire regarding repeal of the arms embargo. We would welcome an accurate testing of public sentiment by your interviewers to confirm or dispute the trends definitely indicated by the correspondence we are receiving. We are not proponents or opponents of any pet neutrality scheme, but we are trying to find a peace-preserving formula back of which a majority of American public opinion can and will rally. Your organization could render real assistance on this epochal measure if you will prepare a straightforward, impartial question on lifting of the arms embargo and report your findings with conclusions based on such a nonprejudicial question.

May I suggest you interview American sentiment on some such question as, "Do you think Congress should repeal the existing arms embargo in your neutrality legislation, so that nations at war could buy arms, munitions, and implements of war from the United States?" That is the question in dispute in Congress. Findings on that question would be most helpful in the present controversy. They would also make interesting comparisons with the findings you report on the altogether different question listed in your present analysis of American neutrality sentiment. Or you might ask, "Do you think cash-and-carry provisions in our American neutrality program should include shipments of arms, munitions, and implements of war to nations at war, or do you believe this country should continue to prohibit the shipment of such munitions to belligerents?" Either of the above questions asks a fair question and will provide an analysis upon which helpful conclusions can be based. And just as a sporting proposition, I'll bet you a ticket to the Army-Navy football game that the percentages reported will be surprisingly different from those received to the less clear-cut question upon which you are now drawing conclusions.

If you find it too expensive or too arduous to make a Nation-wide survey on either of the straight-to-the-shoulder questions I have suggested, may I suggest that in the interests of accuracy and fairness you at least take sample findings in several States and publish the comparisons between those findings and the ones you are currently reporting?

Finally, let me state that I presume your interviewers use several follow-up questions to the one you print in your article of October 11. However, you and I both know, as does every student of statistics, that the first question directs the line of answers which the individual gives to subsequent clarifying questions. If the first question is a "leading question" or an ambiguous one—and I believe your interrogatory is subject to both indictments—the answers to the follow-up questions are at least partially predetermined in advance. Let us, therefore, have an analysis of American opinion on the clear-cut question of where American citizens stand on the matter of selling arms, munitions, and implements of war to nations at war.

Mr. Gallup, I believe the errors in statistical fact finding to which I feel compelled to call the attention of my colleagues and you are unintentional and accidental. I absolve you of any desires to engage in propagandizing on either side of the arms-embargo issue; I have had great faith in the integrity of your Institute of Public Opinion, and I expect your reply and reaction to this letter will reestablish this confidence in your desire to keep free from permitting your Gallup poll to become an instrument for the distribution of inaccurate information. Since I am inserting this letter in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD in a desire to point out how some speakers are incorrectly concluding from your statistics that America has expressed itself through them on the arms-embargo question, I shall do you the courtesy of also inserting your reply in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, unless that procedure is objected to by you.

With every assurance of my continued belief in your integrity and my confidence that you will help to correct the erroneous impressions unintentionally created and circulated by your current statistics on the neutrality question, I am,

Cordially yours,

KARL MUNDT, M. C.,
First District, South Dakota.

The "Iroquois" Incident

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. J. FRANCIS HARTER
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, October 12, 1939

Mr. HARTER of New York. Mr. Speaker, this morning's paper carried the news that the liner Iroquois had docked safely in New York Harbor yesterday. This is a particularly interesting news item in view of the news releases disseminated last week which astounded citizens throughout the country who had been urged to keep their feet on the ground.

At that time the Nation was told that the executive department, after long discussion with members of the Cabinet, released the story that a representative of our Government was told that the Iroquois would be sunk on its present trip to New York, on which it had embarked a day or so before.

I feel that we are entitled to know what prompted this release. Did our executive department feel that in making the release public after the Iroquois sailed it was helping to keep the country from becoming inflamed against some other country or countries in this crisis? Did those persons responsible for the release feel that it would help to make the relatives of those American citizens on the boat—passengers and ship personnel alike—feel more at ease while the ship was crossing, wondering what radio program would be interrupted to announce the sinking of the Iroquois? The people of this country are keeping their feet on the ground; and I think the least their officials can do is to go about performing their duties quietly, aiding our citizens rather than causing consternation and fear. We yet wonder what country was indicated in the release as being the butt of our ill-feeling if the ship were sunk. By all means, our Nation's duty is to protect that liner in its crossing, but was the accompanying ominous innuendo broadcast to the American people and the world also necessary? Does not the release make our officials somewhat ludicrous? If the vessel should have happened to come to grief, certainly our inefficiency would have ample international advertising. Perhaps I am wrong; but if I am, many citizens who wish to see our mighty country stand out during these trying times for its intelligent, unemotional handling of its international affairs are likewise wrong. Veterans of the last war, former members of our Intelligence Service, and other citizens have personally expressed to me their indignation concerning the release. I hope those responsible will quiet our fears that this may be only the beginning of releases which may tend against quiet, reasoned, thoughtful consideration of international episodes.

Common Sense

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CLIFFORD R. HOPE
OF KANSAS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, October 12, 1939

ARTICLE BY JOHN T. FLYNN, FROM THE WASHINGTON DAILY NEWS

Mr. HOPE. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted me to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article by John T. Flynn, appearing in the Washington Daily News under date of October 11, 1939:

[From the Washington Daily News of October 11, 1939]

PLAIN ECONOMICS

(By John T. Flynn)

NEW YORK, October 11.—I listened to Maj. Gen. Smedley Butler on the radio the other night as he talked about the neutrality fight. And as I listened I could not help thinking that, of all the cheap forms of propaganda used on the American people in the last 2 years, nothing tops the attempt to make them believe that when Hitler has disposed of Britain and France he will turn his attention to our vast and alluring resources.

That particular argument has always struck me as a peculiarly contemptuous affront to the intelligence of the American people.

Butler, who spent his life in active operations as the commanding general of the marines, who has taken part in 125 military operations all over the globe, disposed of that argument pretty quickly.

He said what, it seems, every person must admit—that any country which sent a military expedition to the United States would not think of sending less than a million men. After all, a million men would not be too few to send against our rich and powerful 130,000,000 people 3,000 miles from Europe, when Italy sent half a million against the almost unarmed and barefoot people of Ethiopia.

To bring such an army would require a thousand ocean-going vessels—large ones. And they would have to be landed all at once.

But for every soldier the conqueror would have to carry immense stores, arms, ammunition. He would have to bring for an army of a million men 400,000 vehicles—tanks, trucks, cannon carriers, wagons, etc. He would have to bring gasoline to service those trucks and tanks—50,000,000 gallons for a limited period of 9 months. He would have to bring machine guns and countless shiploads of ammunition for these guns.

How many additional ships this would take one may only estimate, but not less than an additional thousand.

All these men and all this material would have to come all at once—not in installments—because it would be ridiculous for a foreign enemy to land a few thousand men on this coast thousands of miles from their base.

When the ships which landed arrived they would then have to return to bring more materials. And to do this they would have to have fuel—coal or oil. Where would they get it? Certainly we would not be at the beach to supply them with it.

And what would the American people be doing all this time? Remember, all our great harbors put together could not accommodate all at once 2,000 ships to unload their men and munitions, assuming that the enemy had possession of them, which, obviously, they would not have.

And where is the navy which would be equal to convoying such an armada across the seas? The whole thing is a preposterous tale, fit only to frighten children. Yet serious men are saying we had better go over and fight against Hitler in Europe rather than have to fight him later on our shores.

Columbus Day

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. THOMAS D'ALESANDRO, JR.

OF MARYLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, October 12, 1939

Mr. D'ALESANDRO. Mr. Speaker, in celebrating the four hundred and forty-seventh anniversary of the discovery of America there is no added honor we can pay Columbus, for he needs no eulogies, since history accords him all the praise that this great man deserves.

Columbus not only discovered America but he also planted the cross of Christianity upon it. It was the greatest contribution to civilization and progress the world has ever known.

Throughout the world the anniversary of the discovery of America should be observed and celebrated. To us, however, it means more than an historical celebration; it is a holy event. Humbly, my friends, I ask you to continue making payments to Columbus' memory for what he has done for us. We can best honor him by continuing our efforts toward good and loyal citizenship in our glorious country—America; and with the same spirit of Christian humility and decency in our hearts we have tried to live up to the standard set by him, an Italian, and the first white man who stepped on the shores of the American Continent.

Columbus was a man of pure life, a scholar, one who was persistent in his views, and, to my mind, the greatest man of all time. On this day, the anniversary of that great occasion, I call on all true and loyal Americans to stand by America and to thank God that we are in a country that guarantees us freedom of speech and press and the right to worship God according to our own dictates. Our Government wants peace—a true peace and not verbal peace.

In other countries these are troubled times, as we all know. And here in Washington the representatives of the American people are striving to protect our civilization, our freedom of speech, press, and worship. As a Member of Congress, I assure you that I will make every effort to protect our rights as Americans. We must never forget that we are first and foremost—Americans. However, let us also remember that the privileges we enjoy as Americans must be carefully guarded and not left to the mercy of those who would have us stampede each other in haste to line up behind some "ism" or another. I think I am right in saying that not only those who are gathered here but all of us, want "Americanism" first, last, and always.

Let us all honor the name and memory of Columbus, for in honoring him we also honor ourselves.

Christopher Columbus discovered America, and I hope this Congress will make this day a day of honor and respect to him by adopting my resolution making October 12 a national holiday.

P. W. A. and the Special Session

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CHARLES KRAMER

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, October 12, 1939

ARTICLE FROM THE CENTRAL CONSTRUCTOR

Mr. KRAMER. Mr. Speaker, under permission granted me to extend my remarks, I include the following article, appearing in the October 3 issue of the Central Constructor, a magazine published weekly and monthly by the central branch of the Associated General Contractors of America at Des Moines, Iowa, concerning the public-works program:

[From the Central Constructor of October 5, 1939]

P. W. A. AND THE SPECIAL SESSION

When Congress assembled at the call of the President for a special session to consider neutrality legislation, the House and Senate both convened; the Senate went to work through its committees to advance the neutrality revision bill for full-Chamber debate; and the House stayed in session long enough to vote Members their mileage allowance and promptly adjourned. Its plan, according to report, is to meet every third day and then recess again until such time as the Senate has finished with the measure at hand and sent it over for action by the lower House.

This is in keeping with the one-purpose reason for the special session. But it suggests an excellent opportunity for the Nation to get something for the money that session will cost it by utilizing the time of the House now, and that of the Senate later, while the House debates neutrality, for the enactment of legislation not entirely dissociated with the chief business of the session.

Congress should provide now, while time necessarily hangs on the hands of at least a half of it, for a continuation of the Public Works Administration.

It will be immediately argued, when this proposal is made, that this is an emergency session called for the single purpose of preparing this country for the role it must play in a war-torn world—preparing it to stay out of the war itself. But the authors of all such plans have also in mind the preparation of the United States for efficient handling of the situation which would prevail if we should, despite all our efforts, be drawn unwillingly into the war. And for that aspect of the future it is by no means unreasonable that Congress should tackle the P. W. A. issue again at this time.

The P. W. A. organization has already been reduced materially, looking toward complete abandonment of the agency, but it still has enough of a staff and a hold-over organization throughout the country to carry on a modest program.

Late last month Federal Works Administrator John M. Carmody returned to their sponsors 5,043 applications for P. W. A. projects. All were marked "No funds." These projects were estimated to represent a total of nearly $2,000,000,000 worth of construction, and approximately 60 percent were reported to have been passed upon favorably. That is, in the ordinary course of events, had P. W. A. been continued by the preceding Congress and funds appropriated for it, these projects would have been approved and built under the P. W. A. plan. Now they are out.

Many other communities in addition to those represented in the list to which projects have just been returned have taken steps toward making application for grants with which to finance needed useful public improvements. These and the communities which were too late to be included in the last previous program have been urging their Congressmen to take favorable action toward a continuation of P. W. A.

The preparations for peace—which are also preparations for war if war comes—should not ignore the potential usefulness of P. W. A. for either eventuality. If peace prevails, P. W. A. can have the same value it has had heretofore, and that value has never been denied. If war comes, P. W. A. could readily adapt itself to jurisdiction over many of the construction operations which would be launched almost instantly.

P. W. A.'s personnel, from the top down to the field organization, knows the contractors, knows sources of supply, knows local conditions, and is closely familiar with the rules and regulations which could be invoked to speed up a construction program. The absence of such a force would mean long delays and incalculable lost motion in getting a wartime program under way and completed in this country.

Iowa has 165 projects that have been awaiting funds. Many Iowa communities have splendid projects which have been financed with the aid of Public Works Administration grants. Others, with equally vital need of improvements, have failed to secure the Federal assistance which would permit them to go ahead.

Meantime, while P. W. A. languishes for lack of congressional approval of its continuation, W. P. A. goes merrily on. If the argument is made that the crisis has passed in our unemployment emergency, and that, therefore, P. W. A. is no longer a national need, that argument must apply equally to W. P. A. Yet, after a small and temporary reduction in the numbers on the "WPAyroll," we already hear that returns to the previous strength are approaching again as winter draws near.

The restriction of the work of the present special session of Congress is wise. Construction as an industry has many matters it would be glad to have dealt with by Congress at its earliest convenience, but it does not ask that this special session take them up. The industry realizes that to open the path to anything like a general session now might seriously handicap the expediting of the main work of this special session.

But P. W. A. does have an importance to the country, quite as acute for peacetime as for wartime, or vice versa. Congress should breathe new life into it now.

Neutrality

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FRANK O. HORTON

OF WYOMING

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, October 12, 1939

EDITORIAL FROM THE SATURDAY EVENING POST

Mr. HORTON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the current issue of the Saturday Evening Post:

[From the Saturday Evening Post of October 14, 1939]

PHANTASY OF A BLOODLESS SWORD

People were never so stupid as to imagine they could make themselves neutral by passing a law. All the confusion in our minds about neutrality legislation has been owing, in the first place, to the fact that neutrality was not the subject, and, secondly, to bewildering equivocations on the tongue of government. In the dimness of this confusion there has taken place, almost unawares to the people, a perilous change in this Nation's foreign policy. That is the key to any understanding of what has happened. For the record, and while we may, let us tell ourselves truthfully how we arrived at a grave crisis of thought and feeling on this one question: Shall the export of arms and munitions to nations at war be forbidden?

The first act of Congress to be called a neutrality law, imperfectly enacted in 1935, directly proceeded from an idea of the innocents—namely, the idea that munitions makers, international bankers, and profiteers were the war bringers; it was believed that if this three-headed monster could be chained down, the peace of the world would be promoted, and we should be less likely ourselves to be drawn into another European war. It was a law, therefore, to limit the rights of American citizens as neutrals. Their right to sell arms and munitions to nations at war—a right of all neutrals under international law—was absolutely annulled. The right to export raw materials and foodstuffs to nations at war was restricted in three ways: First, even such goods as these could not be carried to a belligerent in American ships; second, title to the cargo had to be transferred to the foreign buyer before it could leave an American port; third, American bankers were forbidden to buy or sell the bonds and I O U's of nations at war, which would be to provide them with credit and perhaps cause in this country another war boom, such as occurred during the first World War. This was called the cash-and-carry or the come-and-get-it-and-pay-for-it policy, to govern the export of materials and foodstuffs. The sale of arms and munitions was forbidden on any terms.

The law was strengthened by amendment in 1936 and again in 1937, with no change of idea. Everybody knew what its demerits were. It was inflexible and might sometime work as we had not wished it to work; it would work always to the advantage of the great maritime nations controlling the seas, which is to say Great Britain and France on the Atlantic side and Japan on the Pacific side; furthermore, it surrendered what we had always before been willing to fight for, namely, freedom of the seas for neutrals; and it was a drastic limitation upon all the rights of neutrals in time of war for which the American Government had contended throughout our history. Nevertheless, in the form in which it was finally enacted in 1937, the vote for it in Congress was almost unanimous, public sentiment heartily supported it, and the President signed it.

Now, the first point is that the administration did not begin to attack the law until after its foreign policy had changed.

The change was sudden. In his 1936 Chautauqua speech the President had been saying "I hate war" and "If war should break out again on another continent, let us not blink the fact that we should find in this country thousands of Americans who, seeking immediate riches—fool's gold—would attempt to break down or to evade our neutrality. * * * To resist the clamor of that greed * * * would require the unswerving support of all Americans who love peace."

How far from that to the quarantine speech in Chicago in October 1937, when he said there was no escape for us through mere "isolation and neutrality," and proposed that the peace-loving nations of the world combine and make a concerted effort to quarantine and stop the aggressors.

Never since that speech has the administration been neutral in thought, word, or deed. Continuously thereafter high members of the administration, certainly not without Mr. Roosevelt's approval, seized every occasion to incite hatred and fear of the aggressors, who were called by name, and to implant the thought that if Great Britain and France were attacked we should have to exert our power to save them in order to preserve the democratic principle in the world. Then the President himself, in his message to Congress last January, made the famous utterance that whereas words were futile, still there were many methods "short of war, but more effective than mere words" whereby aggressor nations could be brought to account.

Shortly after this it became known that the administration was demanding a revision of what it referred to as the so-called neutrality law. There was a White House conference with Members of Congress, at which the President was understood to have made their blood run cold by telling them America's first line of defense was in France. When this had leaked out and had produced a profound and premature political sensation in the world, he denied having said it. Whether he said it explicitly in that way, at that time, does not matter at all. The idea was implicit in the quarantine speech, in his message to Congress, and in many other sayings.

Then there was his farewell to the people of Warm Springs, Ga., "I'll be back in the fall, if we don't have a war," and his endorsement of an editorial that followed in the Washington Post saying that in using the collective word "we" the President meant to aline this country with the democracies of Europe, and was telling Hitler and Mussolini "that the tremendous force of the United States must be a factor in their current thinking." This endorsement of the Washington Post's interpretation of what he meant was made at a press conference, April 11, which the New York Times reported in the following words: "President Roosevelt strongly implied today that he believed the involvement of the United States in any general European war was inevitable, and that this Nation should stand shoulder to shoulder with Great Britain and France against Nazi-Fascist machinations."

And how far that was from the positive statement that he had made on February 3. "We are against entangling alliances, obviously," he said. "The foreign policy has not changed and is not going to change."

If he meant there had been no change in foreign policy since his quarantine speech, that was probably true. But this was a policy the American people did not yet comprehend and knew very little about.

Nothing was aimless. All this was leading to a certain thing. The President was resolved to get rid of the law that made it unlawful to sell arms and munitions to nations at war. In June he sent to the Capitol his own so-called neutrality law, asking that it be substituted for the one on the books. The law he proposed was amazing. It would have invested the President with almost unlimited discretion to employ the economic power and resources of this country in a foreign war, such resources not only as materials and foodstuffs but arms, munitions, and all implements of war; also credit and shipping, and then very large control of the private activities of American citizens.

The administration very well knew that the opposition, calling itself "the peace bloc" and derisively called "the isolationist bloc," would make its hardest fight against the repeal of the 4-year-old embargo on the export of arms and munitions to nations at war. Therefore, it put forward Secretary Hull, and after him others, to argue that there was really no logical difference between, on one hand, guns, bombing planes, and explosives and, on the other hand, the materials out of which the belligerents could manufacture their own war implements, or the food they ate while doing it. The humanitarian might shudder at the thought of selling the lethal instruments for profit, and that could be understood, but the difference was in logic unreal.

This argument was evasive. Consider it. To manufacture guns, planes, and explosives requires time and equipment. In war, time is vital, and every nation at war may be supposed to be running its full equipment in high gear. If we embargo arms and munitions, the nations that control the sea still have access to our raw materials, our fuel, and our surplus foodstuffs, and that is tremendous advantage, but if we lift the embargo they have access, besides, to our industrial power. Obviously the purpose of repealing the embargo on arms and munitions would be to sharpen and lengthen our weapon against Hitler. Logic had nothing to do with it. Policy was acting.

Wanting to know why the President's neutrality law did not continue the embargo on arms and munitions, the Foreign Affairs Committee of the House consulted the State Department. The words that follow are from the minority report of that committee: "When representatives of the State Department were asked whether there was any change in the international situation which should cause Congress to repeal the provision for an arms embargo at this time, our committee was told that Hitler's taking over of 27 munition plants in Austria and the Skoda works and 11 other plants in Czechoslovakia justified the change."

That was to say, because Germany had acquired additional munition plants, therefore, it was necessary to give England and France access to American munition plants. The idea is clear. The motive is comprehensible. But when did it come to be the foreign policy of the United States to mind the balance of military power in Europe? Certainly on February 3, when the President said that there was no change in our foreign policy and that there was not going to be any change, the people did not know that that was our foreign policy. The minority report of the Foreign Affairs Committee of the House added, "We are opposed to the President's policy of using the threat of our power to preserve a balance of power in Europe."

Much to the President's chagrin, his so-called neutrality law was defeated. Meanwhile the come-and-get-it feature of the old law expired in May, leaving the rest of it as it was; the export of arms and munitions to nations at war absolutely forbidden.

That was in July. The struggle between the President and Congress was dramatic. At the very end he called a conference at the White House of both those who supported him and those who opposed him; that was the conference which the Vice President is supposed to have terminated by saying, "It's no use, Cap'n. You haven't got the votes."

And what was the crucial point of that struggle? Not the embargo, really. Not whether or not the sale of arms and munitions to nations at war should be forbidden by law. That was only the fighting point. It is now a curiously twisted pattern. The idea of the so-called neutrality law completed in 1937 was to limit the rights of neutral citizens, for fear they should create circumstances and conditions tending to involve the country in war. But the passionate idea of those who last July defended that same law against the law the President was trying to put in place of it was to limit the power of an unneutral government to involve the country in another European conflict.

After his defeat, the President retired to Hyde Park, where he held a press conference, which was reported in the New York Times, July 22, as follows: "Mr. Roosevelt confirmed one of the many utterances attributed to him by those who participated in the White House conference Tuesday night. He said he told the group that he had already fired two shots for peace and wanted a chance to fire a third, should the occasion arise. Reporters were left to infer that he could not fire the third shot unless this Nation were free to ship arms and munitions to belligerents."

He wanted a bigger gun. An economic gun; a shot to be fired for peace. And yet a gun to intimidate Hitler.

Continuing the report of that Hyde Park press conference, the New York Times correspondent wrote: "Because the United States had been eliminated, for the present at least, as a factor to be reckoned with by aggressor nations, who might have hesitated in the face of potential American aid to nonaggressors, the chances of an outbreak of war had been increased, the President explained."

So said Winston Churchill, now First Lord of the British Admiralty, in the New York Herald Tribune, July 14. "It is of capital importance," he wrote, "that Hitler should not be misled into believing that the recent vote on President Roosevelt's neutrality bill represents the last word which the United States has to speak upon the fundamental issues now at stake. * * * This controversy may be a potential factor in bringing about what all American citizens most desire to prevent," namely, a European war.

So you see how it may be—and we say it sardonically—that the war which did come was our fault, on the testimony of both the President of the United States and the First Lord of the British Admiralty, because Congress at a certain moment did not give Mr. Roosevelt the economic weapon with which he would have undertaken to redress the balance of power that Hitler had upset in Europe.

When the war came the President did these things, seriatim: He proclaimed an absolute embargo on the sale of arms and munitions, as he was obliged to do under the law he had been unable to get rid of; he proclaimed a limited emergency, in order to have a freer hand all around; through the Federal Lending Administrator he announced that the Johnson Act, forbidding American credit to be loaned to America's defaulting war debtors, does not bind the lending agencies of the Federal Government, and that the Government's own Export-Import Bank and its Reconstruction Finance Corporation have plenty of unused credit to finance both the production and the sale of American commodities, in benefit of those European belligerents who happily control the sea and can, therefore, come and get them. And then, saying he believed public feeling had changed to his view, he called Congress in special session to reconsider repealing the embargo on the sale of arms and munitions.

Historically, the policy of the American Government had been to assert and defend the right of neutrals to sell arms and munitions to other nations freely, in peace and war; and there was much to be said for that policy. There is much to be said for it still. Nevertheless, deliberately, in time of peace, we departed from it. Now, with Europe in a state of war, to change our peacetime law forbidding traffic in arms and munitions, and to change it in a way to benefit one side only, is an unneutral act. Let no one be deceived to the contrary. Such an act on the part of a nation that holds the decisive economic power is one the consequences of which cannot be foreseen.

During 2 years of unneutral propaganda, the Roosevelt administration, evolving a foreign policy of its own so dangerous that the revelation of it had to be graduated to the Gallup polls, at the same time imposed the hypnotic thought that we can exert the power without ourselves becoming involved in actual war. This we believe to be a phantasy in contempt of both experience and common sense. There is no such magic weapon, all-powerful and yet bloodless.

People cannot be neutral in feeling. That is impossible. We suppose that American sympathies now lie more one way than toward any other foreign war since our history began. All the more on that account should the Government be the image of our reason. No government should know what its own sympathies are. Would that we had at this time a government steadfast in the American tradition of jealous neutrality, and willing, if necessary, to fight for that, instead of one hotly demanding the sword of this Nation's economic power to wield in Europe's war.

Enforcement of Proclaimed Guardianship Will Mean War for United States

---

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. PAUL W. SHAFER

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, October 12, 1939

Mr. SHAFER of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, during Wednesday's session of the House of Representatives the gentleman from Montana [Mr. THORKELSON] requested me to insert in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD the list of 16 British possessions located within our newly proclaimed guardianship of the Western Hemisphere and adjacent waters 300 miles or more off shore. They are Canada, Newfoundland, British Guiana, British Honduras, Grenada, Jamaica, Bermuda, Labrador, Barbados, Leeward Islands, Bahamas, St. Vincent, St. Lucia, Trinidad, Falkland Islands, Georgia Island.

During the speech by the gentleman from Montana he agreed with my statement that this proclaimed guardianship presents grave potentialities. If we attempt to enforce this guardianship, it will mean war for the United States.

Pending Neutrality Legislation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ALBEN W. BARKLEY

OF KENTUCKY

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, October 13 (legislative day of Wednesday, October 4), 1939

RADIO ADDRESS BY HON. SCOTT W. LUCAS, OF ILLINOIS

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an address delivered last evening by the junior Senator from Illinois [Mr. LUCAS] on the pending Pittman neutrality measure. The address was delivered over the Columbia Broadcasting System.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Tonight America looks at a world in which the progress of civilization in Europe and Asia has been brought to a standstill. Bombs dropping on homes and churches, torpedoes bringing swift and silent destruction to majestic vessels, machine guns riddling the bodies of men, women, and children, are lashing the passions of entire nations into a maelstrom of fear and hate. It is a hideous picture of horror and calamity for peaceful America to contemplate. However, when the Old World throws itself into tragic darkness it is the duty of Americans to remain cool and collected. The hour demands clear and honest thinking, sound argument based upon actual facts, as well as accurate and temperate speech. It is no time to ring the tocsin and use slogans and catch phrases which will unduly alarm the American people. And in these few moments I propose to discuss the question now before the Senate of the United States calmly, dispassionately, and honestly, with only one object in view—the preservation of the peace of the United States. That is paramount with the American people.

I do not underestimate the immediate and vital importance of the controversy centered around the present embargo when I say that both the advocates and opponents of a ban on the sale of arms, ammunition, and implements of war have far overemphasized the importance of this one issue. While I recognize the sincerity and the patriotism of those distinguished citizens belonging to both schools of thought, I cannot agree that action by the Congress of the United States lifting the embargo will place us on the road to war, as we have been told by men in high public office, including Members of the United States Senate.

Those words, "on the road to war," have an ominous ring. They can be repeated over and over, echoing and reechoing in our minds, until we find ourselves in a state of war hysteria. We have seen the dictators of other nations play upon the people's emotions, their patriotism, their ambitions, and their fears, until they march out on the battlefields to destroy their fellow men. If we keep our feet on the ground and our heads out of the clouds, no such thing can happen here. Yes, if the American people are left to themselves, they will go their way in enduring peace.

The hundred thousand letters, telegrams, and cards which I have received from citizens of Illinois, although expressing conflicting views on the pending neutrality legislation, are unanimous in the declaration that we must stay out of the European struggle of power politics. So long as that feeling exists, American troops will never be sent across the water to fight the battles of other countries. This Nation will only go to war if and when the American people themselves say so. They have plainly indicated that they want no part in this European holocaust.

Now, what is the important thing to do, to keep this Nation thinking in terms of peace? What was it that caused us to go to war in 1917? It was not the invasion of our shores, the threat of destruction of our Government, or sabotage of our munitions factories. It was the killing of American citizens and the destruction of American property on the high seas in unrestricted submarine warfare which caused this Nation to declare war on Germany. Today the only probable opportunity for belligerent nations to change the sentiment of the American people from peace to war is through the sinking of our ships in the Atlantic Ocean.

And with the experience of the last war before us, the Senate of the United States proposes in the legislative measure it is now considering to root out, insofar as possible, those perils of war. Under the Pittman bill American citizens cannot sail on belligerent ships. Under the Pittman bill we shall sell everything to belligerent nations, such as wheat, cotton, steel, shells, arms, etc., provided they send their ships to our ports, pay for this property in cash, and leave our shores seaward bound upon their own responsibility. In addition to that, there will be restricted zones in which our ships cannot travel. In short, what we seek to do under this mandatory cash-and-carry plan is to keep our ships out of the combat zones of the Atlantic and thereby save them and American lives from destruction. My friends, this is a splendid piece of legislation, designed wholly and solely to keep America out of foreign wars.

The importance of the cash-and-carry plan so far overshadows that of the repeal of the embargo, from the standpoint of keeping us out of war, that the question of lifting or continuing the embargo becomes relatively inconsequential by comparison. The Pittman bill negates every consideration that brought us into the last war.

In this legislation we further abandon our traditional policy of freedom of the seas; we sacrifice national pride; we take a heavy toll from American shipowners. But this loss is nothing compared with economic dislocation, the contracting of a huge war debt, and the possibility of leaving the bones of a half million American boys on foreign soil.

Certainly no one can disagree that the possibility of war with one of the belligerent powers is further removed when we take our ships carrying secondary war supplies, such as cotton, wheat, oil, steel, copper, etc., out of the danger zones of the Atlantic Ocean. Already we have witnessed Germany sending to the bottom of the North Sea two ships of Sweden and one of Finland, both bound for England carrying wood pulp. Wood pulp is a secondary war material, but in the eyes of the belligerents it is contraband, as is practically every other commodity that is exported. If neutral nations like Norway and Sweden lose their vessels, ultimately the belligerents are bound to get some of ours. If they sink enough of them, then you will hear strong and patriotic people demanding that destruction of American property and the loss of American lives be avenged. War propaganda will start in all its insidious forms, with the possibility that it might precipitate a change in the sentiment of the American people.

With that picture in front of me, my sense of duty to the American people tells me I have but one choice—that is, to cast my vote for cash and carry.

Now let me discuss for a moment the proposition to repeal the embargo on arms, ammunition, and implements of war. Long have been the hours that I have spent in study and research upon this vexatious problem. In order to reach any decision it is necessary to analyze the law and its effects. Bear with me a moment. Let us see how it works. It is not as complicated as you think.

When nations are at peace, America, under the present so-called Neutrality Act, can sell to any nation in the world arms, ammunition, and implements of war. In the last few years we have sold millions upon millions of dollars of war supplies to England, France, and Germany. This law places America in the ridiculous position of supplying planes and guns and bullets to the soldiers of warring nations, and then telling them the moment war is declared that they have fallen from grace and can have no more.

We sell the rifle to the German soldier and say, "We shall sell you all you want, but don't shoot." We lay the machine gun in the lap of the English soldier and say, "You can have all you want in peacetime, but the moment the machine gunner starts his rapid-fire motion you can have no more." We send the bombing plane to France and say, "You can have all you want in peacetimes, but the moment war is declared you can have no more." And so it is with all war materials classified under the present act. I submit that a bullet sold a moment before war is declared will kill a man just as quickly as one sold a moment after hostilities have begun.

In other words, those who object to the repeal of this law on moral grounds are starting rather late. For 5 years I have been a Member of Congress, and yet I have heard no one advocate an embargo on war supplies in peacetimes as well as war. Since this Nation in peacetimes, without the slightest protest from anyone, helped build belligerent nations up to war strength, I can see no moral justification for this Government now saying, "We can sell no more."

Another potent point in the argument for repeal can be found in the fact that we aid aggressor nations preparing for war, while the moment war starts we deny unprepared peaceful nations which are attacked the right to buy war supplies from us. Listen to this: Is there anyone in the world who does not believe that Russia is in this war? Does anyone believe China and Japan have not been fighting for the past 2 years? And yet, because there has been no declaration of war by Russia or China or Japan, we can and do, under the present Neutrality Act, sell these warring nations arms, ammunition, and implements of war. Under these circumstances how can anyone consistently justify the continuation of the embargo when such absurdities exist?

Yes; today under this strange law we can sell communistic Russia, which technically is not at war, a thousand bombing planes tomorrow, but we cannot sell Canada, our peaceful neighbor for over a hundred years, a single pound of powder because she is at war; and yet Russia, in taking a huge slice of Poland and subjugating the little Baltic republics with her army, has done almost as much to disturb the peace of Europe as any nation now formally at war.

Look to our own future. Assuming we were attacked—assuming we ran out of war supplies in our defense of home and country—is there a patriot in this land who would declare it an act of immorality for us to buy implements of war from some other nation? How would we feel toward nations refusing to sell?

My friends, when this law was passed in 1937 no one could prophesy what the future would bring forth. It was in keeping with the then existing conditions. It was passed with the knowledge that changing world conditions might nullify its effectiveness when applied to our domestic policy. So this law, honestly designed in times of peace to keep us neutral, has proved, when applied to present world conditions, to be the very essence of unneutrality.

When our domestic policy is seriously affected it is the duty of the Congress of the United States to pass or repeal any legislation which it believes will protect and sustain the general welfare. I am one of those who believe that the proper way to protect the social and economic welfare of this Nation is to change the rules, if necessary, when the war starts. No other nation does less.

In conclusion, I join with you in expressing a mighty hope that regardless of the length of the war America will stay out. What is more, I repeat that I shall vote millions for defense but not one dime to send our Army across the sea to extract chestnuts from the international fire. Let us stay out. When this holocaust of hell is finished this shattered old world will need a great nation like America to bind up the wounds and keep European civilization from collapsing into a coma. Let the world understand that in this crisis we uphold and defend our traditional policy of peace. Eternal justice and happiness for all nations can come, not by the sword, but only through counsel, conciliation, and compromise. God grant that our greatest glory in the future will not be through triumph upon the field of battle but through success in keeping America out of war.

The Postal Service

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. KENNETH McKELLAR

OF TENNESSEE

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, October 13 (legislative day of Wednesday, October 4), 1939

ADDRESS BY THE PRESIDENT TO POSTMASTERS ON OCTOBER 11, 1939

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to place in the RECORD the address delivered by the President of the United States to postmasters on October 11, 1939. It is a splendid address, and I think will be of great interest to the country.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. Postmaster General, postmasters, ladies, friends of the Postal Service, it is a privilege and a pleasure to greet you here at the White House this afternoon. You know when Jim Farley holds a convention it really is a success.

To you, and through you to all the postmasters of the country, I want to express my heartfelt appreciation of all that you and they are doing to maintain our great postal system as the efficient institution it has become under the able direction of our Postmaster General, your friend and mine. Today we may all share in the pride which by every right and token should thrill Jim Farley's kindly heart. He is doing a grand job and each one of you is contributing to it.

I am glad you are here in such goodly numbers, for you represent the Nation's biggest business. The vast extent of the enterprise of which you are a part can best be measured if we pause to sum up the work.

The collection and dispatch of letters is only one aspect of your work. Our Postal Service, be it remembered, also comprises our largest savings bank, our largest express business, our largest system for the transmission of money, as well as the largest agency available to the people for the investment of their savings in Government bonds.

The temptation would be strong, if time permitted, to examine the fascinating and romantic story of the Postal Service, not only the background of its marvelous development in our own country but its first beginnings back in the dawn of man's history.

We do not know when the postal service came into being but we do know that some 25 centuries ago Herodotus stated an ideal which is still exemplified by Jim Farley's cohorts: "Not snow, nor rain, nor heat, nor gloom of night stays these couriers from the swift completion of their appointed rounds."

It matters not what the means of transportation of the mails may be—whether the mules and camels of the Old Testament which Job said made his days "swifter than a post"—or those modern annihilators of distance, the train, the automobile, and the airplane.

The mission of the postal service was admirably stated many years ago when two famous educators collaborated in interpreting the work which you are doing. Because I think each of you will carry home a clearer conception of your duties as postmasters if you accept their interpretation, I give you the words of Charles W. Eliot and Woodrow Wilson, which you will find inscribed on the facade of our own central post office here in Washington:

One said "Messenger of sympathy and love—servant of parted friends—consoler of the lonely—bond of the scattered family—enlarger of the common life."

The other said "Carrier of news and knowledge—instrument of trade and industry—promoter of mutual acquaintance, of peace and good will among men and nations."

It is wonderful to see you all here and to have an oportunity to say hello. I hope your stay in Washington is a pleasant one and that you will carry back home bright memories of the convention which has brought you here.

American Shipping in Wartime

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOSEPH F. GUFFEY

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, October 13 (legislative day of Wednesday, October 4), 1939

ADDRESS BY W. K. JACKSON

Mr. GUFFEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an address delivered by W. K. Jackson, vice president of the United Fruit Co., before the National Foreign Trade Convention at New York City, October 11, 1939.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

There have been critical periods in the history of the American merchant marine, involving not only the maintenance of our overseas commerce but directly affecting our national defense. These crises have generally arisen as an incident to the existence of a foreign or domestic war and have not been legislative in character. No industry has ever been called upon to make greater sacrifices in the national interest. Again we stand at the crossroads. On one side the chart shows the existence in northern European waters of a war between the world's greatest armed powers, with all the dangers of air, surface, and submarine naval warfare, with torpedoes, mines, bombs, blockades, stops, searches, seizures, sinkings, prize courts, and confiscations. On the other side is the proposed neutrality bill, which, by legislative fiat, proclaims that all the ocean routes which in any way touch at the shores of the far-flung British Empire and French colonial possessions are hypothetically equally as dangerous and "verboten" to American vessels. Between Scylla and Charybdis, we face decisions of portentous importance. Shall our ships carry on as they did following the Revolutionary War and during the Napoleonic wars, as they did when they dared face the Barbary pirates, and even later during the only too recent great World War, or shall we tie up an important part of our fleet at the dock, throw the crews on the beach, put out the fires, forget our well-recognized rights as neutrals on the high seas, and await the termination of the European war?

Before answering this question it would be the part of wisdom calmly and dispassionately to analyze the nature and character of the dangers threatening our ships if they venture on the high seas. Undoubtedly the waters surrounding the combatants, such as the English Channel, the North Sea, and the Baltic Sea, are danger zones in which ships of both belligerents and neutrals may be sunk and lives lost. It is said that if the belligerents disregard our neutral rights and our ships are sunk, with the loss of American seamen, our minds will be inflamed; that we are an impulsive and emotional people, and that we could not control ourselves, and that we would throw ourselves headlong into this war which is Europe's and not ours. The neutrality bill proposes to save us from ourselves. Norway, Sweden, Denmark, Holland, Finland—in fact, all the nations of the world having a merchant marine—are sending their ships to sea, with the loss of some ships and some lives in the danger zone, but still their ships and sailors venture forth, and the peoples of these countries do not go to war. The American ship and sailor are no less intrepid. They, too, will keep open the lanes of foreign commerce with American-flag ships and keep our commerce moving and the workers of our farms and factories employed.

Are our legislators ready to go on record as saying that we Americans are less capable of self-government than any other nation in the world? It is a sad commentary on democratic institutions if we cannot trust ourselves to meet a crisis when it comes and refrain from being dragged into a war by our emotions, if the well-considered national interest counsels that we keep out. No other nation has found it necessary or desirable to propose legislation prohibiting their ships from going to belligerent ports.

Certainly there is no material gain in keeping our ships out of this trade. On the contrary, our merchant marine suffers a grievous loss, and turns over its business to foreign-flag ships. It will be very difficult to ever recover this business when the war is over. It imposes a restriction on the ownership and operation of ships under the American flag which does not bear upon any foreign-flag ships. It tends to prevent the construction of new ships in the United States and hampers the building up of our merchant marine. It produces unemployment among our seamen and water-front wage earners. It tends to still our factories and stop our plows, so that throughout the length and breadth of the land there is stagnation and unproductive idleness, with all of the resulting social disservice to humanity, because we fear to keep our foreign trade. From a material and economic standpoint the proposed law is wholly indefensible.

Nor can we gain a moral victory. There can be no question of immorality involved if our ships are engaged in transporting normal commercial cargo. Let it be clearly understood that I am not advocating or even discussing the merits or demerits of carrying arms and ammunition. In the minds of many loyal, sound-thinking Americans who are thoroughgoing students of history, there must exist grave doubts as to the wisdom of wholly restricting our American ships from entering the combat zone of European waters, or from carrying passengers and ordinary cargo to the ports of belligerents. It is freely admitted that this self-restraining prohibition constitutes an abdication by the United States of its well-recognized rights under international law.

However, we must recognize that the American people in their earnest desire to keep out of the European war have been led to believe that our ships should not enter the more or less dangerous war combat zones, but I challenge the assertion that our people believe that American ships should be restricted in their operations in non-combat zones far removed from the theater of actual hostilities. To restrict our operations in non-combat zones, to throw away our trade with the dominions and colonial possessions scattered throughout the world, is an abject surrender to an exaggerated fear, and an unreasoning betrayal of the rights of our Nation. The American people have not understood the far-reaching effects of this proposal.

It has been said that it was the illegal and inhuman killing of our seamen on the high seas which impelled us to enter the World War. This killing of our seamen took place in the combat zone or European waters, and not even during the period of unrestricted submarine warfare did German submarines sink any American vessels engaged in neutral trade in non-combat areas. Is there even any slight reason to believe that in this war Germany will extend its scope of operation to sea areas far remote from Europe, and indulge in indiscriminate sinking of neutral shipping engaged in the peaceful carriage of noncontraband goods? By what stretch of the imagination can we fear that Germany will or can afford to divert submarines and torpedoes to attacking neutral shipping and American shipping in particular—in our intra-hemisphere or north and south trade—or for that matter in the trade between our Pacific coast and Australia and New Zealand. It is said that shipping must make great sacrifices in the proposed law for the purpose of protecting the lives of our citizens and the peace of our country. Who threatens the lives of our citizens in our nearby waters—what reasonable man can think that any real threat or danger exists? Why put on gas masks in America because they wear them in London? Why abandon your house in fear of fire because houses are being burned in Warsaw as an incident to war? Why abdicate our rights to carry on our own peaceful pursuits in zones far removed from the scene of conflict? There is no real threat to the lives of our seamen in these waters. Are we to abandon our ships because somebody believes in ghost stories, or through some species of hysteria an imaginary threat has been created? There is no sound or logical reason for prohibiting our American vessels from carrying on peaceful trading in noncombat zones, and not even an emotional reason for such prohibition. The very least we can do and maintain any degree of self-respect is to assert and maintain our rights as a neutral to carry on normal peacetime trade relations with every country or colonial possession on this side of the Atlantic.

The Monroe Doctrine was a policy enunciated by President Monroe at a time when a series of wars had devastated the countries of Europe and left them at the mercy of ambitious, dictatorial governments animated by a desire for world conquest and domination. Today Europe is embroiled in a war of destruction with continental leaders taking what they want by might and force, without regard to the nationality or feelings of the smaller countries which they are gobbling up. The Monroe Doctrine is a policy designed to protect the territorial integrity of the independent nations of the Western Hemisphere. It was conceived and promulgated after one of the most destructive periods in the history of ocean-borne commerce, with the young American republics as the principal sufferers, and innocent, too, because they were not participants in the European wars then being carried on. Its tone was firm and unequivocal, and its effectiveness was backed by the universal public opinion and armed power of the Republic. Although it was not at that time acquiesced in by the European monarchies, it has been respected for more than a century.

Today the European world is again aflame, and we are confronted with the problem of commerce-destroying instrumentalities on the high seas. The ambitions of certain European rulers would be best served by destroying the commercial integrity of the Western Hemisphere. Again our national rulers must meet a situation of vast importance to our prosperity and our institutions. Once again it becomes necessary to tell a war-mad world that the normal peacetime activities of the neutral nations of the Western World are sacred from the wanton attacks of European belligerents and that our commercial integrity must be respected.

You cannot disassociate the commercial and economic life of a people from the maintenance and preservation of its political institutions. If one is threatened, so is the other. Of what value is territorial integrity if it be not accompanied by commercial and economic freedom? We should no more permit the skulking submarine to threaten and destroy our peacetime commerce than we should permit the armed forces of a European belligerent to threaten or destroy the territorial integrity of the free nations of this Western Hemisphere. The freedom of the European nations to enter our waters must be accompanied with a respect for the uninterrupted continuance of normal peacetime intercourse between the free peoples of the Americas, and by this I do not mean the carriage of contraband destined by transshipment or otherwise to European belligerents.

The recent conference at Panama unmistakably discloses a unanimity of feeling among the Western Hemisphere democracies on this subject. We are ready for an epoch-making continental declaration of policy which will be backed by all of the resources at our command. The declaration of this policy will further cement the ties that bind our peoples into a common purpose to perfect and protect our institutions—a declaration so made that it will even command the respect of European rulers. It is possible that the declaration of Panama is too ambitious, that we cannot effectively police so large a safety zone, but this much we can do. We can tell the world that normal peacetime ocean transportation by neutrals in this hemisphere shall not be attacked or destroyed. This declaration will be enough, because it is wholly within our recognized rights and is capable of enforcement. This will not lead us into the European war, any more than has the act of Belgium, Denmark, and Holland in firing at belligerent airplanes flying over their territory, or the act of Sweden in attacking German war vessels interfering with Swedish vessels in her own waters, precipitated these countries into the war. We cannot countenance an attack upon our own marine life line that runs from coast to coast through the Atlantic, the Caribbean, the Panama Canal, and the Pacific.

For centuries our ablest thinkers and statesmen have laboriously developed the principles of neutrality whereby the acts of the belligerents, and the devastation and dislocation of war could be confined within the narrowest possible limits. Neutrality is designed to restrict and restrain the belligerents and to increase and enlarge the rights of neutrals. In the broad sweeping restrictions of the proposed law we reverse all conception of neutrality, and, instead of asserting rights of freedom and noninterference, we relinquish our right to sail a large part of the high seas and disrupt and destroy our position of equality among the nations.

Our forebears did not desert the seas when war clouds hung over the world. They did not stay in port because someone might try to attack them on the high seas, and they were ready and apt at defending themselves. They were not obsessed by fear nor disdainful of their rights.

Any legislation which is based upon fear and especially fear as to what we ourselves might do, and not fear as to what somebody else may do is necessarily unsound. The only sound basis for any legislation is the broad general welfare of the whole United States over a reasonably long period of time. The advocates of this sweeping legislation say in effect that we must tie our hands, diminish or impair the effectiveness of such of our defense weapons as the merchant marine, give up our trade, create depression and unemployment, abdicate our rights for fear that we may fight or defend ourselves if we are unreasonably attacked. We will be weak and despised among nations if we adopt so spineless a policy of defeat and surrender.

The United States Postal Service—The World's Greatest Business

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. KENNETH McKELLAR

OF TENNESSEE

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, October 13 (legislative day of Wednesday, October 4), 1939

ADDRESS BY POSTMASTER GENERAL FARLEY TO NATIONAL ASSOCIATION OF POSTMASTERS

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an address delivered by Hon. James A. Farley, Postmaster General, at a dinner tendered the postmasters at the Mayflower Hotel last night. The address is full of most interesting facts concerning our postal affairs, and I urge Senators and others to read it.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

For more than 6 years I have had the honor and great privilege of serving as Postmaster General of the United States. Every passing day has given me a new picture of the Postal Service and has filled me with admiration and respect for you, the postmasters, and the postal employees who make it work so smoothly and efficiently. What appeals to me most in this great Service is not its size nor the vast amount of money it handles—it is the human side. The post office is the primary element of communication, and without communication society could not exist. You men and women who operate the mail service are not only the messengers of business and industry but you are also the messengers of all human emotions. Every inhabitant of our country, the people in the cities and those in the rural sections, wait for the coming of the mail carrier for news of their fellow countrymen, their friends, and relatives; news of the things which, after all, are the most important in life; the intimate happenings, the births, the deaths—in fact, all of the joys and sorrows of our people are made known by the use of the mails. I therefore feel a great personal pride in belonging to an organization which renders such an essential human service.

This is a business organization; and, like any other business concern, best results are obtained when there is a complete understanding between the executives and those who do the actual work. For that reason, from the very beginning of my administration I have tried to make it clear that not only your officers but you individually are always welcome here at headquarters in Washington. During the past 3 days we have been pleased to have you, the postmasters of the United States who are members of the National Association of Postmasters, visit us in the Department, and we have gained much from this personal contact. I sincerely trust that you as individuals and as an organization have profited greatly from your meeting here.

I believe in organization, because only through organization can definite results be accomplished. The independence of this country was achieved by organization, and every gain that Americans have made has been the result of organized effort of one kind or another. So long as you are guided by sound public policy you may be assured that I will be in full sympathy with your efforts.

I think the postmasters of the United States are especially fortunate as the beneficiaries of recent legislation, sponsored and approved by this administration, which provides life tenure during good behavior. You now have the opportunity to establish yourselves permanently in the business life of your community to a far greater extent than you could have done under the old order of things when appointments were made for 4-year terms and postmasters were changed with each change of administration. I think you understand, however, that this new opportunity carries with it new and greater responsibilities. The proponents of this merit system, or rather the extension of the merit system to include postmasters, had a definite purpose, and that purpose was to improve the public service. I am sure that you people who are here tonight, as well as our postmasters throughout the country, fully appreciate that it is your plain duty to demonstrate the wisdom of this law by doing your part to improve the service to the public. In thousands of cities and towns the postmasters and the postal employees are the only known representatives of the Federal Government. Therefore, aside from your official duties, you have an obligation to so conduct yourselves as to merit the confidence and respect of your fellow citizens. You should be typical Americans, gracious and honest; serving, encouraging, and helping your fellow man without respect to class, race, or creed.

The United States Post Office and its people constitute the greatest public service in existence today. In times of peace and in times of war, its ministrations are vital and essential. When a new town develops or an old town goes out of existence, we learn about it quickly in our headquarters in Washington. Any change in the development of a community, or in a section of a large city, immediately affects the character of services we must render. We are quick to sense these changes and quick to take action to enlarge or diminish our facilties. Scandal has rarely touched this splendid communication system. We are proud of its honorable record and we are grateful to our predecessors who have done a fine job. It is our definite purpose to continue its operation under sound administrative policies and to improve and safeguard it as the most universal and most essential function of government.

I have said to you on previous occasions, and to other postal groups, that this service belongs to the public, and we who are permitted to engage in its affairs should be humble and most grateful for the opportunity it offers us to serve. We must keep before us always the thought that the public is to be considered first and that we as individuals are of secondary importance. The public has a right to expect and receive faithful performance of the many and difficult duties carried on in a modern postal system. Moreover, our patrons expect and should receive careful and courteous attention at all times. Many fine things have been said and written about the Postal Service, about its romance and the courage displayed by those who see to it that the mail goes through under conditions which many times have been most hazardous. That is all very fine, and I heartily approve and concur in these commendations. I feel, however, that those of us who are alive and do the job now should concern ourselves especially with the matter-of-fact, everyday business problems of our work. The objectives of the Postal Service can be summed up in three words—certainty, celerity, courtesy.

We have a dual responsibility to the public. We have not only the patrons and customers to consider but also the taxpayers, who provide the money for the operation of the entire Government. In this connection, may I talk to you quite frankly about the need for economy. I want no misunderstanding about what I say on this subject. There is to be no curtailment of service. But I especially urge all postmasters and the entire personnel of the Postal Service to cooperate in maintaining the best possible service without increasing our present rate of expenditures. A short time ago the President found it necessary to advise the heads of all executive departments and agencies of the Government that no deficiencies should be incurred and that all should operate within the appropriations granted by Congress. It is your job and my job to carry out the wishes of the President, and he knows that he can depend upon our good will and complete cooperation in this respect.

Since 1933 our services and facilities have been expanded and improved, necessitating the outlay of many millions of dollars. I fully appreciate that not only the mail volume but the financial transactions of the Department have been increasing steadily as the business of the Nation has improved. We have added additional personnel until now we have on our rolls the greatest number of employees in the history of the service. In this we have made our contribution to the relief of unemployment. We have added new buildings, hundreds of them; new equipment has been purchased, and every known device, the efficiency of which has been proven, has been adopted. Transportation facilities have been improved and we have taken advantage of those facilities.

All along the line our expenditures have been increased to meet the modern requirements of revitalized American business and commerce. We have spent the money wisely and have weighed each step carefully, assuring ourselves before making expenditures that our action was entirely in the public interest. I have no idea that the business development which has been going on will stop. On the contrary, I am definitely of the opinion that no man nor woman here tonight, nor any citizen who may hear what I am saying, can visualize the further developments and progress of this Nation, its Postal Service, and its transportation systems, that will occur within the next few years.

There is one thing I do know, that we are now operating the finest postal system in the world, and I am reasonably sure that we have an organization in both personnel and equipment that should be able under careful and painstaking direction to absorb a greater volume of business without materially increasing our expenses. I am therefore going to ask each postmaster here tonight, and each and every postal employee throughout the Nation, to cooperate with the Department in making full use of what we now have to work with before considering increases in the number now employed. Likewise, let us be sure of our ground before suggesting additional expenditures for equipment and supplies over and above the prevailing rates.

I urge all postmasters to continue their advertising campaigns, of the air mail for example, for I feel that we have many citizens who do not fully appreciate and understand the opportunities offered by this amazingly fast feature of the Postal Service. I am quite sure that we can handle an increased volume in circulars and advertising matter of all kinds and make revenue gains without commensurate increases on the expenditure side of our ledger.

You will probably regard this as a sales talk, and that is exactly what I intend it to be. Sales talks and sales campaigns are necessary to the life of any business organization, and they are, therefore, necessary to the life and success of this great public utility.

Postmasters and postal employees should consider it their duty to call to the attention of their neighbors, particularly business people, the advantages to be gained by a greater use of the Postal Service. This can be done without interference or competition with private business. In the handling of letters we enjoy a monopoly. We provide other facilities also that cannot be offered or maintained by private enterprise. The objective in our campaigns for the greater use of postal facilities is to convince businessmen, and private citizens as well, how they can improve and increase their own profits by a more generous patronage of this establishment.

We have been getting along all right. I am happy to say to you that in five of the six full years of operation under this administration we have conducted that part of the Postal Service which is rendered to the public for hire not only within the revenues but also with a profit.

During the fiscal year ended June 30, 1939, the revenues were approximately $744,000,000, or $17,000,000 more than the revenues for the fiscal year 1938. We have just finished the first quarter of the fiscal year 1940, and the income reports show that we are still on an upward trend, being several million dollars ahead of the same 3 months ending September 30 than last year. This indicates that there will be a net operating surplus for the fiscal year 1940.

I am glad that this result has been achieved during my service with the Post Office Department, and I am happy to have the opportunity to acknowledge publicly my deep appreciation to the people in the Postal Service, the departmental staff, the postmasters, in fact all postal employees. It is you who have accomplished this, for it is you who handle directly the affairs of the Post Office. We adopt policies here in Washington for your guidance, and in the broader sense we manage the affairs of the Service, but no matter how lofty our ideals may be, our efforts would be futile without your wholehearted cooperation.

The revenues which I have just stated for the fiscal year 1939 were the greatest in the history of the Service. There is no other postal establishment in the world that in volume or income approaches the Postal Service of the United States. In fact, we have several States of the Union in which the postal income exceeds that of some foreign countries.

This Department, with the help of the Army Air Corps, initiated the air transport system, fostered and developed it until private capital was attracted. We then turned it over to private enterprise, which has now improved and extended this new transportation system so that the United States air transport lines travel more miles, carry more passengers, more mail, and more air express than all of the air transport systems in the rest of the world combined. We are deeply interested in aviation and shall, I hope, continue to be its best customer.

Railroad transportation has improved and is continuing to improve. The Post Office Department is likewise a good customer of the railroads. Our payments to the railroad companies of America during the last fiscal year exceeded $98,000,000.

We operate the greatest bank in America—the Postal Saving System—having 8,000 branches with more than 2,700,000 depositors, and with balances to their credit of more than $2,162,000,000.

In the registered mails we transport the bulk of the money of the Nation.

We handle more than 700,000,000 parcels annually.

The Department contracts for the operation of more than 11,000 star routes.

On June 30 there were 32,800 rural routes in operation.

The Department owns and operates more than 8,800 automobile trucks in 1,400 cities.

The Department maintains 2,844 postal units in Government buildings and works with the Treasury Department in the planning and construction of new buildings.

We have our own real-estate organization for the procurement of quarters for post offices not located in Government-owned buildings. There are 13,492 buildings under lease, contract, or allowance.

The Post Office Department has a splendid investigating agency—the Inspection Service—which investigates all postal violations and keeps the Department constantly advised of service conditions.

On June 30 there were 44,400 post offices, employing 206,242 people under the supervision of the postmasters.

It is you and the employees who serve directly under you upon whom the Department depends, and the public depends, for the continuous and orderly movement of the mails. It is a great pleasure to have had you with us for the Thirty-ninth Annual Convention of the National Association of Postmasters. I am told this is the largest convention in the history of your organization, there being more than 4,000 postmasters and guests registered and in attendance at this meeting. I know that you have enjoyed the fullest the unusual opportunities offered by your meeting here, particularly the personal greetings of the President of the United States.

And may I avail myself of the facilities of this broadcast to extend my greetings and your greetings to each of our postmasters who were unable to come to Washington for this convention. I am sorry that they could not be with us, but I do want them to know that we are all thinking of them and that they have our sincere good wishes. And I request you and all the postmasters who may be listening in throughout the country to convey to our employees in each office my personal greetings and grateful appreciation for their splendid cooperation.

I congratulate the officers of your National organization and of your State organizations, and commend each and every one of you for your activities in maintaining this fine association. We are glad you came. I hope that you thoroughly enjoyed your visit and wish you Godspeed on your journey home.

I want to thank you for the honor bestowed upon me in having me as your guest at this dinner, which is attended by more than 3,400 people, the largest dinner ever served in a Washington hotel. Here again the postal people have established a new record.

Congratulations to each and every one of you on this splendid event, and again, many, many thanks.

Roosevelt on Foreign Affairs

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LISTER HILL

OF ALABAMA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, October 13 (legislative day of Wednesday, October 4), 1939

ARTICLES BY HARLAN MILLER

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD two articles by Harlan Miller entitled "Roosevelt on Foreign Affairs." The first was published in the Washington Post of October 12, 1939, and the second in the Washington Post of today.

There being no objection, the articles were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Washington Post of October 12, 1939]

OVER THE COFFEE

(By Harlan Miller)

ROOSEVELT ON FOREIGN AFFAIRS, I—PRELUDE TO DIPLOMACY

(Editor's note: So far no one has appraised President Roosevelt's background and training for skill at foreign affairs. How extensive is his knowledge? How well equipped is he to protect American interests—whether as sponsor of our neutrality or as peacemaker? In two columns this background is briefly summarized.)

Franklin Roosevelt has made 13 trips to Europe, man and boy. His first voyage came in 1885, at the age of 3, when he began to learn French and German. The last was the year before he was elected President.

His visits overseas averaged 10 weeks, and he has spent in all about 32½ months in Europe.

His father and mother went abroad almost every year, and his mother made two long visits to China, when she was 8 and again at the age of 22.

At the Roosevelt dinner table, even when the President was a small boy in the eighties and early nineties, conversation about foreign affairs was as customary as conversation about the movies at the average American dinner table today.

His first visit in Washington occurred when he was 5 years old. At that age he became acquainted with William Whitney, who was Secretary of the Navy, and John Hay, who was later Secretary of State.

He also met President Cleveland, who wanted to appoint his father Minister to Holland. (It was on this visit that Cleveland said he hoped the little boy would be spared the burdens of the Presidency.)

From his ninth to his fourteenth year he spent every summer in Europe, with his parents. While his father stopped at the health resort at Nauheim, Germany, Franklin Roosevelt spent 2 summers at the German schools there and 2 summers cycling through Germany and adjoining countries.

On one of these cycling jaunts Franklin and his companion unwittingly violated a German regulation or two, and he still remembers affectionately the German colonel who rebuked him and then gave him some cookies and milk.

Roosevelt learned his Europe at first hand, from Norway to Italy and from Ireland to Austria.

On another occasion, when he was 19, he visited Kaiser Wilhelm's yacht in the harbor at Molde. Family legend has it that a souvenir of that visit, a lead pencil used by the Kaiser, is still preserved at Hyde Park, with the Kaiser's teeth marks still intact on it.

Roosevelt's father subscribed to several European periodicals, which came to the house at Hyde Park. Before he was 10 he was reading the London Spectator, the Revue des Deux Monds in French, and the Welt Rundschau in German, and he still reads foreign periodicals regularly. He has a complete file of Punch from 1841 to 1939.

All told, on his various journeys Franklin Roosevelt has visited 29 foreign countries, and ever since he was a boy he has met and talked with the men who run those countries. He began to collect stamps before he was 10. Today he can draw an accurate map from memory of every continent and nearly every country.

So his education in world affairs began early, and has continued until this day, when every hour of every day a sheaf of dispatches and reports is brought to his desk from the State Department across the street.

No other American President has had a preparation so broad and so deep for the handling of America's foreign relations. Only Herbert Hoover among them approaches him in familiarity with foreign countries, and Hoover's foreign experiences did not begin until he was a grown man and married and preoccupied with mining.

Mere travel does not make a man an expert on foreign affairs. Roosevelt studied international law under John Bassett Moore, and he has known and talked with almost every eminent statesman of his time. Even Roosevelt's severest critics concede that he knows a thing or two about what goes on across the oceans.

[From the Washington Post of October 13, 1939]

OVER THE COFFEE

(By Harlan Miller)

ROOSEVELT ON FOREIGN AFFAIRS, II—13 VOYAGES, 29 LANDS

How deep and authentic is President Roosevelt's knowledge of foreign affairs?

The President has spent more time in Washington than a three-term Senator. Probably more time than a four-term Senator. Half of this time he was Assistant Secretary of the Navy.

As every Senator knows, the front porch and front lawn of the Navy is foreign affairs.

From 1913 to 1920 the Franklin Roosevelts belonged to the "young married" crowd of the Capital's official circle. Roosevelt became intimately acquainted with the young secretaries of the embassies and legations as well as with the ambassadors and ministers; with the counselors, chargé d'affaires, naval and military attachés of the 50 governments accredited here.

Now these young men have grown older; they are ministers or ambassadors themselves, or high in their own governments at home;

Roosevelt still knows them. He can exchange phone calls and letters with them with an informality no other President has enjoyed. He has private sources of information which must be almost as good as BORAH'S. And Roosevelt knows these diplomats so well that they can't spoof him.

At Harvard he majored in history, and in his last year at Columbia he majored in international law. He read Admiral Mahan's Influence of Sea Power when he was 11, and has reread it occasionally; at 14 he was debating on Philippine independence and the increase of our Navy.

There were Delanos and Roosevelts all over the world when he was a boy. Their letters were read and discussed at the Hyde Park breakfast table, and when they came for visits the whole world was spread out in the living room like a map; the names and the scenes in his stamp collection came alive.

This background was there when his 13 trips to Europe began, his visits to 29 foreign countries. Before he left college he could speak and read French and German fluently, and he had a fair reading knowledge of Spanish and Italian.

He can understand Hitler's radio speeches in the original.

To augment the hourly dispatch bags from Cordell Hull at the State Department he subscribes to a special clipping service on foreign affairs. At the end of each year he goes through a synopsis of the world developments in international relations. He reads a review of every book published on foreign affairs and reads many of them in toto.

Since he entered the White House, there has been a steady parade of rulers and statesmen through its doors, from Hjalmar Schacht, of Germany, in 1933, to King George this year.

But even before that he had known and talked with Clemenceau, Lloyd George, Poincare, Orlando, Nitti, Balfour, King Albert, and a score of others of the world's great ones.

Thus he has always had a rare chance to know what the score was.

He was in Paris during the 1919 peace conference, and while he took no official part in that clinic on world affairs, he met and talked with everyone and saw what was happening behind the curtains. He brought Woodrow Wilson back from his first jaunt to Paris.

It was an interneship in world affairs that helps him as a diagnostician today.

No other American President has ever entered the White House with such an intimate knowledge of world politics and international stresses and strains. An examination of his record and background makes it seem that any President, whether Cordell Hull or Vandenberg or McNutt or Tom Dewey would be fortunate to have so seasoned a Secretary of State as Franklin Delano Roosevelt.

Preparedness

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. KENNETH McKELLAR

OF TENNESSEE

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, October 13 (legislative day of Wednesday, October 4), 1939

ARTICLE BY JAMES G. STAHLMAN

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD a newspaper article on the subject of preparedness. The article is from the Nashville Banner of October 6, 1939. It is a column that is conducted daily by James G. Stahlman, president and publisher of the Nashville Banner, published at Nashville, Tenn.

Mr. Stahlman served as a private in the United States Army during the World War and is now an officer in the United States Naval Reserve. Mr. Stahlman stands high as a newspaperman, since he served two terms as president of the American Newspaper Publishers' Association, after having served for the same period as president of the Southern Newspaper Publishers' Association. He is an ardent advocate of the neutrality legislation now before the Senate and desired by the President. In this column he makes a strong plea for ample national defense and tells the reason why.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

FROM THE SHOULDER

(By James G. Stahlman)

Nashville gets the South's first airplane factory.
That's good.
But that isn't all.
There'll be lots of collateral development.
That will be still better.
Vanderbilt gets a student air training course under the C. A. A.
That's also good.
What does all that mean, anyhow?
Plenty.
In the first place, the coming of that plane factory adjacent to Nashville's municipal airport means that Nashville definitely steps out as the air center of the South.
We have the best airport that I've landed on anywhere, with the exception of LeBourget at Paris.
We have everything here that it takes to foster air interests.
We have made the start.
The end, no one can foretell.
The possibilities in the situation are almost incomprehensible.
Now all of this fits into what is being planned and what this country should push.
That's the biggest air force in the world.
That's what we need.
That's what we should have without delay.
I heard Eddie Rickenbacker talk the other night.
He knows what airplanes mean in time of war.
He knows better than any man in this country.
He ought to.
He's as practical about the whole matter as any man I know.
He says America should have not less than 50,000 airplanes.
Not less than 25,000 pilots.
He's just as right as that a dollar is worth only 59 cents.
We should have now, 50,000 planes.
We should have now, 25,000 pilots.
This country needs thousands more antiaircraft guns.
It needs thousands more coast-defense guns.
It needs a navy twice the size of the present one.
A fleet in the Pacific.
A fleet in the Atlantic.
It needs an army of not less than 500,000 men.
It could stand one of 1,000,000 men.
It needs to make Hawaii impregnable.
That's basic from the Pacific angle.
Anybody will tell you that.
It needs to make the Panama Canal impregnable.
It must be completely protected.
That's basic, too.
With that sort of set-up, I'd be willing to invite Hitler and the rest of the boys over for tea.
I'll guarantee they wouldn't land with any guns on their hips.
And I'd guarantee they wouldn't land at all, unless we hung the latch-string on the outside.
No, sir.
When you've got the stuff to take care of yourself, the bad boys stay in their own backyard.
That's human nature.
That's common sense.
There's a lot in that "discretion the better part of valor" stuff.
Especially when you're looking down the business end of 16-inch guns.
With two fleets—say, I don't imagine American shipping would be swept from the seven, eight, or nine seas.
With the coastal line of the United States bristling with heavy guns, anti-aircraft guns, aircraft bases, and a couple of cap pistols for good measure—
I'm asking you, who'd be fool enough to try to push us over?
Not even Hitler.
And he's crazy in many particulars.
But he isn't that kind of crazy.
Neither are the rest of the lads who rattle the sabers now and then.
We'd better make up our minds that, so long as there are crazy people in this world, we had better be smart.
And if we're real smart, we'll get a healthy supply of those things that crazy people respect most.
I'd rather spend billions on defense than billions on the dole.
We'd solve half our unemployment problem in a plan like this.
We'd put millions of people to work in gainful occupations.
We'd make our money represent something besides idling shovels and shuffling rakes.
We'd make factories hum.
We'd make business better.
"Oh, but that's materialistic," yelp the idealists.
Yep, that's materialistic, all right.
But it's also horse sense.
"Yes; but that's arming ourselves to the teeth," cry the scared cats and the professional pacifists.
So it is.
But let's arm to the teeth.
To the hip.
To the toe.
To the fingertip.
Let's make it certain that nobody's going to come snooping around over here with bombers, tanks, and gas.
Let's make America the safest place on the face of the earth.
It can't be done with BB's and popguns.
It can and should be done the way I've outlined.
Even more so.
I'd rather fortify Hawaii than rebuild Fort Negley.
We spent several hundred thousand on the latter.
Let's spend several hundred million on the former.

And then let's spend what it will take to make and keep this country free from any and every threat--
It will cost far less than getting into any man's war.
And don't fool yourselves about that!

Bureau-Made Criminal Law

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. USHER L. BURDICK
OF NORTH DAKOTA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, October 13, 1939

Mr. BURDICK. Mr. Speaker, the Washington Daily News carries a story in its issue of Thursday, October 12, 1939, as follows:

WHAT THY LEFT HAND DOETH—IT IS NIGH IMPOSSIBLE FOR A CONGRESSMAN TO KEEP UP WITH ALL THE THINGS CONGRESS DOES

If any correspondence school is offering a compact law course that can be digested in 60 days, it probably could find a customer in Grocer William V. Miller, of Cheltenham, in adjoining Prince Georges County.

Tried in Baltimore Federal Court yesterday on 20 charges of failure to report customers' purchases of sugar in quantities of 100 pounds or more, Mr. Miller told Judge William C. Coleman that he had taken the advice of Representative USHER L. BURDICK (Republican, North Dakota) that there was no Federal law requiring such reports.

Representative BURDICK, a former Assistant United States Attorney, and a former speaker of the North Dakota Legislature, took the stand.

"I voted for this bill but I did not think it had become law," he said. "The regulations as laid down by the Federal Treasury change so often you can't keep up with them. Why, the statute book of the United States is bigger than a mail-order catalog.

"Furthermore, the reference library of Congress confirmed my opinion—erroneously, it would seem—that it was no violation of the law to sell 100 pounds of sugar for a legitimate purpose (not for manufacture of illicit liquor) without reporting the purchase to Government agents."

The jury was out 5 minutes. Grocer Miller got 2 months.

Generally I have no fault to find with a newspaper reporter, even though I am misquoted, in case the misquotation is not purposely made. In reading this whole article, its general purport is true, although some of the facts are not. In the Miller case tried before the Federal district court at Baltimore, Mr. Miller testified that he asked me as a lawyer if there was any act of Congress making it a criminal offense to sell for legitimate purposes a hundred pounds of sugar without making a report to the Treasury Department of such sale. I stated to him I did not believe there was any act of Congress relating to the sale of 100 pounds of sugar, and a report thereon, but that the statute on that subject passed in 1934 authorized the Secretary of the Treasury to make such rules and regulations as they thought proper within the limits of the statute.

I advised Mr. Miller accordingly and asked him several times if any regulation had been served upon him or brought to his attention. He stated then and on the witness stand that he had never received any copy of a regulation nor was any read to him by any official. At the trial Government agents swore they talked with Mr. Miller generally about the regulations and left a copy with his clerk. There was a square conflict in the evidence as to whether Miller ever had notice of the regulations.

I did not state on the witness stand that I have voted for the 1934 statute as reported, but clearly testified that I was not a Member of Congress until January 3, 1935, but while this statement of the newspaper reporter is not a true statement of what I said, I believe that it is immaterial to what I want to say now. The point I wish to make is this: In the Miller case he was convicted of the violation of a regulation of the Treasury Department, authorized by an act of Congress.

The judge charged the jury that it made no difference to whom he sold the sugar; that the crime of violating this regulation was complete when Miller failed to report the sale. The newspapers seem to delight in saying that Miller was convicted because he was advised by a Congressman. I did not advise him as a Congressman, but as a lawyer, and gave him the only advice any lawyer could give, namely, that there was no act of Congress making the sale of 100 pounds of sugar, when not reported to the Government, a crime, but that if there was a regulation on the subject, it would be served upon him. That is the advice I gave him. Mr. Miller said he never received notice of the regulation, but the judge instructed the jury that the notice was served as a matter of law. Under those instructions there was nothing for the jury to do but bring in a verdict of guilty. I appreciate a comical story when I see one and I think the way this Miller story was written up by the newspaper correspondent was a comic. It was not very comical to Miller, however, who will have to serve 60 days for having sold 100 pounds of sugar to his neighbors for perfectly legitimate purposes.

As stated, I did not vote for this act of 1934 because, for one thing, I was not a Member of Congress until 1935. I will state now that as long as I remain in Congress I will never vote for an act which will empower the Treasury Department or some other bureau to write up and promulgate any further criminal laws of the country. There is no doubt but that Congress is to blame for this un-American system of lawmaking. Congress passes an act and provides in it that the "department" can finish the job by making any regulation they see fit not inconsistent with this "shotgun" act.

The next point is, How is a businessman to know what the law is and how is any lawyer able to find the law? We used to look in the statute books to find the law, but not so now. Under this system of bureau-making law, we have a new set of books to consult. We have the Federal Register, which is published daily at the city of Washington and contains several pages of "rules, regulations, and orders" from some bureau, all purporting to be the law. These regulations are changed whenever the bureau thinks it advisable, and the revised regulation is again published. At the end of 6 months, we have a bundle of publications several feet high in any one of which may appear a regulation which it is a crime to fail to comply with.

If this bureau system of making laws—civil as well as criminal—is not a step toward dictatorship, then I know of nothing that could resemble dictatorship more. Businessmen simply cannot tell for 24 hours what they must do to comply with the regulations made by some bureau. Many have charged that the President wanted to be a dictator, but you can see now who is making a dictatorship possible; it is not the President, but Congress. When Congress will deliberately authorize a bureau to create law—criminal law—it is a direct authorization of dictatorship.

Effect of Section 2 (A) of the Proposed Neutrality Law on Pacific Coast States

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HOMER D. ANGELL
OF OREGON
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, October 13, 1939

STATEMENT OF A CONFERENCE OF WESTERN INTERESTS

Mr. ANGELL. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following statement:

The following statement of fact concerning the effect of section 2 (A) of the proposed neutrality law on Pacific Coast States was developed at a conference of western interests held in San Francisco on Tuesday, October 3, 1939. The conference was represented by all large Pacific coast port cities from Seattle to San Diego:

1. The enactment of section 2 (A) of the proposed Neutrality Act would seriously affect between 75 and 100 American-flag ships based on the Pacific coast of the United States, which trade with belligerents, or potential belligerents, in the Pacific Ocean area.

2. Those ships which are now engaged in trade with belligerents, namely, to Canada, Australia, New Zealand, Hong Kong, Straits Settlements, Burma, Ceylon, and India, will have to suspend immediately upon enactment of the law, while the remainder which serve China, Japan, and Vladivostok, will suspend if and when a state of war involving the countries named is found to exist.

3. The ships affected include the great liner service of the Matson Navigation Co., to Australia and New Zealand, which would become illegal upon enactment of the law, the old-established services of the American President Lines, to Oriental and Indian Ocean ports; the American tanker services of the various oil companies operating from California to all points in the Pacific Ocean; the American-flag tramp services out of Pacific coast ports, which are available to provide tonnage not otherwise obtainable during peak movements; the newly created steamship services operating from the Pacific Northwest to Orient ports; and the services touching upon Canadian ports from Alaska or other American mainland ports.

4. The enactment of section 2 (A) also would tend to destroy whatever possibility there may be for the much-needed expansion of American-flag services on the Pacific Ocean in accordance with the Maritime Commission's new construction program, a goal which the Pacific coast has long sought to achieve and which is now within reach. The benefits to national defense from such expansion are self-evident.

5. The effect of the total or partial withdrawal of American-flag tonnage from these vital trade routes would be to place American commerce in these routes completely at the mercy of foreign-flag services. Experience in the last war and developments that have already occurred in the present war indicate that a large amount of foreign tonnage also will be withdrawn from the Pacific Ocean area in favor of more lucrative routes in the Atlantic area. Such experience also indicates that when absolute reliance must be placed on foreign tonnage, freight rates increase to prohibitive levels.

6. The developments above described would have most serious, if not catastrophic, effect upon all elements of the west coast's economic structure, including not only steamship companies, but also agriculture, labor, industry, railroads, and business generally, all of which are dependent in one way or another upon the maintenance of trans-Pacific Ocean trade.

7. A suspension of even a small part of the American-flag services would throw out of work thousands of Americans now employed, both on the ships as seamen, stewards, officers, etc., and on shore as longshoremen and office administrative employees. The pay roll of the west-coast States bordering on the Pacific would be cut by millions of dollars per annum in such an event. In addition, the substantial purchases by these companies, which aggregate more millions of dollars per annum, for food, ships' stores, and supplies and fuel, would also be terminated; with a resulting large loss to west coast business and labor depending upon such transactions.

8. The large and widespread agricultural interests of the west coast would suffer enormously, first, because facilities for transporting their products to countries bordering on the Pacific would be woefully inadequate; and, second, because the freight rates imposed by such limited facilities as may be available would be so high as to reach nearly prohibitive levels, thereby depressing value of agricultural products.

This condition would affect all important agricultural products, including citrus and deciduous fruits, wheat and flour, canned and dried fruits, vegetables, etc. This would aggravate the presently unsatisfactory situation in respect to farm economics and would tend to further curtail the earnings of agriculture and labor.

9. Industry, not only on the west coast, but also in the great manufacturing centers of the Midwest, would lose its normal peacetime export markets which absorb millions of dollars of manufactured goods annually. These markets would be lost on account of inadequacy of transportation facilities and excessive freight rates previously referred to. The result upon the economic structure of the Nation is certain to be adverse.

Equally important would be the serious effects upon import movement following the curtailment of the necessary supplies of raw materials, including tin, rubber, jute, ores, chemicals, and other items, that are not available in the United States, and are absolutely indispensable to the American industrial system. These items are now being imported principally from belligerents, or potential belligerents, in the Pacific area.

It would appear that it is extremely hazardous to rely upon foreign-flag tonnage for these vital materials. This would affect not only the operation of industry from the business point of view, but also the adequacy of our industrial system with regard to the national defense.

10. The great lumber industry of the Pacific Northwest, which has sustained serious economic reverses in the past several years, would be further penalized and demoralized by the enactment of this section 2 (A).

11. The American railroads, trucking companies, inland waterway carriers, and other agencies which feed cargo to merchant ships at Pacific coast ports would suffer considerably, both from the curtailment of the movement and the diversion of cargo to Vancouver or other Canadian ports via Canadian railroads.

12. All Pacific coast ports would suffer a substantial curtailment of revenue necessary for the maintenance and operation of harbor facilities which have been constructed at considerable public expense in contemplation of the uninterrupted flow of peacetime commerce.

13. The operation of American-flag ships in the Pacific Ocean is relatively safe under present-day conditions and presents no apparent threat to America's neutrality. It appears, therefore, that there is no valid reason why normal trade routes should not be continued as in peacetime.

How Scio Licked Hard Times

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EARL R. LEWIS
OF OHIO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, October 13, 1939

ARTICLE FROM READER'S DIGEST

Mr. LEWIS of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, in these days when millions of individuals and thousands of communities are asking Government assistance to help them solve their individual and community problems growing out of the present depression, it is extremely heartening to learn that the people of one American community have solved their own problems without governmental assistance and have made their own community an outstanding example of what the sensible and rational approach to the realities of their own situation could do in restoring prosperity and making their community a brilliant example for the rest of America to follow. I refer to the little city of Scio in Harrison County in eastern Ohio and to the vision and the hard-headed willingness to face the unpleasant facts of their situation and sound common sense of one of its leading citizens, Mr. L. P. Reese. The remarkable story of this prosperous community in the midst of the wreck of depression, a prosperity achieved during the darkest days of the depression, is thrillingly told in an article appearing in this month's Reader's Digest, condensed from an article previously appearing in Forbes Magazine, which is as follows:

[From Reader's Digest—Condensed from Forbes]

HOW SCIO LICKED HARD TIMES

(By Webb Waldron)

In 1932 Scio, Ohio, and L. P. Reese, now its leading citizen, both had their backs to the wall; both were due to go down as depression casualties. Scio's crisis had begun in 1927, when its one industry, a large pottery plant, folded. In 5 years, population dropped from 1,200 to 400; more than half the houses became vacant; some homes sold for as little as $100. Scio was licked.

So was L. P. Reese, and for about the same reasons. In 1932 Reese was a worker in a pottery plant in a nearby town. The depression hit his company and he was laid off. His savings dwindled; some of his family went on relief.

One day he accepted the invitation of friends in Scio, likewise unemployed pottery hands, to go rabbit hunting. They passed the idle plant, and Reese called off the hunting while he inspected the buildings. Roofs were in disrepair, windows were broken, weeds choked the doors. But Reese remarked, as he finished:

"I've an idea I could do something with that place. I wonder if Scio would be interested."

The rabbit hunt never got beyond that point. Reese told his story to Scio's bank cashier, dentist, real-estate dealer, clothing-store merchant, and others.

He had long believed that cheap imported pottery, much of it from Japan, could be duplicated successfully in this country. He had even designed kilns and mass-production machinery, but his employers had not been interested. But now Scio determined to back him.

Reese put up his total capital of $2,000, including a loan on his war-risk insurance. He found that tax assessments of $3,600 against the plant could be paid off by installments. The property was knocked down at a sheriff's sale for $8,000, the terms allowing Reese plenty of elbow room.

Offering only the hope of jobs, Reese called for volunteers to repair the buildings. During Thanksgiving week in 1932 the entire town turned out—minister, doctor, bank cashier, dentist, merchant, school principal, and practically every able-bodied workman. They repaired roofs, put in new windows, cut away weeds, rebuilt the road.

Reese fixed up a corner of the unheated plant for living quarters, and with six volunteers moved in to work on the equipment. For 6 weeks they put in 14 to 18 hours a day. By January the machinery and the kilns had been rebuilt. The Scio-Ohio Pottery Co. was ready to go.

It lacked only funds for a pay roll, credit for raw materials, and orders. A clay salesman who had known about Reese's plan—and believed in the man, the idea, and the town—persuaded his firm to gamble two carloads of clay.

Reese then went to Chicago and persuaded the buyer for a large chain of stores to take the first carload of cups and saucers—and to pay for them on delivery.

Production started in mid-February 1933. The first pay roll—$990.53—fell due on the 23d. Reese had a cash balance of 11 cents. There was a huddle in the back room of the bank. Twenty men put up $100 apiece and the pay roll was met. On February 23 of each succeeding year Scio has had a community dinner in commemoration of that occasion.

In 1934, the first full year of operation, the company did a gross business of $331,000; last year, $1,284,000. There are more than 500 employees, the monthly pay roll averaging $50,000. There has never been a lay-off.

Among his employees Reese has several former school teachers, two ministers, a one-time stationmaster, several engineers, a contingent of college graduates. Farm families from the entire countryside are represented. Among the 2,200 people in the township only 12 are on relief. Meanwhile, the population of Scio has doubled, there has been a small boom in new homes, savings accounts have multiplied.

Reese, who is "L. P." to Scio, is no desk-industrialist. For my visit he appeared in a white shirt and necktie—and was soundly razzed. His attitude is a product of his own experience as an employee. "I've already got all the money I deserve," he told me. "From now on profits are going into increased pay and bonuses." The wages he pays are already tops for the industry, sometimes twice the average. The minimum—to the boys who sweep out—is 50 cents an hour. From there the scale goes up to $2.50 an hour. Last year $22,000 was added to pay checks as a Christmas bonus.

Two years ago, when union delegates arrived in Scio, Reese, once a union officer himself, let the visitors tell their story to his employees. Then he suggested an employees' meeting to settle the issue. Both he and the organizers stayed away. The vote was unanimously against unionizing.

Recently Reese, with his advisers—the bank cashier, the dentist, and the real-estate operator—decided that increased business merited plant expansion. It would eventually mean more employment and better pay, but meanwhile would probably prevent any wage increases for 2 years. Reese put the question to the employees. The vote was unanimous to expand.

Reese and Scio have put the depression in reverse. Their methods are neither spectacular nor new. They are deeply rooted in tradition. The same imagination, courage, and industry by which Americans, from the first pioneers, always got the upper hand on hard times. Reese and Scio are proof that the old spirit has not run out, that its effectiveness has not diminished.

Neutrality

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES E. VAN ZANDT

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, October 13, 1939

RADIO ADDRESS BY HON. JAMES E. VAN ZANDT, OF PENNSYLVANIA

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address which I delivered recently over the radio:

Good evening, everyone, tonight there are two thoughts uppermost in the minds of the American people—the war in Europe and keeping American out of that war.

Tonight men are dying in that war. Other men are being maimed for life. Women are losing their husbands, children their fathers, parents their sons. Homes are being destroyed. Great cities like Warsaw are in ruins and the war has been in progress for little more than a month. Death, destruction, waste of life and property, and human misery are the only rewards of war.

Tonight, thank God, the American people enjoy the blessings of peace. Millions of Americans are listening to their radios—listening to war news from Europe, peace news of America. Be your homes ever so humble, you Americans and your loved ones are secure from air-raid bombs and high-explosive projectiles.

Tonight there is a difference of opinion among the people and among their public servants at Washington as to the best way to preserve American peace and neutrality. But there is no division among us about America remaining aloof from the holocaust that fills us with horror. The American people are united in a demand to keep out of the European war, united in a determination to keep peace in the Western Hemisphere. They depend upon the President to keep his pledge of peace, which Congress unanimously applauded.

For a number of years, the American people have been "educated" on the theory that the arms embargo was the Nation's best "peace insurance." Led by President Roosevelt, officials of the administration, Members of Congress, Republicans and Democrats alike, joined in the campaign to "sell" the American people the theory that the arms embargo offers the best way to keep America out of war—other people's wars. I took a modest part in that campaign which ended with the enactment of the arms embargo neutrality law. For the American people were "sold" completely on the theory that the arms embargo is our best bulwark against war.

Millions of Americans still are "sold" on the arms embargo now that they are confronted with a condition, not a theory—a war, rather than the threat of war in Europe. It will require some compelling reason to "unsell" them on the protective value of the arms embargo. Too many people remember America's shifting policy during the World War, how we were drawn, step by step, into that conflict. They know the arms embargo would permit no such shifts in policy.

No one who has made even a casual study of world affairs from the standpoint of the foreign interests of the United States claims the arms embargo is a perfect or a foolproof neutrality policy. No law can be flexible enough to cover the interests of the United States in Europe, Asia, and South America at one and the same time. But the fact remains that we had the arms embargo when the European war began. The fact also remains that no real attempt was made to change the law because it aided the aggressor Japan in China, or the aggressor Italy in Ethiopia.

When we undertake to treat all warring nations alike by enacting laws before war begins and then refuse to sell arms to any belligerent after war starts we must be prepared to sacrifice some material interests to maintain our neutrality—to keep out of the conflict. And in any choice between the sacrifice of material interests and the sacrifice of American boys on foreign battlefields the American people never will hesitate to sacrifice material interests.

The President, in his message opening the special session of Congress, freely confessed his enthusiastic support of the arms embargo. He then expressed his deep regret that Congress had passed the law and his equally deep regret that he had signed it. The President based his regret upon the belief that the arms embargo was more apt to involve the United States in the European war than the so-called cash-and-carry bill now pending in the Senate, with his blessing.

With all due respect to the President, I must in all candor submit that it is one thing to confess an error in judgment and express regret for it, and it is quite another thing to convince the American people that a second guess will prove any more sound than the first, which he so passionately defended until recently. A record stands so all who run may read.

It is obvious from the flood of mail deluging all Members of Congress in opposition to the repeal of the arms embargo that the President failed to make it clear either to the country or to Congress why the arms embargo would endanger our peace and why the so-called cash-and-carry bill would preserve our peace. If he had done so, all opposition to the cash-and-carry measure in Congress and out would have melted away and this new bill would have the same overwhelming approval that was accorded the arms embargo.

Let us remember that the arms embargo and the cash-and-carry provisions, which now have lapsed, were embodied in the same act. Let us also remember the President himself allowed the cash-and-carry provisions to lapse, under the limitation in the law. The President might have asked Congress to reenact those provisions. Instead, he chose to ask Congress to pass an entirely new law.

No dissenting voice was raised when the President requested the adjournment of politics so far as the neutrality legislation is concerned. We all are glad to note the absence of partisan spirit in the debate on a matter of such vital importance to the American people. We all desire a united Nation in this crisis. And above all, we wish to avoid any step that might involve this country in the European war.

Now let me point out that four-fifths of the articles America exports are on the contraband lists of both Germany and England. In view of that fact, we would not run the risk of exporting contraband articles in American ships in any event. Since that is true, it seems that a compromise might be effected to minimize the danger of embroilment in the war. That would be the retention of the embargo on munitions of war and reenactment of the cash-and carry provisions of the old law on raw materials.

Under that procedure, no actual change in our neutrality policy would be involved. There is an established principle of international law that neutral nations may not, after the outbreak of war, change their legislation for the purpose of assisting one of the belligerents. One authority holds that if we repeal the arms embargo, Germany would have the right under international law to take steps of reprisal and retaliation against American ships. He even goes so far as to say German reprisal might be taken against American ships, even in coastwise trade, and even if they were not carrying contraband of war. That is what the American people wish to avoid—an incident that might lead us to war.

We all noted the President's realistic statement that the American people could not be expected to remain neutral in thought in this war. But after all, our personal sympathies and our neutrality laws are two quite different things. Most Americans will be standing on the side lines rooting for one side to win and wishing the worst of luck to the other side. But the big idea behind neutrality is keeping out of war—other people's wars—and those same Americans are firmly opposed to any change in the arms embargo.

We must remember that the arms embargo was enacted in peacetime. The sole purpose of that law was to keep us out of other people's wars—to preserve the neutrality, the security, and peace of the United States—no matter what nations went to war in the future. That law was not designed to aid or hinder any nation engaged in war.

Now that war is raging in Europe, it is not a question of the American people loving one or the other of the warring sides less, when the neutrality law is concerned. Americans simply love a peaceful America more.

And no matter how much love any European nation may profess for the United States, it is to be hoped that whatever bill is enacted it will be a strict cash-and-carry law. If we extend the proposed 90-day credit, cash goes out the window. If the sponsors want a trick name for the bill, let them call it title and tote.

The Allied war debts of about $12,000,000,000, 20 years past due, and without so much as a sou or a shilling paid on account of principal or interest, are not so musty that the American people have forgotten them. In fact, Congress passed the Johnson Act, prohibiting debtor nations from borrowing any more money from the United States, to jog the memories of our associates in the last war. While the American taxpayers hold the bag, this 90-day credit is proposed to circumvent the Johnson Act.

It is unthinkable that any American worthy of the name or any set of Americans would deliberately seek to plunge this country into the European war. I am sure that no Member of Congress who happens to disagree with the President on the so-called neutrality bill or any other measure begrudges the President the same degree of sincere desire for peace that he ascribes to those who dissent from his viewpoint.

There is one point in the President's message with which any conscientious Congressman must take issue. That is his asserting that "in a period when it is sometimes said that free discussion is no longer compatible with national safety." This is not one of those times when free discussion of the proposed so-called neutrality bill is not longer compatible with national safety. It is one of those times when free discussion of a measure involving the peace of the United States not only is compatible with national safety, but national safety may depend upon free discussion.

There has not been the slightest indication in any quarter of a disposition to filibuster, to delay consideration by prolonged debate. On the contrary, no one who believes in the orderly processes of democratic government can complain about dilatory tactics in the debate thus far. The advocates of the President's program have consumed equal time with the advocates of keeping the arms embargo as the best means of keeping America out of war.

On the other hand, there are persistent reports of a flood of propaganda actually urging the "gagging" of Members of the House on this matter of vital importance to the American people. Before the debate in the Senate was a week old, inspired newspaper articles appeared in which it was stated without giving any authority for the statement, that the people were tired of the debate—tired of a free discussion of a question involving the peace and security of the United States, weary of a debate on a question of keeping America out of war, if you please.

I have asked what action the House will be allowed to take on the so-called neutrality bill when it comes to the House. No responsible leader has answered the inquiry. Let me point out the reason for that inquiry. Under legislative procedure, the bill now being considered by the Senate bears the number of the House bill. The House bill, passed June 30 last, included the arms embargo, adopted by a vote of 214 to 173.

That entire bill was scrapped, and the Senate Foreign Relations Committee substituted a complete new measure. Despite the fact this new legislation would commit this Government to a policy that might lead to war, it is reported that a movement is afoot to gag the House to hasten enactment of the measure. Instead of sending the bill to conference to iron out the differences between the Senate and House measures, it is reported that a gag rule will be presented to cut to a couple of hours the debate on a question which may involve the peace of this Nation. This gag rule, it was reported, would be so framed that a vote for the gag rule would be a vote for the new Senate bill—a bill that never has had a moment's consideration by any House committee, much less the House itself.

That vote would complete action on the bill. That vote would kill the arms embargo. That vote would change the neutrality policy of this Government in the midst of this European war. That vote could conceivably be the first step toward American involvement in this European war.

The United States of America is the only true democracy on the face of the earth, and if there ever was a time in the life of this Nation for a demonstration of democracy, it will arrive simultaneously with the neutrality bill in the House to be considered for the first time. Free discussion and consideration commensurate with the vital importance of the bill may be stifled by gag rule as ruthlessly as if by edict of a European dictator.

This measure can receive the consideration it deserves only if the American people demand it of their Representatives in Congress. The American people are entitled to know whether their Representatives are to be gagged or will be permitted to vote for the method they believe best to preserve the peace and security of the United States and the American people.

Civil Rights and Liberties

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. SHERMAN MINTON

OF INDIANA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Saturday, October 14 (legislative day of Wednesday, October 4), 1939

RADIO ADDRESS BY HON. ELBERT D. THOMAS, OF UTAH

Mr. MINTON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an interesting and able address delivered by the distinguished junior Senator from Utah [Mr. THOMAS] as part of the program of the National Conference of Civil Liberties, held at the Hotel Biltmore, New York City, October 13 and 14, under the auspices of the American Civil Liberties Union, with William Allen White, chairman of the conference. The address was broadcast over the National Broadcasting System.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE LESSON OF LESSONS FOR AMERICA

After many years spent in study and in work I have founded an opinion which has evolved into a philosophy of life as it is applied to governments. It is my unshakable conviction that in the setting up of the Government of the United States the founders provided a pattern for the greatest social and political institution on the earth, and that in the years that followed a greater number of men and women have had the opportunity to live lives which might be described with the one word "full" than have enjoyed relatively full lives in any other part of the world or under any other governmental system on the earth.

In many places I have been an eyewitness to pestilence, famine, and to life laid bare by yesterday's wars, floods, earthquakes, and volcanoes. To these we may add the suffering from acts of selfishness and greed, and even of stupidity. Statesmanship and good planning might have eliminated much, reduced all. We all have seen life enriched as a result of legislation prompted by the common humanities, so much so that we today ask, Of what value is government if it does not help its people? A thoughtless person will say that welfare as an object of government, perhaps as its prime object, is a new and a dangerous theory, yet it will be found to be one of those many things under the sun which are not new when we read history and remember that the old Romans believed that government's undertakings should be "pro bono publico," for the good of the people, and that the ancient Chinese taught: "The people is the important thing; the people must be cherished."

No gains in civil rights and in civil liberties, terms which should not need definition, have been made as a matter of mere accident or as a result of keeping government out of the realm of labor and industrial disputes or other civil strife. From the Magna Carta to now no immunities from Robert Burns' lament over man's inhumanity to man have been gained, and no inhumanities have been corrected, simply by standing by or standing apart and letting nature take its course. These gains have not been made except by hard work, and usually have followed the path of real suffering so acute as to threaten the fact of a true democracy at work. The Bill of Rights must have been a bitter pill to the exploiters of that day. The rights of man asserted are hard medicine for abusive men and agencies in any generation. It is not more difficult to raise the standard of living than to keep it from being lowered simply by blinding ourselves to the new uses men put to their wits to violate the common hopes, aspirations, and ambitions which their fellow men have a right to possess in a free country. America has never been wholly free from exploitation from within.

It must be true that the first purpose in establishing government in the United States of America was to grant liberty and permit the individual citizen in America to develop the talents that he may possess, at least insofar as to make him in every sense a free man. A civil liberty is nothing more than the privilege of not having placed in one's way, in one's journey along life's path, a barrier to the fulfillment of common ambitions and hopes. Their realization, amounting to nothing more than constitutional liberty, sets us as a nation apart from all others in our peculiar and rather full enjoyment of basic freedom. Government has provided no frills and furbelows, but it has beaten off slavery, inescapable starvation, and other adversaries, and has taken on as a new foe an old enemy in new clothing, namely, the labor spy.

We have become almost unconscious of our oldest civil liberties, which we enjoy daily, else we would not be startled at the phrase, and else it would not attract suspicion and distortion. I have been told that I should not appear publicly in defense of the work that I have done as a member of the subcommittee of the Education and Labor Committee of the Senate, of which I am chairman, and of which subcommittee, roughly called the Civil Liberties Committee, I am a member. I have been told that our work is not popular. I fancy that in the same kinds of quarters the work of those who had passed the constitutional amendments called the Bill of Rights, soon after the Constitution itself was adopted, were not popular either. I am speaking of personal popularity. The rights themselves are bound to be popular, because they are indispensables in popular government, or government of, by, and for the people. They are popular rights, for this is no more than a synonym for public civil liberties. When one may not come and go without fear, buy or sell without duress, worship without permission, one is not an American. When one cannot join or not join without penalty, be a citizen of his State, a citizen of his Nation, a party member, a lodge affiliate, a church pillar, or owner of a business, without having to pay a toll which he dare not admit, one is not a free person. When one may not enjoy and have satisfaction in the many loyalties which do not conflict because American citizenship is complex, one has lost something vital, he is not a full man, and his life, being not quite full, may actually be empty. Jefferson helps me make my point in great simplicity by referring to his four great freedoms—the freedom of property, the freedom of mind, the freedom of the soul, and the freedom of the body. If we take away these civil liberties or refuse to overcome new violations thereof, we destroy the finest blessings to man ever chronicled in history. No congressional committee, no committee in either House of Congress, has ever been empowered to do a greater thing than that of preserving the essence of American liberty.

The achievement of liberty is a matter of degree and always will be. Yesterday the right to buy and sell was more or was less valuable than today, because there were more or were fewer restrictions on monopolies and trusts; yesterday the right to come and go was more or less valuable because yesterday railroad tariffs were higher or lower and because yesterday you had more or you had less money. Yesterday you had a right to work if you could get a job, and the right to eat without work becomes important if that is the only way in which one may eat. If there are epidemics in the land, no rights are important or assertable until one has medicines and responsible advice from a good medical source. If the individual means to combat disease is still further lowered, then the public needs a greater service, for there is no liberty when a great percentage of our people have broken bodies. When one's hope for the future is destroyed through a curb on worship, one's soul is marred.

Government must, accordingly, provide at least in a measure for physical, cultural, educational, and economic opportunities. Liberty follows the times, and civil rights follow liberty like a faithful companion.

How do we dare risk the consequences of freedom? We are today watching a war from the side lines, as we so often have done. Someone reads that I am taking a leading part in seeking a repeal of the arms embargo as a proper step toward further insuring our peace, and I give my reasoning, which I believe to be sound and convincing, and I state that my conclusions are a result of study and thought. Someone on the other side makes as stout a claim. Then comes the flood of letters, some organized, some spontaneous. The right of petition is thus exercised with all the pressure that skilled propagandists, ardent lobbyists, and well-meaning individuals, thinking for themselves, can exert. Has any wrong been done? Not in America, where we enjoy civil liberties. Yet if we destroy one civil liberty, or allow it to become ineffective, we shall soon destroy all. I have been told that no matter what I do, if war should come I will have the blood of mothers' sons on my hands. My letters read both ways. I am a responsible member of the policy-making branch of our Government. If I were not in America, and wished to do so, perhaps I could send musketmen to the address of such a writer, and because he had insulted me, send him to a concentration camp for presuming to criticize a lawmaker. But my correspondent's right is sacred; but with all its sanctity it is not more valuable to him than the right to be free from having industrial spies at work to undermine him in the security of either his home or his job, or, what is more important than either, his character. But the essence of liberty is self-restraint. Abuse of liberty will bring liberty's destruction. When we fight for the right of becoming a party to a contract, we must also fight just as hard to see that the contract's obligations are fulfilled or else the original right becomes purposeless.

Let us go back a few years.

Something had begun, and making more than a start, had found its way into our very national bloodstream, which could not go unchallenged. It was born of a desire to have a law declared unconstitutional and advice by lawyers to act as though the law were unconstitutional even before it had been legally stricken down. That was going pretty far, standing alone, but it was the consequence of this advice, not the giving of it, that brought about a frustration of civil rights. Soon, in the assumption that the law would not stand up, and particularly that it should by all means be nullified even if good, certain industrial managers began to employ spies, and the evil spread through a large part of our American industry like a cancer. The industrial spy was, thereafter, placed in such wide use, and his influence was given such spread that countless men lost faith in one another. There even developed, naturally enough, the spy on the spy, and with this, universal fear on the part of everyone concerned, namely the employer, the group or groups spied upon, and the spy himself. In such a state of lost faith, society's very existence is threatened, and with the continuation of such a low level of confidence, society in time would be destroyed. Fear is not a possible substitute for faith. It was a case of introducing an evil to destroy what was suspected as an evil. Granting that the suspicion was honest, for the sake of the record granting even that it was justified, it was an imprudent risk, with the ever-present fear that the evil of spying be turned on its user, as it was turned in many cases, to the impairment, the moral destruction, and the material damage of its victims.

Again it was a mistake to permit public police officers to take a side and pit themselves against a part of the public. In doing so they ceased to be public officers and became partisans, and when arms and gas were used we had a civil war in the small, to be sure, but, in fact nevertheless, with danger of its spread. Without officers of the law acting as law officers, so far as those areas were concerned we were without law and order. Employers turned spies on, but could not turn them off. They started "hookers" undermining men's characters, and could not stop them. The lying "missionary" sent out to break faith in some men broke faith in all men. And trust, the very essence of social life, ceased to be.

It was in this state of affairs that Senator LA FOLLETTE and I began our inquiries. Senator WALSH is with us in our present investigations. We have had no thought but to bring about a restoration of civil rights and keep America American. Constructive legislation is now before Congress, and if we are to have it enacted, our work is only begun. Nothing useful to the great body of the public ever was achieved without opposition. While no one can openly work against the proposed law because it is written to correct admitted evils, still it may die from indifferent support. Since only by eternal vigilance liberty is kept alive, deadly indifference dulls liberty's worth and ultimately kills its spirit. Liberty in its fullest sense is tensely spiritual and like all spiritual things it is easily marred.

Just as our great civilization in its final analysis rests upon three cultural inventions—the wheel, the domestication of animals, and the development of cereal food—just so does our democracy rest upon the political concepts of the four great freedoms of the mind, the soul, the body, and private property. American democracy hangs by the thin thread of restraint and common consent. A loss of civil liberty, therefore, may mean the loss of all liberty. For our moral let us turn to good old Aesop: An eagle in flight was hit by an arrow. As he fell wounded to the ground he turned to see the cause of his destruction. On noting that the arrow had been guided by eagle feathers he uttered as he died, "There is in each of us the element of our own destruction."

Ladies and gentlemen, that is the lesson of lessons for America today.

Labor and Agriculture

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LEWIS B. SCHWELLENBACH

OF WASHINGTON

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Saturday, October 14 (legislative day of Wednesday, October 4), 1939

ADDRESS BY SENATOR SCHWELLENBACH BEFORE AMERICAN FEDERATION OF LABOR

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a speech delivered by me before the convention of the American Federation of Labor at Cincinnati, Ohio, on October 12, 1939.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

I appreciate very much the invitation to appear before this convention.

At first blush it would seem that a detailed discussion of the problem of the apple industry might be far afield from the program of a labor convention. Knowing as I do, however, the degree of recognition by the American Federation of Labor of the close connection between those who might be classed as laborers and those who might be classed as farmers, I did not hesitate to accept the invitation. In our highly developed economic system the prosperity of each group depends upon the prosperity of each other group. Neither the labor union nor its members can hope to flourish during the period of depressed agricultural conditions.

There is another reason why labor is and should be interested in the present disastrous situation confronting the apple industry. The percentage of cost necessarily expended in order to place apples upon the market going to labor is much higher than any other agricultural product.

The average cost of production, according to a 3-year study made by the Washington State College of Agriculture on 81 farms in the Wenatchee Valley, was $1.17 per box. This includes all legitimate costs of production and packing the fruit, and of this amount about 70 cents per box was considered a fair estimate of the actual cash expenditure, the balance of the item being made up of overhead charges of interest and depreciation and a cash value figured on the labor of the farmer and his family.

In addition to these costs there are charges for warehousing, shipping-point storage, and selling of the apples before they move east. The combined average charge for these three items in the Wenatchee Valley at the time of this study was 26.7 cents per box. At that time an additional charge of 75 cents per box was charged for transporting the crop to the eastern market. When the $1.17 for producing and packing a box of apples is added to the warehousing and transportation charges, we have an item of $2.18 invested in the average box of apples by the time it reaches the eastern seaboard.

One can see why the Washington boxed apple commands a relatively high price in the eastern market. One can also appreciate that the portion of this price returned to the Washington farmer is relatively modest.

It should be emphasized that the natural advantage the State of Washington has in a climate and soil especially well adapted to apple production is at least partially offset by the long haul to the eastern or export markets. For this reason it has been necessary to concentrate on the production of a quality product, and the result is the high-graded and standardized Washington boxed apple.

The extent of the dependence of the western commercial growers upon the export market places them in a very unfavorable situation this year. Last season some 12,000,000 bushels were exported. Exports during the 1939–40 season are expected to be considerably below that figure.

Not only does Europe have a large apple crop, but the war presents a great handicap. Shipping space and the foreign exchange available for fresh fruit are likely to become serious problems. Consumer demand in Europe is expected to shift toward foods that are less perishable and cheaper than fresh apples, although a certain amount of fresh fruit probably will be considered essential to health.

For the next few months it is expected that the United Kingdom will be supplied largely from its own crop plus imports from Canada. A heavy harvest of around 16,000,000 bushels is expected in Canada. Even Canada, however, with a preferred market in the United Kingdom for about 7,000,000 bushels of apples anticipates greatly reduced exports for 1939–40.

France expects very large apple and pear crops this fall of her own. The new Government import-control system undoubtedly will cut down the movement of apples into France much below last season.

The unsettled conditions resulting from the war have limited fresh apple exports this season to less than one-third of the amount exported up to this time last year. This curtailment of export outlets, in addition to a bumper apple crop of 103,000,000 bushels and the prospects of the second largest citrus crop on record, has resulted in ruinous prices to the apple grower. Apple prices so far this season are even lower than those existing in the 1937 season. It is estimated that from ninety-five to ninety-nine million bushels of apples are available for fresh domestic consumption as compared to an average of 81,000,000 bushels during the last 10 years.

United States apple crops and prices

Year	Commercial sales	Fresh exports	Fresh domestic consumption	Farm price
	Million bushels	Million bushels	Million bushels	Dollars per bushel
1929–38	94	12	81	0.86
1935	104	12	92	.72
1937	116	11	105	.67
1938	82	12	70	.84
1939 [1]	103	4–8	99–95	[2].63

[1] Preliminary estimate. [2] September prices.

Consumer purchasing power during the apple-marketing season will be higher than in 1938, and is expected to be about equivalent to 1937. Competition from other fruits, however, has increased greatly. The prospects are that this year's fruit crop will be the second largest on record, and will be 13 percent above 1935, 7 percent below 1937, and 6 percent above 1938.

Under present conditions the parity price of apples as calculated by the Bureau of Agricultural Economics is $1.23 per bushel. The present farm price of apples is 63 cents per bushel, or only 51 percent of parity.

To meet this situation growers have undertaken a program to divert low-grade apples from fresh consumption. The Federal Surplus Commodities Corporation is supplementing this grower program by purchasing a bushel of apples for relief distribution for every bushel diverted. Under this program the farmers are attempting to secure fair prices for their fruit and at the same time supply consumers with an ample quantity of the best quality apples available at reasonable prices.

Apples have just been put on the surplus list and it is too early, therefore, to estimate the volume of distribution which can be secured through this outlet. This may mean a great deal to apple growers later on as the stamp plan is extended to additional cities.

To those who know nothing of the apply industry it is always surprising to discover that orchard land in the State of Washington ranges in value from eight to twelve hundred dollars per acre. It has not been uncommon for an orchard of the Delicious variety to sell as high as $2,000 per acre. These values come about through the great length of time necessary to bring an apple orchard into full bearing, and the rather considerable costs that must be incurred for irrigation water, land taxes, and investments in buildings, equipment, and irrigation system. While apple trees may begin to bear moderately in the seventh or eighth year, they are not considered to be in full production until about the tenth year. During this long period of waiting there is little or no income and considerable outlay for maintenance of the growing orchard.

I know there is no need for me to make a sales talk on the dietary value of apples. However, it is of interest to consider briefly the findings after a scientific survey made this year by the New York Horticultural Society:

"Apples add nonirritating bulk to the diet because they contain large amounts of pectic or jelly-forming material. The pectin promotes transit in the intestines without irritating the glands, and in that way improves digestion. Apples in the form of raw apple pulp or powder have been used very successfully in the treatment of diarrhea or dysentary in infants and of intestinal ulcers in adults. Apples supply readily available energy because of the solubility of the sugars which they contain. Apples contain numerous minerals, including fair amounts of calcium and iron, which are so important for bone, tooth, brain, and muscle building.

"Apples provide ample quantities of the essential vitamins A and C, as well as lesser amounts of vitamins B and G. Vitamin A aids in building up of disease resistance in the human body. It is commonly believed that oranges are a good source of vitamin A. Dr Henry C. Sherman, of Columbia University, well-known nutritian authority, assigns them a value of only 20 units per ounce, while several varieties of apples, including McIntosh and Golden Delicious, have a value of from 30 to 36 units per ounce. Vitamin C is the antiscurvy vitamin. Apples contain a large amount of this vitamin, which cannot be stored in the body and which must be replenished daily. Most of this vitamin is stored close to the skin. One apple a day, eaten skin and all, will give one all of this vitamin needed regardless of his other foods.

"Apples furnish an alkaline reaction in our systems, thus counteracting acid-forming foods and checking colds and superacidity."

We, representing apple-producing areas, will most certainly appreciate any assistance which can be rendered to us by this powerful organization.

Speaking on behalf of the orchardists of my own State, I wish to repeat my appreciation for this opportunity to thus briefly appear before you.

Pending Neutrality Legislation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. BENNETT CHAMP CLARK

OF MISSOURI

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Saturday, October 14 (legislative day of Wednesday, October 4), 1939

RADIO ADDRESS BY COL. CHARLES A. LINDBERGH

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD the address delivered over the radio last night by Col. Charles A. Lindbergh.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, I ask the Senator from Missouri if he knows who advises with and collaborates with Colonel Lindbergh as to his attitude and public views?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I can say to the Senator from Texas that I have no information on that score, but Colonel Lindbergh has always seemed entirely capable of forming his own decisions and expressing his own opinion.

Mr. CONNALLY. I have no objection.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the address being printed in the RECORD?

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Tonight I speak again to the people of this country who are opposed to the United States entering the war which is now going on in Europe. We are faced with the need of deciding on a policy of American neutrality. The future of our Nation and of our civilization rests upon the wisdom and foresight we use. Much as peace is to be desired, we should realize that behind a successful policy of neutrality must stand a policy of war. It is essential to define clearly those principles and circumstances for which a Nation will fight. Let us give no one the impression that America's love for peace means that she is afraid of war or that we are not fully capable and willing to defend all that is vital to us. National life and influence depend upon national strength, both in character and in arms. A neutrality built on pacifism alone will eventually fail.

Before we can intelligently enact regulations for the control of our armaments, our credit, and our ships, we must draw a sharp dividing line between neutrality and war, there must be no gradual encroachment on the defense of our Nation. Up to this line we may adjust our affairs to gain the advantages of peace, but beyond it must lie all the armed might of America, coiled in readiness to spring if once this bond is cut. Let us make clear to all countries where this line lies. It must be both within our intent and our capabilities. There must be no question of trading or bluff in this hemisphere. Let us give no promises we cannot keep—make no meaningless assurances to an Ethiopia, a Czechoslovakia, or a Poland. The policy we decide upon should be as clear cut as our shore lines, and as easily defended as our continent.

This Western Hemisphere is our domain. It is our right to trade freely within it. From Alaska to Labrador, from the Hawaiian Islands to Bermuda, from Canada to South America, we must allow no invading army to set foot. These are the outposts of the United States. They form the essential outline of our geographical defense. We must be ready to wage war with all the resources of our Nation if they are ever seriously threatened. Their defense is the mission of our Army, our Navy, and our Air Corps—the minimum requirement of our military strength. Around these places should lie our line between neutrality and war. Let there be no compromise about our right to defend or trade within this area. If it is challenged by any nation, the answer must be war. Our policy of neutrality should have this as its foundation.

We must protect our sister American nations from foreign invasion, both for their welfare and our own. But, in turn, they have a duty to us. They should not place us in the position of having to defend them in America while they engage in wars abroad. Can we rightfully permit any country in America to give bases to foreign warships or to send its army abroad to fight while it remains secure in our protection at home? We desire the utmost friendship with the people of Canada. If their country is ever attacked, our Navy will be defending their seas, our soldiers will fight on their battlefields, our fliers will die in their skies. But have they the right to draw this hemisphere into a European war simply because they prefer the Crown of England to American independence?

Sooner or later we must demand the freedom of this continent and its surrounding islands from the dictates of European power. American history clearly indicates this need. As long as European powers maintain their influence in our hemisphere we are likely to find ourselves involved in their troubles. And they will lose no opportunity to involve us.

Our Congress is now assembled to decide upon the best policy for this country to maintain during the war which is going on in Europe. The legislation under discussion involves three major issues—the embargo of arms, the restriction of shipping, and the allowance of credit. The action we take in regard to these issues will be an important indication to ourselves and to the nations of Europe whether or not we are likely to enter the conflict eventually, as we did in the last war. The entire world is watching us. The action we take in America may either stop or precipitate this war.

Let us take up these issues one at a time and examine them. First, the embargo of arms. It is argued that the repeal of this embargo would assist democracy in Europe, that it would let us make a profit for ourselves from the sale of munitions abroad and at the same time help to build up our own arms industry.

I do not believe that repealing the arms embargo would assist democracy in Europe because I do not believe this is a war for democracy. This is a war over the balance of power in Europe—a war brought about by the desire for strength on the part of Germany and the fear of strength on the part of England and France. The more munitions the armies obtain, the longer the war goes on, and the more devastated Europe becomes, the less hope there is for democracy. That is a lesson we should have learned from our participation in the last war. If democratic principles had been applied in Europe after that war, if the "democracies" of Europe had been willing to make some sacrifice to help democracy in Europe while it was fighting for its life, if England and France had offered a hand to the struggling republic of Germany, there would be no war today.

If we repeal the arms embargo with the idea of assisting one of the warring sides to overcome the other, then why mislead ourselves by talk of neutrality? Those who advance this argument should admit openly that repeal is a step toward war. The next step would be the extension of credit, and the next would be the sending of American troops.

To those who argue that we could make a profit and build up our own industry by selling munitions abroad, I reply that we in America have not yet reached a point where we wish to capitalize on the destruction and death of war. I do not believe that the material welfare of this country needs, or that our spiritual welfare could withstand, such a policy. If our industry depends upon a commerce of arms for its strength, then our industrial system should be changed. It is impossible for me to understand how America can contribute to civilization and humanity by sending offensive instruments of destruction to European battlefields. This would not only implicate us in war but it would also make us partly responsible for its devastation. The fallacy of helping to defend a political ideology, even though it be somewhat similar to our own, was clearly demonstrated to us in the last war. Through our help that war was won, but neither the democracy nor the justice for which we fought grew in the peace that followed our victory.

Our bond with Europe is a bond of race and not of political ideology. We had to fight a European army to establish democracy in this country. It is the European race we must preserve; political progress will follow. Social strength is vital—politics, a luxury. If the white race is ever seriously threatened, it may then be time for us to take our part in its protection, to fight side by side with the English, French, and Germans, but not with one against the other for our mutual destruction.

Let us not dissipate our strength, or help Europe to dissipate hers, in these wars of politics and possession. For the benefit of western civilization, we should continue our embargo on offensive armaments. As far as purely defensive arms are concerned, I, for one, am in favor of supplying European countries with as much as we can spare of the material that falls within this category. There are technicians who will argue that offensive and defensive arms cannot be separated completely. That is true, but it is no more difficult to make a list of defensive weapons than it is to separate munitions of war from semimanufactured articles, and we are faced with that problem today. No one says that we should sell opium because it is difficult to make a list of narcotics. I would as soon see our country traffic in opium as in bombs. There are certain border-line cases, but there are plenty of clear-cut examples: For instance, the bombing plane and the antiaircraft cannon. I do not want to see American bombers dropping bombs which will kill and mutilate European children, even if they are not flown by American pilots. But I am perfectly willing to see American antiaircraft guns shooting American shells at invading bombers over any European country. And I believe that most of you who are listening tonight will agree with me.

The second major issue for which we must create a policy concerns the restrictions to be placed on our shipping. Naval blockades have long been accepted as an element of warfare. They began on the surface of the sea, followed the submarine beneath it, and now reach up into the sky with aircraft. The laws and customs which were developed during the surface era were not satisfactory to the submarine. Now aircraft bring up new and unknown factors for consideration. It is simple enough for a battleship to identify the merchantman she captures. It is a more difficult problem for a submarine if that merchantman may carry cannon; it is safer to fire a torpedo than to come up and ask. For bombing planes flying at high altitudes and through conditions of poor visibility identification of a surface vessel will be more difficult still.

In modern naval blockades and warfare torpedoes will be fired and bombs dropped on probabilities rather than on certainties of identification. The only safe course for neutral shipping at this time is to stay away from the warring countries and dangerous waters of Europe.

The third issue to be decided relates to the extension of credit.

Here again we may draw from our experience in the last war. After that war was over we found ourselves in the position of having financed a large portion of the expenditures of European countries. And when the time came to pay us back these countries simply refused to do so They not only refused to pay the wartime loans we made but they refused to pay back what we loaned them after the war was over. As is so frequently the case, we found that loaning money eventually created animosity instead of gratitude. European countries felt insulted when we asked to be repaid.

They called us "Uncle Shylock." They were horror-struck at the idea of turning over to us any of their islands in America to compensate for their debts, or for our help in winning their war. They seized all the German colonies and carved up Europe to suit their fancy. These were the fruits of war. They took our money and they took our soldiers. But there was not the offer of one Caribbean island in return for the debts they could not afford to pay. Extension of credit to a belligerent country is a long step toward war, and it would leave us close to the edge. If American industry loans money to a belligerent country, many interests will feel that it is more important for that country to win than for our own to avoid the war. It is unfortunate but true that there are interests in America who would rather lose American lives than their own dollars. We should give them no opportunity.

I believe that we should adopt as our program of American neutrality, as our contribution to western civilization, the following policy:

1. An embargo on offensive weapons and munitions.
2. The unrestricted sale of purely defensive armaments.

3. The prohibition of American shipping from the belligerent countries of Europe and their danger zones.

4. The refusal of credit to belligerent nations or their agents.

Whether or not this program is adopted depends upon the support of those of us who believe in it. The United States of America is a democracy. The policy of our country is still controlled by our people. It is time for us to take action. There has never been a greater test for the democratic principle of government.

Neutrality in Warfare

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LEWIS B. SCHWELLENBACH

OF WASHINGTON

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Saturday, October 14 (legislative day of Wednesday, October 4), 1939

LETTER FROM CLOYD LAPORTE

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a letter written by Cloyd Laporte, which appeared in the New York Times this morning, be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the New York Times of October 14, 1939]

NEUTRALITY IN WARFARE—REMOVAL OF ARMS EMBARGO HELD NO BREACH OF INTERNATIONAL LAW

To the EDITOR OF THE NEW YORK TIMES:

Profs. Charles Cheney Hyde and Philip C. Jessup in their letters to the Times of September 21 and October 4 have taken the position that the removal of the arms embargo under present circumstances would be a breach of international law. They base their position upon two contentions: (1) That there is a rule of international law which prohibits neutral states from changing their neutrality legislation during wartime if the motive leading to the change is the desire to assist one or more of the belligerents; and (2) that such a desire would be the motivating cause of the adoption of the changes now proposed.

The sole authority which they cite for their alleged rule of international law is the Draft Convention on Rights and Duties of Neutral States in Naval and Aerial War, being a part of the Harvard Research in Internation Law (American Journal of International Law, vol. 33, supplement, July 1939). Professor Jessup was himself the reporter who prepared the draft.

NOT A CONSENSUS

The nature of this as authority should be examined. It is, as its title indicates, a draft of a proposed convention designed to regulate neutrality in warfare. Its publication date is as recent as July 1939. It has not been adopted by any government. It does not appear to represent even the consensus of opinion of existing writers on and students of international law. This appears from the following foreword which accompanies the draft:

"The consideration of the Draft Convention on Rights and Duties of Neutral States in Naval and Aerial War revealed fundamental differences of opinion regarding the general organization of the draft, its underlying theories, and a number of specific rules and principles set forth therein. The research nevertheless presents it, without any implication that the draft as published reflects even a consensus of the members of the advisory committee, hoping that its debates upon the problem may be continued among scholars throughout the world with a view to the further clarification of the subject."

The draft convention consists of a number of articles, and appended to each article are pages of comment. It is from a part of this discussion—the comment on article 13—which Professors Hyde and Jessup quote in support of their alleged rule of law to the effect that any change in neutrality laws made in wartime must not be "the result of a desire to aid one or the other belligerent."

PERTINENT FACTORS

The articles themselves, which purport to state the principles to which some of those engaged in making the draft subscribe, do not state any such principle. The pertinent provisions are in articles 4 and 13. Article 4 reads as follows:

"A neutral state, in the exercise of its neutral rights and in the performance of its neutral duties, shall be impartial and shall refrain from discrimination between belligerents."

Article 13 reads as follows:

"A neutral state, for the purpose of better safeguarding its rights and interests as a neutral or better fulfilling its duties as a neutral, may, during the course of a war, adopt new measures or alter the measures which it has previously adopted: Provided, however, That the new measures adopted do not violate any provision of this convention."

It will be noted that article 4 merely requires that a neutral state "shall be impartial and shall refrain from discrimination between belligerents" and that article 13 expressly recognizes the right to alter measures in wartime. Nothing in the proposed article lays down any test requiring a searching into the motives of the lawmakers in adopting a change of rules. The text of the articles would seem to be complied with when the new or altered measures are applied to all belligerents. In fact, the authors of the draft convention state, in their comment to article 13, immediately before the sentence which is quoted by Professors Hyde and Jessup in their letter of October 4:

"As already indicated in the comment under article 4, the impartiality required of a neutral state is a technical rather than a factual impartiality; the neutral state is under no duty to attempt to equalize conditions thrown out of balance by geographical factors or by the relative power of the contesting parties on the sea, in the air, on land, in supplies of raw materials, or in industrial equipment."

INDEFINITE DOCUMENT

Neither the draft convention nor the comment accompanying it indicates to what particular theories the "fundamental differences of opinion" revealed by the research related. In their letters to the Times Professors Hyde and Jessup indicate that the portion of the comment quoted by them is not merely a theory upon which there may be fundamental differences of opinion, but that it is law binding upon all neutral states. Yet, interspersed throughout the comment are references to previous action of neutral states, including the United States, which appear to be contrary to this so-called rule of law. Thus it is stated:

"Indeed, most of the progress in the development of the law of neutrality from the end of the eighteenth century to the present time has resulted from changes introduced while a war was in progress. Some of these changes have been made and justified on the theory that they were designed merely to make more effective the discharge of a preexisting legal duty, but, as in the case of the laws and regulations adopted by the United States in 1793, there was in reality a progression beyond the point then established in international law."

Also it is said that: "The United States passed and lifted several embargo acts during the French Revolutionary and Napoleonic wars," although it is said that these acts may be justified as retaliatory.

The comment further says:

"It is clear, therefore, that in the course of the American Civil War neutrals made changes in their policies although these changes were not required by the then existing international law and although they operated unequally upon the belligerents."

It would seem, therefore, that the test of impartial motive applied to legislation passed during wartime, is by no means a doctrine so generally accepted that it may be called a binding rule of law. Assuming, however, without conceding, that there is such a rule of law, it is submitted that the neutrality bill now before the Senate fulfills the requirements of any such rule.

In the first place, the act would be applicable to trade with all belligerents. If some of the belligerents would not be able to take advantage of its provisions because of geographical or other factors, these are factors which, as the comment above quoted indicates, a neutral state "is under no duty to attempt to equalize."

In the second place, the question of motive is not to be resolved by the opinions which Professors Hyde and Jessup say they hear "on every side." There are undoubtedly varying reasons which lead individuals to support or oppose the measure. In a democracy all shades of opinion are freely expressed. It is primarily those responsible for legislation whose reasons are entitled to the greatest weight. Among these is the report of the Committee on Foreign Relations of the Senate accompanying the bill, which states its purpose to be "to preserve the neutrality and the peace of the United States and to secure the safety of its citizens and their interests."

The best evidence that the purpose of the legislation is to preserve our own neutrality is to be found in the fact that the repeal of the embargo on arms does not stand alone, but is coupled with the imposition of an embargo on shipping and provisions regarding the passage of title and cash payment and short-term credit, which can only operate unfavorably to Great Britain and France.

What is proposed is the repeal of an arms embargo which by itself will operate to the advantage of Great Britain and France, coupled with other drastic provisions which must operate to their disadvantage. Whether the measure will help or harm them in the long run is a question which only the future can answer. The proposed legislation must be considered as a whole.

If there is a rule of law, as contended by Professors Hyde and Jessup, making the motive of proposed legislation determinative of its legality—and the existence of such a rule appears at the least to be extremely doubtful—it is submitted that the neutrality bill meets the requirements of such a rule.

CLOYD LAPORTE.

NEW YORK, October 11, 1939.

Tribute to Senator McNary

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ARTHUR CAPPER

OF KANSAS

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Saturday, October 14 (legislative day of Wednesday, October 4), 1939

ADDRESS OF HON. CHARLES A. SPRAGUE, GOVERNOR OF OREGON, BEFORE OREGON REPUBLICAN CLUB, THE DALLES, OREG., OCTOBER 9, 1939

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the excellent address delivered by Governor Sprague be printed in full in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

OREGON REPUBLICANS SHOULD PRESENT THE NAME OF SENATOR CHARLES L. M'NARY FOR PRESIDENT

(Address of Hon. Charles A. Sprague, Governor of Oregon, before Oregon Republican Club, The Dalles, Oreg., October 9, 1939)

I come before you tonight to substitute as speaker for Senator STYLES BRIDGES, of New Hampshire, who is detained by official duties in Washington and so is unable to address you tonight as was previously planned. All of us, I know, though we fully appreciate the untoward events which prevent the distinguished Senator from attending this gathering, greatly regret his absence. We were hopeful of hearing his exposition of Republican gospel and desirous of seeing and greeting him as one of the Presidential possibilities of 1940. He comes from a sturdy State, New Hampshire, where political virtues find deep root, a State which by the very narrow margin of 4,000 votes failed to achieve the political fame in 1936 of its neighbors, Maine and Vermont. New Hampshire, however, did cling to its Republican tradition in 1936 by electing its Governor, STYLES BRIDGES, to the United States Senate, and in 1938 reaffirmed its old allegiance by electing a Republican Governor.

Though separated by a continent, Oregon stands close beside New Hampshire and its stalwart neighbors. It was an Oregon Senator, the late Frederick Steiwer, who first denounced the surrender by the Congress of its constitutional lawmaking powers at the mandate of the Executive in the early days of the Roosevelt administration. It was the Oregon Republican Club which over 5 years ago organized to revitalize the party and to challenge the fundamental concepts of the so-called New Deal. It was Oregon which remained Republican in registration and swept Republican candidates to victory in 1938.

Tonight we stand at something of an interlude. We do not know the candidates of 1940 and we do not know just what the immediate issues will be. The violent change in international matters may sharply alter the current of domestic politics. It is therefore a most appropriate time to review the record of promise and achievement of the present political administration.

The Roosevelt battle cry in 1932 was to balance the Budget, enforce rigid economy by a 25-percent cut in expenditures. Begun heroically, the economy policy was followed by a season of extravagance not yet terminated, the like of which has never been seen in peacetime. This spending program has resulted in an increase of the national debt by some $25,000,000,000, a continuing unbalanced Budget, and the building of a vested interest in easy spending which will not easily be weaned from the public teat.

The initial attack on the depression took the form of the N. R. A., where big business and organized labor dictated the draft of a law which gave each powers leading to exploitation of the public. The N. R. A. broke down in practice, and it was a merciful court which uttered pax vobiscum over the emaciated form of Hugh Johnson's "blue eagle." Now the administration has swung from the N. R. A. legislation which fostered cartels and monopolies, to enforcement of the Sherman Antitrust Act, under a new apostle of reform.

Under the A. A. A. the Federal Government sought to curtail crop production, but Nature has proven a more powerful dictator than Secretary Wallace. Fickle rain and wind and sunshine have played havoc with the estimates of experts, and crop prices have fluctuated with the weather rather than the decrees from Washington. And growers have demonstrated that they can make reduced acres yield more by intensified cultivation.

But the great reform of the new administration was the money juggling act. By resorting to the common refuge of monarchs financially derelict this Government clipped its coinage, reduced the gold content of the dollar, repudiated the solemn covenant in its bonds in hopes that by this financial necromancy it could restore commodity prices.

You recall the seductive promise of Professor Pearson who sold the President this bill of goods, that by devaluing the dollar we would restore commodity prices to the level of 1926. That good Republican year was taken as the goal of perfection which this gold-dollar legerdemain would bring permanently to pass through the magic of managed currency. Alas for the dollar jugglers. Commodity prices never did reach the level of 1926, and just a few months ago the commodity price level sagged back nearly to its low levels at the depth of the depression; and the price of wheat (aside from the Government subsidy) was at the lowest level since the time of Queen Elizabeth.

The spurt of better times which followed in natural reaction from the depression was followed in 1937 by an abrupt recession. The President who in 1936 jubilantly proclaimed "We planned it that way, and don't let anybody tell you any differently" blamed the decline in business on his wicked enemies. The fact remains that it was not until the elections of 1938 had shown by Republican victories a definite turn toward conservative policies that business revival began and has gone forward quite independent of Washington.

Reference is sometimes made to social reforms promoted by the present national administration. But these reforms have been accompanied by the evoking of class hatreds, the imposition of burdensome taxes, and the crushing of the spirit of enterprise until the damage has exceeded the social benefits in many respects. It was the friendly smile of the President that encouraged forces in the labor movement so they felt they could unleash such threats at order as the sit-down strike in Michigan and the goon lawlessness in Oregon. No word of rebuke came from the President over such reversion to anarchy and jungle law.

Now, I do not recite these grievances merely to open old wounds. But it is timely when the smoke screen of foreign affairs is used to suppress political debate that the country be reminded that the domestic political issues are not in suspense and that there must be no relaxation of the effort of Republicans to present those issues intelligently and vigorously in the campaign of 1940.

As Chairman Hamilton, of the Republican National Committee, said in a recent address, "Nothing would be more disastrous to this Nation than an adjournment of politics which would permit a black-out of urgent domestic problems. As a party we would be faithless to our trust if we permitted what is happening in Europe to divert us from the task that is ours of correcting the errors of the past 6½ years and of redirecting our energies toward a useful and permanent recovery. * * * We must not forget that our domestic problems are just as vital, just as urgent, as they were in the weeks preceding the European war."

I recognize that in time of national crisis it is the duty of citizens regardless of party to rally behind its constituted leadership in unified support of this country's interests. I am certain that in the field of foreign affairs President Roosevelt will find the Republicans are Americans first and partisans second; that they will go as far as judgment and conscience permit in support of the President's foreign policy. But Republicans will not hesitate to present to the country ideas and policies either on the foreign or domestic front which they feel will best safeguard the rights of American citizens and promote their welfare. The "limited emergency" which is declared to exist does not extend to the suspension of free and honest discussion of political problems.

Suppose now we take a survey of the general political scene which confronts us at the present time. The most conspicuous feature of the political landscape is the condition and position of the Communist Party. Events of the last weeks have proven beyond the shadow of a doubt that the American Communist Party is nothing but an offshoot of the Comintern of Moscow. When Stalin says thumbs up, Browder puts his up; when Stalin says thumbs down, Browder reverses; and just now Browder and the New Masses and Daily Worker are doing a confusing wiggle waggle at the behest of Moscow. The embarrassment and discomfiture of the Browder-Stalin axis cannot be concealed. The strain on simple intelligence and intellectual honesty which loyalty to the "party line" entails has shattered the morale of party members and alienated the sympathies of the fellow travelers and pinko intelligentsia.

The bitter hatred of Communists for Hitler and Mussolini and the Fascist and Nazi idealogies led to the professed desertion of the ideal of revolution and the adoption of the "popular front" scheme by which the Communists sought to cooperate with so-called liberal and democratic groups to defeat the spread of fascism. Numerous subsidiaries with high-sounding labels were sponsored with Communists as guiding spirits which were used to lure leftists into the radical camp.

Imagine the shock that came with news of the political alliance of Russia and Germany, of Stalin and Hitler, the red star and the swastika. It was only a short time before that the Daily Worker said:

"The whispered lies to the effect that the Soviet Union will enter into a treaty with Nazi Germany is nothing but poison spread by the enemies of peace and democracy, the appeasement mongers, the Munich men of fascism."

It took the Daily Worker 24 hours to get its breath (or its instructions from Moscow), but then it made about face and lamely defended this marriage of convenience as one in the interest of peace and for the benefit of Poland. Now, as "reds" and "brownshirts" clasp hands over the prostrate form of Poland, the Communists in America are reduced to feeble whispers of approval of Russia's betrayal.

Why in a Republican address devote so much time to a discussion of the plight of the Communist Party? Simply because this Soviet-German alliance is one of the most significant events of the twentieth-century politics. Its effects will be far reaching. It cannot help but result in steady defection from Communist ranks, and may mark the shattering of the old Communist Party.

In America this Communist debacle will put a brake on the leftward movements which have been a manifest tendency during the past decade. With Soviet Russia revealed as a greedy nationalist and imperialist and with Communist leadership in this country exposed as an apish imitation of Moscow, American people who have been playing around with the pinks will desert their company like many-legged bugs which run from the sunlight when a plank is overturned.

The Republican Party has consistently stood for sound American principles with absolute divorce from the influences of alien doctrines. It stands now to gain as the people turn to the right and shun the bait of Moscow and the fury of Berlin.

But the Republican Party must brace itself and not allow itself to be swept off its feet in a tide of reaction. It must hold steadfast for rational progress. It must create a worth-while program for America, not just hold a wet finger to the wind to test the political breeze. It is both morally dishonest and politically inexpedient for Republicans to attempt to overreach the Democrats in gestures to the left. We do better if we occupy our historic role as a party which conserves the best in the past as it forges ahead to achieve the best for the future.

At this moment our party is casting about for the right leader who can weld together the various elements in the party, who has the confidence of all sections of the country, and who can be trusted to develop party policies which will solve as swiftly and correctly as may be the problems of our day. Various names have been suggested. The name of the brilliant district attorney of New York, Thomas E. Dewey, is mentioned. Another name viewed with favor in many quarters is that of ROBERT A. TAFT, of Ohio, Senator from that State, who with his wife paid a recent visit to Oregon where they proved pleasant guests and capable leaders. The veteran, Senator VANDENBERG, of Michigan, has a strong following and has a fine record of discriminating and fearless appraisal of the numerous legislative proposals under the New Deal regime. Senator STYLES BRIDGES, who was to have been our speaker here tonight, is also a young man of promise and capacity.

As I survey the scene, however, I believe that Oregon Republicans should present as candidate for the Presidency before the 1940 Republican National Convention the name of CHARLES L. MCNARY, senior Senator from Oregon. Senator MCNARY has a long and distinguished record as a Member of the United States Senate. As minority leader he has guided the Republican Party in the Senate with skill and wisdom. He represents the best type of thinking of the Republican Party, a worthy blend of conservatism with progressivism. He is in high personal favor with all of his colleagues. He is a man of independence of judgment, yet one who is sensitive to the needs of the country. A native son, he can also be presented as a favorite son of Oregon.

With characteristic modesty, Senator MCNARY will doubtless be unwilling to seek the nomination. His friends, however, should carry his banner and solicit the support of other Western States in his behalf. Let it be a case of the nomination seeking the man, not the man seeking the nomination.

So much for leadership. Now let us consider practical issues.

The initial problem in this country is to rebuild economic life with wide diffusion of prosperity and do it within the democratic framework. The present administration has produced no adequate solution. When the collapse came in 1937 its only answer was renewal of spending with deficit financing. Comparative statistics show that the degree of recovery in foreign countries has been much more rapid than in this country.

There are those who claim that we shall not again see general prosperity in this country, who say that the closing of the frontier marks the end of the period of great industrial expansion. Similar claims have been made in the past but the genius of the American people has reasserted itself and after a pause the country has moved forward to greater heights of prosperity. We reached the end of the supply of good lands for homesteads in 1890 but the level of economic well-being continued to rise for 40 years. There is no known limit to the frontiers of inventive genius and society has by no means fully satisfied its wants.

The error of the New Deal is to think that Government action will cure all our economic woes. Business activity depends on the work and the enterprise of millions of men and women. The proper function of government is to keep clear the channels of commerce depending on the natural stimulus of individual activity to use those channels in the movement of goods and furnishing of needed services. Native economic instincts will assert themselves unless they are oppressed or blighted.

We will get economic health when the people of the country feel safe to adventure and when the prospect for enterprise is one of reasonable gain for the risk involved. When war broke out, the memory of past profits immediately whetted the appetites of speculators and investors and prompted a spurt of activity. That is a most unfortunate spark to ignite the motor of business. But the circumstances show that people are ready to adventure when they think the conditions are propitious.

Conditions have not been propitious for a long term of years. The depression was a natural aftermath of extravagance and overspeculation plus a readjustment from wartime inflation. This depression was prolonged by the antibusiness attitude on the part of the national administration. Now the normal business needs of the country are forcing a degree of recovery in spite of fears of political activity from Washington. It is altogether reasonable to expect that the return of Republicans to power would help renew faith in the stability of our economic system and encourage again the flow of capital into investment and the employment of labor.

The Republicans further should take a stand which recognizes the supreme worth of the individual, which decries regimentation and bureaucratic interference. Keep life alive at its roots if you want flowers and fruit. Encourage individual citizens in self-reliance and in initiative and enterprise, and you reinforce the very foundations of society. The only atmosphere in which such individual activity will nourish is one of freedom. Not without cause is it true that the countries with the widest and richest economic development are those where liberty is maintained and the worth of the individual man recognized.

Republicans also must move toward a sound fiscal system. We cannot keep on indefinitely piling up the national debt. The speeding up of the tempo of business will enable the Government to reduce some of its expenditures, especially in the field of relief, and will provide the added income needed to carry and to retire in orderly manner the national debt. I believe the country can carry its debt load if employment gains and business revives. Unless we soon put our financial house in order there will be ultimate breakdown which will cause ruin to all classes of people.

So much for domestic issues. I turn now to a consideration of America's foreign policy and the wise course for the Republican Party to espouse. At present a great controversy is raging over repeal or alteration of the present neutrality law. There is a sharp division of opinion over the change, but this difference is not on party lines.

We hear a great deal about keeping America out of war. Considerable public hysteria prevails. It is easy to observe a sort of fatalism in public thinking, an assumption that we are drifting into war, which, of course, inspires a frantic attempt to avoid the drop over the precipice.

This assumpetion is not warranted either in history or in a reasonable view of the present situation. War in Europe is not new. In truth, nearly every valley in Europe has been harrowed by war. For centuries armies have marched and countermarched. Sometimes they have fought wars of religion. Sometimes they have fought in the rivalries of royal dynasties. Sometimes they have fought for conquest, and sometimes, as Carlyle said of the Seven Year's War, that Louis XV's harlot "might take revenge for an epigram." Just now the contest appears to be one of imperialism, the battle over territory and power. It is also a contest between rival philosophies of human relations—the authoritarian idea of fascism against the democratic idea represented by France and England.

This is not the first time in looking across the ocean at embattled Europe our people have been swayed in their sympathies toward one side or the other. During Washington's administration republican France with its new gospel of "liberty, equality, fraternity," had widespread approval in this country. So manifest was this sentiment that the French Minister, Citizen Genet, presuming on this fact, violated our regulations for neutrality and his recall was demanded of the French directory. The policy of neutrality adopted by Washington with the approval of Jefferson and Hamilton of his Cabinet proved sound. Harried as we were when England and Napoleon were locked in death grapple, that policy proved the salvation of the infant nation. When finally violation of our national rights did lead to the second war with England, we entered as principal and not as an ally.

Do you realize that the United States is now the oldest of all the governments in the world? From our vantage point behind the moat of the Atlantic Ocean we have seen empires rise and fall, have seen revolutions "devour their own children." We saw Napoleon overrun Europe and topple over kingdoms. Then we saw his sun wane in the twilight of Waterloo and go out in the obscurity of St. Helena. We saw Bismarck forge a German Empire with Prussia as its core, and then saw it collapse in the defeat of the Kaiser's armies in the World War. We saw modern Italy emerge under the leadership of Garibaldi and Cavour, and now have seen it reach a none too secure pinnacle under the dominance of Mussolini. We saw the ancient house of the Romanoffs pass to the slaughter in the Russian revolution from which a new and strange political system has sprung. We have seen Great Britain substantially readjust its powers of government and finally surrender its authority to a British commonwealth of nations. All this in the brief century and a half of America's constitutional history.

Here the house of our fathers is yet habitable. It has withstood the fires of civil strife and the storms of foreign war. But in the political vulcanism which attends modern warfare we do not know how long it might survive. Fighting a war to preserve democracy puts the country immediately under a dictatorship. What assurance would we have, if the war were costly and prolonged, that at its close the powers of the Government would be relaxed and the rights of citizens restored?

There is another reason why America should not throw itself as a sacrifice on the altar of the war god, and that is the need to preserve an area where western culture may still flourish. I do not think the present war means the downfall of western civilization, but certainly in the countries involved the springs of culture will be dried up for a period. America then can serve as the city of refuge for art and music and learning. Most of all it can serve as the haven of liberty. France gave us Bartholdi's Statue of Liberty whose flaming torch still beckons toward war-torn Europe, a beacon glowing, we hope as long as the race endures, in testimony that here human freedom flourishes.

I speak as I do, not from craven fear of the sacrifices which war might entail and not out of a narrow chauvinism. Certainly I deplore the spirit of the pharisee who beats his breast in self-gratification over his good fortune in living in America and scorns the poor publicans whose lot is cast by fate in the warring nations of Europe. I recognize, too, that this country cannot fully insulate itself from the remainder of the world. We cannot tell with a world in flames just how far the brands will be carried. But let us establish our lines of defense within the traditional zone of American interests.

What foreign policy then should the Republican Party espouse? I respond that it should reaffirm, but with different emphasis, its traditional policy of protection. In the years since the Civil War the Republican Party was known as the party of protection. It stood for protection of the American manufacturer, the American farmer, and the American workingman. We do not hear so much about it now, perhaps because the Democrats have gone high tariff, too. But the old watchword still has force.

Let the Republican Party stand for protection of American homes and American youth against participation in foreign wars.

Let the Republican Party stand for the protection, by force if need be, of this country as the citadel of human liberty. Let us by friendly association with other nations be ready to help rebuild the stricken lands when the agony of war passes. In thus effectively protecting American interests on the foreign front the Republican Party can in the years ahead render as valuable service to the country as it did through its policy of domestic protection in the years of our expanding industry and commerce.

The Republican Party had a mission in the past—it has a duty at the present and an opportunity for the future. Under leadership with clean hands and strong hearts it can make a vital contribution in directing the destinies of this great people. It must not in its zeal for power sacrifice principle, but it must be alert to keep its policies abreast of the true needs of the people.

Let us as Oregon Republicans meet the challenge of 1940 as we did that of 1938, with definite determination to rebuild and revitalize the party as an instrument of government in the common good.

Stay Out, America—Article From Liberty

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ROBERT R. REYNOLDS

OF NORTH CAROLINA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Saturday, October 14 (legislative day of Wednesday, October 4), 1939

ARTICLE FROM LIBERTY OF OCTOBER 21, 1939

Mr. REYNOLDS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the Appendix of the RECORD an article from Liberty entitled "Stay Out, America."

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From Liberty of October 21, 1939]

STAY OUT, AMERICA

SHALL WE FIGHT AGAIN?—A GRIM WORD FROM SOME WHO KNOW WHAT IT WOULD MEAN

Few Americans know so much about what war must mean as those American correspondents who reported the last war. For these men saw that conflict more humanly than generals behind the lines; more vividly than our industrialists and workers at home, our diplomats abroad; even more fully than the A. E. F. doughboy.

The following opinions come from some of our country's most prominent foreign correspondents, members of the recently organized Overseas Press Club of America:

Reginald Wright Kauffman, accredited correspondent with American, French, British, and Belgian Armies and United States Navy for North American Syndicate; covered peace conferences; established and for 4 years headed New York Herald Tribune's League of Nations news bureau at Geneva:

"Twenty-odd years ago Europe's 'democracies' charmed the United States into winning a World War for them to save democracy. Our share: Over 132,000 killed, about 200,000 wounded, God knows how many permanently diseased. Today those 'democracies' are asking us to fight persecutors, dictatorships, totalitarians.

"Well, Germany is certainly not a democracy. But who are their antipersecutors, antidictatorship, antitotalitarians who want us to join them, and what have they lined up? Great Britain, who has surrendered Palestinian Jews to Palestinian Mohammedans. France, who has sky-bombed the citizens of her Syrian mandate. And Poland, a triumvirate. And how are we to play our part? With money and boys. Also by cementing our alliance to the Latin American republics. Twenty-one 'republics'—14 of them frank dictatorships. Also by becoming totalitarian ourselves.

"Do you want to go on?"

Henry Wales; served abroad for New York World, Chicago Tribune, International News Service; attached to A. E. F.'s G. H. Q.; reported peace conferences, League of Nations, Mussolini's march on Rome, Hitler's putsch, etc.:

"Let America refuse to be 'drawn into' a European war by emotion or misconception. Let America realize she is an 'economic empire' committed by her vast interests to protect her foreign trade. If in so doing she joins a coalition to defend her commerce from a raiding aggressor, let America take a firm stand for justice in the resulting peace negotiations. Let the American plenipotentiaries then remember the bitter lessons of the Paris conferences of 1919. Delegates, technical advisers, 'experts' of all nations warned Lloyd George and Clemenceau that the unjust conditions would sow dragon's teeth. They are ready now for the reaping."

Wythe Williams; Paris correspondent of the New York Times during World War, later representing Philadelphia Ledger and Paris Temps. Reported on entire western front, all peace conferences, all subsequent reparations and debt negotiations, to 1936. Now editor of Greenwich (Conn.) Time:

" 'We do not repudiate, neither do we pay.' This might be taken as the wall motto of our former European associates in regard to cash and kind advanced by the United States for the promotion of the World War.

"It was in evidence almost immediately after the signing of the Versailles Treaty, but a few 'token' payments—about a dime's worth in relation to the whole—were sufficient to blind us. And so we permitted a post-war debt to more than double the amount already due.

"Today the European hand already is outstretched, hopeful that our vision is not yet restored."

Herbert Corey, World War correspondent for Cincinnati Times-Star and the Associated Newspapers on all western fronts, including Serbian. Now a Washington correspondent and magazine writer:

"Shortly after the armistice I interviewed Gen. Wilhelm Groener, who had succeeded Ludendorff as quartermaster general of the German Army. He said:

" 'When you Americans came in, the war had reached a stalemate. We could not have moved forward. Neither could the Allies have moved us back. The Americans broke every rule of tactics and strategy. But they were young, enthusiastic, fearless, and they broke our lines. They lost 10 men where 1 veteran would have been lost. But—they won the war.'

"Our American participation in that war was a growing pain of a great nation. We were fooled into it. We paid a good part of the bill. Every promise made to us was broken. But that growing pain may have matured us nationally. Perhaps this time we will not be coaxed into being the sucker in the game of power politics."

Leland Stowe, former chief of the Paris bureau of the New York Herald Tribune; covered the western front, all important conferences. Spanish revolution, rise to power of both Mussolini and Hitler. Author of Nazi Means War:

"I could write about the horrors of the bombings in Spain; about the red pulp of women's and children's bodies. But no human being will ever conceive these things until he's seen and smelled and felt them. Few people believe in hell until they get there.

"So what? So who blew to bits thousands of Spanish and Chinese civilians? Who put 10,000,000 Czechoslovakians under Hitler's heel? Who intends to draft millions of America's youth for another world war? Who?

"Not merely Hitler and Mussolini and Franco and the Japanese. What about their accessories in the crime of war? The list is long. It includes Neville Chamberlain, and Daladier and Bonnet, of France, at its very top. But it also includes plenty of Americans—all those in democratic lands who knife democracy in somebody else's country. If we don't want Hitlerism, we must stand united against everything that Hitlerism represents.

"Sentimentalism won't keep America out of war. Adherence to the principles of human freedom, integrity, courage to face facts—these might."

Eugene Lyons, United Press war correspondent and representative at peace and subsequent conferences. Sent to Russia, he wrote, after first-hand experience, Assignment in Utopia. Now editor of the American Mercury.

"Surely no one in his senses can miss the horrible irony of the slogans under which the World War of 1914–18 was fought. It looks, indeed, as if those slogans were badly mixed—so that it became a war to end all democracy and make the world safe for war. When the history of our times is summed up, that World War will mark the boundary of democractic development, after which it declined disastrously. Let us not flatter ourselves that we have escaped the general decline. Movements and philosophies of suppression—antidemocratic, whatever their pretensions—have been flourishing throughout the United States.

"When the first World War so definitely retarded democracy, it would be folly to suppose that a second World War could reverse the process."

Pending Neutrality Legislation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN G. TOWNSEND, JR.

OF DELAWARE

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, October 16 (legislative day of Wednesday, October 4), 1939

RADIO ADDRESS BY HON. CHARLES L. McNARY, OF OREGON

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that an address relating to the proposal for revision of our neutrality legislation delivered by the Senate minority leader, the Senator from Oregon [Mr. McNARY] on Sunday evening, October 15, over the Mutual Broadcasting System be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

In discussing proposals for revision of our neutrality legislation, I believe that we should concede at the outset that all of us have a common objective, namely, to do that which will keep the United States out of war. I do not believe there is a man in Congress who again wants to see the blood of America's fine youth spilled on foreign battlefields. It may be observed that our distinguished President shares the same view. Each of us, whatever our views on particular questions, wishes to do that which will best protect our own country and its people.

This was the objective we all had in mind back in 1935 when Congress enacted the first Neutrality Act. In that legislation we believed that one of the most effective ways of staying out of war was to refuse to sell arms and munitions to countries that resorted to war. Most of us then felt—and many of us still feel—that our unrestricted sale of arms and munitions during the World War was a major reason why we became involved in that conflict. We felt that one practical method of avoiding war was to say to our people: "You must forego the profits from the sale of arms and munitions to countries at war in order that the peace of your own country might be preserved." Congress overwhelmingly adopted that resolution and the President approved it. It became the national policy of our Government.

Some months later Congress again approved an embargo on the exportation of arms, ammunition, and implements of war. On that occasion the vote in the House was 353 to 27 and so unanimous was the support of the embargo in the Senate that a roll call was not demanded. In 1937 Congress again approved an embargo on arms, ammunition, and implements of war in legislation containing other safeguards for our neutrality, which are not now in serious dispute. The Senate passed the 1937 legislation by a vote of 63 to 6, while the vote in the House of Representatives was 376 to 13. The President likewise gave his warm approval to these measures. Indeed, the President in the summer of 1936 enthusiastically endorsed such provisions as the arms embargo as "new weapons with which to maintain our neutrality" in time of war abroad. And, on that occasion, the President warned us to be on our guard against those, seeking "fool's gold," who would, when war came, attempt to "break down or evade our neutrality."

My only purpose in citing this brief bit of history is to indicate to you that the present arms embargo was adopted only after the most thoughtful deliberation, with the approval of the President, repeatedly expressed, and with virtually the unanimous support of all parties and factions in Congress.

In this legislation we believed we had taken a practical step, with a minimum of damage to the American economic system, toward avoiding incidents that lead to war. None ever contended it was perfect legislation. You cannot have perfect legislation in regard to neutrality or any other very important subject. But we thought it was a practical and a sound way to safeguard our country from war.

Now we are asked to repeal the arms embargo which has been our national policy for more than 4 years. In view of the purpose for which this law was three times enacted so overwhelmingly, surely the burden of demonstrating why the embargo should be lifted rests on those who advocate such a course. Beyond all shadow of doubt they should prove to us that repeal of the embargo is in the best interests of this Nation. If they do not, then the arms embargo should be maintained.

Unless it can be shown that repeal of the arms embargo will better serve our domestic interests than its maintenance, then it should not be repealed. Reasons which spring out of the effect of the present embargo on other nations are beside the point. The American Congress has a duty to legislate for the best interests of the American people, not for the benefit of some foreign power.

In the few weeks since the Senate started debate on this issue I have not heard advanced a single argument which adequately demonstrates how repeal of the embargo would serve our domestic considerations. Surprisingly, I have heard it suggested that we should repeal the arms embargo in order to give assistance to one group of nations at war against the other belligerent. This seems to be the real reason why repeal of the arms embargo has been proposed.

Yet I do not wonder at the timidity with which this reason is advanced. It is a shocking suggestion that we should repeal a domestic law, designed to keep us at peace, for the purpose of helping one group of belligerents. Clearly such action, for that reason, would be participation in the war. It would be an unneutral action and it would be an action that might cost us dearly. Indeed, it might be the very means of involving us in the war, which is the very thing we are seeking to avoid. Why should we take that risk?

Those of us who remember the years from 1914 to 1917 know the part which the American export of arms and munitions to the Allies played in arousing the hatred of the German nation against us. So bitter did the Germans become as they learned that American guns and shells were killing their men that actually they attacked this country in the submarine warfare. They sought to stir up one of our neighboring nations against us. In their desperation the Germans determined to stop the exports of American munitions at all costs. There was nothing for President Wilson to do but acknowledge these attacks on us and ask Congress formally to declare the war which already existed.

I now hear Members of Congress saying that they will never vote for the involvements of this country in war. But what else can they do if the events of 1914 to 1917 are repeated? The important thing is not to undo what we have done to prevent such a chain of events from beginning. The wise thing is to prevent the incidents which force on us the duty of making such a terrifying decision.

Yet it is now contended that there is no real distinction between the arms, ammunition, and implements of war now under embargo and other commodities useful in war. Of course there are distinctions, very real and practical distinctions, and there are psychological differences. There were very important differences 25 years ago. There are important differences now. Export of American cotton and wheat and other raw materials would never enrage a people as American exports of arms and munitions to the Allies enraged the Germans in the years 1914 to 1917. It was the sale of these murderous articles in those years which contained the seeds of involvement in war for us.

And what do those who urge repeal of the arms embargo have to say to the proposition that munitions which we would now export may be used a year or two hence against our own boys, should we, and may God forbid it, become involved in this terrible conflict? Who knows the course this war may take? Who knows what alliances may be made if it continues for a year or two? Already we have seen such unexpected developments as the alliance of the Russian bear and the Nazi swastika. Is it not wiser to keep our arms and munitions out of the hands of the fighting countries? Is it not wiser to keep them at home to build up our national-defense needs? Let us take every precaution possible to keep out of war, but we should do nothing to impair, even in the slightest degree, our own Nation's defense forces.

Entirely aside from repeal of the arms embargo, I am opposed to the pending bill in the Senate, because it does impair our national defenses. Advocates of repeal of the arms embargo apparently are aware that if that safeguard is wiped out it will leave a gaping hole in the ramparts of our neutrality. I say they apparently are aware of this, because they have made desperate efforts to plug up this hole by drastic and stringent provisions in other directions.

For instance, they have undertaken to make it unlawful for an American ship to carry any passengers or any articles or materials to any nation at war. This means that American ships cannot carry passengers or cargoes from the port of Seattle to Vancouver or Victoria in Canada. It means an end, for the duration of the war, of any ocean-borne commerce in American ships from Baltimore, New York, or Boston to Canadian ports. It means that American ships must surrender their peacetime business in the Pacific with such places as Australia, New Zealand, and Indochina, and in the Atlantic with Bermuda, the Bahamas, Nassau, Jamaica, and French Martinique. To make it clear, let me repeat that this provision in the Pittman bill forbids American vessels to carry passengers and cargoes to any of these places—not just war material but any kind of cargo.

Now, it is obvious that this is an unnecessary and burdensome restriction on American shipping. Our purpose in placing restrictions on our citizens in connection with neutrality legislation is to avoid dangerous contacts which might involve the Nation in war. What danger can there be to American vessels engaged in their ordinary peacetime trade between Portland or Seattle and the Canadian ports of the British Northwest? Does anyone seriously suppose that these ships will be subjected to submarine hazards from nations involved in war in Europe? Of course not. In this restriction we are needlessly harassing our own citizens.

Yet, while that restriction has been made too drastic, the sponsors of the pending bill have left in it a loophole large enough to drive an armored car through, as one correspondent has described it. I refer to the omission from this bill of any provision making it unlawful for American ships to carry arms, ammunition, and implements of war to neutral countries for transshipment to nations at war. Under the present law that is forbidden. But if the arms embargo is repealed, American ships lawfully could carry bombs and shells and poison gas to certain neutral countries in Europe, from whence they could be transshipped to the belligerents. They could do this under the proposed substitute unless the President exercised the discretion granted him to declare combat zones. It may be said that, of course, the President would prevent such shipments by exercising that discretion. Very well; but if the President prescribes combat areas sufficiently extensive to close up this loophole, then he will take American-flag ships completely out of European and Mediterranean waters. Indeed, American ships will have to confine their foreign activities to the Latin American and Asiatic trade.

My concern is over what would happen to our merchant marine under such drastic restrictions, particularly if this war should go on for a few years, as some observers think possible. Obviously, we shall not go on building merchant ships if there is no need for them. Obviously, under such restrictions, a part of the merchant marine we now possess will have to be laid up and will deteriorate. When that happens, we have impaired our national defense.

The first line of our national defense has been our Navy and our merchant marine. The theory underlying the hundreds of millions of dollars which the Government has spent in subsidies for shipping has been that we were in reality contributing to our national defense. We have long recognized the American merchant ships as an auxiliary in time of war to our Navy and an integral part of our national defense. Yet, in the neutrality bill now before the Senate, we undertake to undermine much of the progress made toward this necessary protection.

What is the more bewildering, there is no real need for such action. If the arms embargo is left in our law, many of the problems sought to be reached by such drastic restrictions against shipping will disappear. Let us by every means seek to protect our neutrality, but let us be practical and realistic, and let us not do irreparable damage to ourselves. We should keep the arms embargo and see to it that our national defense is unimpaired and adequate. In my opinion, by this course of action we will guarantee our neutrality, insure our safety, and maintain our peace with all the nations of the earth.

Pending Neutrality Legislation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ALEXANDER WILEY

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, October 16 (legislative day of Wednesday, October 4), 1939

RADIO ADDRESS BY HON. ALEXANDER WILEY, OF WISCONSIN

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a radio address delivered by myself on Sunday night, October 15, 1939, relative to the pending neutrality legislation.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Ladies and gentlemen, on this Sabbath evening I am happy to speak to you on the subject of peacetime patriotism and about the neutrality debate in Congress. It may be a surprise to my radio audience not to hear a partisan talk on the neutrality issue, but let me say at the outset that I am more interested in the things on which we can agree than in the points on which we might differ. Unity and harmony among our people are always desirable, but in times of stress they are essential. This is a talk concerned with our great common objective—peace for America. Possibly our discussion tonight will be unique because it will be neither for nor against the embargo. Is it though so strange that in a debate on neutrality some of us should remain neutral and reserve our judgment until all the evidence is in? I was not a Member of the Senate when the present law was passed and have listened attentively to nearly every speech made on both sides of this question. It is my hope that what I have to say, then, will serve in these days of political tension and international crisis as a guidepost to a sober and analytical approach to our problem. It is of transcendent importance that we, without prejudice, rancor, hate, or hysteria, approach this subject.

Speaking before the world-wide Interparliamentary Union in Oslo, Norway, just a few days before war broke out, I stated: "From every land in Europe, America has drawn her bloodstream. Your culture has enriched our lives. Your music, your literature, your drama, your great ideas in economics, philosophy, religion, we have made our own. But, Mr. President, you have something we do not want. I refer to those large barriers of fear, hatred, and distrust erected between your nations by centuries of fear, hatred, and distrust. Yes; we owe you much. We know the world is small. We are neighbors. We want to help you, but your problems are so intricate. There are so many equations that we do not understand. I say we want to help, but we want to help you to help yourselves to the end that your problems may find solution through you. We want to be helpful, but America does not want to meddle in Europe. The role of a meddler I do not crave for my country."

America is confronted today with the problem of how to remain at peace.

No straight-thinking citizen wants America to get into war, and, of course, it is the obligation of everyone to do all in his power to avert it. To each of us, then, comes the challenge to maintain peace here in America and to contribute toward its establishment in the world. We have heard from each side in the debate in Congress statements to the effect that if the Congress does not do what that side desires it will have a tendency to precipitate us into war.

My main thesis tonight, if I have one, is to deny the truth of such a statement. In that respect, I say both those who contend for the resolution and those who contend against it are mistaken. And I say further, when such arguments are used, a great injury may be done to the Nation.

I heard one Senator ask another not long ago, "Do you think it would have been better if the President had not convened the Congress in special session to debate this issue?" And the second Senator said "yes." I asked, "Why?" The answer given was substantially as follows: "You know why. Look at the mental state the country is in. Look at the contentions which are made by the partisans in this debate—each side claims that if it does not succeed this country might get into war. Look at the letters as they come in, showing that many of the people do not fully understand the issues which are involved. Millions of them apparently think Congress is voting on war or peace. Millions have had their blood pressure built up to almost a bursting point under the impression that this is one of the great momentous occasions in history. And when the affair is over, millions of people on the losing side will be of the opinion that Congress has sold out America. "Don't you think," this Senator continued, "it would have been better not to have had all these fireworks, all this blowing off of steam, all this fear, agitation, and hysteria?"

He presented this argument with such force that I was prone to answer in the affirmative, but I hesitated, and then said "No." When the debate is closed and the people settle down to a contemplation of these "feverish weeks" they will realize first that there was no need for them to get unduly agitated. Secondly, they will realize that many of them have been victims of propaganda, misinformation, and illogical thinking. Thirdly, they will be prepared if and when a real occasion arises to think more clearly, and act more rationally. Fourth, they will realize that they have had an experience similar to many of the experiences that some of the people in Europe went through time and time again before they finally surrendered their liberties to a ruling group.

I believe this experience will bring to the consciousness of the people the realization that this Nation is made up of individuals, and as these individuals think and act so will the Nation. Fifth, I believe also, that out of this experience the people will realize the need of unity. They will see that there are forces which would split them asunder. They will realize that by centering their thought and energy upon America and America's needs, and thinking less about other countries, they will find here that which will bring about national unification for the great purpose and object of peace.

The people are realizing more and more that this war in Europe is not our war, and they are beginning to feel, in spite of excited radio expounders, that no American war is even remotely in sight.

This debate has developed for the knowledge of our people the significant position and power of the United States of America. With our wealth and our manpower we could reach out and seize more land, more peoples, as is being done in Europe and in the east, but here there is no such desire. But with this wealth and this power we owe an obligation both to the present and the future. In 1917 we entered the World War with our manpower and our power of finance to advance the cause of democracy, the freedom of mankind everywhere, and the peace of the world. We did a good job—an unselfish one. We got nothing in return for it, but we learned a lesson then, and it is this—by war and through war democracy and peace are not advanced. We know further that if we got into another war it might destroy our democracy. It would bring no peace; it would bring degradation, suffering, and destruction.

Without preeminent position on this globe we cannot hide behind the door of the present and think we have looked after the obligation that is ours. Economics, as everyone knows, is a large factor in peace and war. When this war is over—yes, perhaps before this war is over—there will be found the way, because of our preeminent position in the world of economics—we have the money, we have the men, we have the power—the way which will lead to peace. Let us then study this economic weapon we possess. Perhaps therein will be found the solution for war.

In the debate in the Senate it is admitted by both sides that this European war is not our war and that we must stay out of it. It is contended, however, by each side that if Congress fails to do what that side desires, it might mean America's involvement. It has been customary for many of the speakers to depict the horrors of war. (Most of them haven't gotten within a hundred miles of the pictures drawn recently by Van Pasen—what he saw.)

One side in the argument lashes England and France. The other side does the same to Hitler. One side maximizes the amount of trade that will result from the sale of munitions and implements of war; the other side minimizes. Neither side argues for a total embargo on everything, knowing that it would not work.

With the lights of democracy flickering out all over Europe our job, yours and mine, like that of the keeper of the lighthouse, is to keep the light of democracy burning in America and not leave it in a futile attempt to salvage the wrecks on foreign shores.

What Congress does in shaping America's foreign policy will be shouted from the roof tops all over America as a 7-day wonder. It will meet both with thunderous acclaim and storms of disapproval. But, my friends, therein is not found the answer.

The answer will be found in whether or not America is successful in keeping out of war. Our job, then, is to see that America stays at peace with the world. Our job is to see that a foreign policy is created which will protect and defend America. Is it not possible, my friends, strawmen have been set up on both sides in this debate? Is it not possible that we are battling over an embargo policy that is not nearly as important as retaining our mental balance? Suppose we retain the embargo. It is claimed that it works to the advantage of Germany. If that is true she certainly will not declare war if we retain it. On the other hand, Great Britain and France are not going to declare war if we retain it. Suppose that Congress repeals the embargo law. If that works to the advantage of Great Britain and France as the maintenance of its works to the advantage of Germany, they won't declare war on us for its withdrawal. Germany may not like it, but certainly she would rather endure it than draw us into the conflict on the side of the Allies. This is a time for sane, deliberate thinking. The people are interested in how to keep America out of war. This is the primary issue. Fortunately the people are realizing that the repeal of the Embargo Act, or the failure to repeal it, will not get us into the war.

In view of this war talk in and out of Congress—who wants war?

You know and I know that labor does not want war.

You know and I know that big business does not want war.

You know and I know that the clergy and the professional men, and the mothers and fathers of America, do not want war.

You know and I know that no Congressman or Senator wants war.

You know and I know that Cabinet members do not want war.

You know and I know that the President does not want war.

We repeat, who, then, in America wants war? No one.

What, then, is the excitement all about? It relates to the repeal or the failure to repeal the present Embargo Act; and partisans on both sides of the fence, as I have said, have argued, and are ready to argue, to sustain their position, that war might come if you do not follow the course they suggest.

I say to you that war will not come as the result of either the repeal or failure to repeal the present act.

What then are the factors which will determine peace or war for America?

First, Chancelor Hitler (and perhaps Stalin)—and what he does in the future.

Second. The American people—and what they do in the future.

Third. The political leadership of America—and what it does in the future.

I need not go into detail as to the first one of these factors which will contribute toward war or peace for America—"Chancelor Hitler and what he does in the future." It suffices to say that if he should violate the neutrality of Belgium or Holland, should open up a gas war or an acid war, or a germ war that it would have a tendency to make a large percentage of our people see red. If Chancelor Hitler should send agents to this country who would duplicate what was done previous to our entry into the World War, agents who would sabotage our property, that too would have significant consequences. Whatever you may say about Chancelor Hitler you have to admit that he is a shrewd individual and he knows that in any war if he had American resources, American troops, and American ships against him he would go down. He will do everything to avoid a conflict with America.

I have come to the second factor which will be determinative of peace or war in which America may become involved. It is this: "The American people and what they do in the future." Therefore, we ask the question, What can the average American do to keep the covenant of peace—to practice "peacetime patriotism"?

I answer that question as follows:

First. He can keep calm and not allow an emotional bias to sway his judgment.

Second. He can keep in mind the fundamental truth that we have nothing to gain and everything to lose by participating in another war. He must aid in balancing our economy, so it will be shock proof against excess wartime demand and profits.

Third. He can keep in mind that it is not our job to settle European disputes—or meddle in Europe.

Fourth. He can refuse to accept any war propaganda from any side, remembering that his obligation is to remain pro-American.

Fifth. He can express his mandate to newspapers and radio stations all over America that America is not to be terrorized by scare headlines which inflame American emotions—that war news presentations must be strictly factual—must be torn from their boldface prominence to a more fitting obscurity. Our domestic problems are far more important to America than Europe's war. Let our newspapers and radio stations concentrate on putting the emphasis of American attention back where it belongs—back on America. That is not a callous indifference. It's one intelligent way to preserve American democracy as a beacon light for war-torn Europe. This is no panicky head-in-the-sand escape from realities. It is a realistic approach. Take Europe out of the headlines and put America back in the forefront of American consciousness.

Sixth. The average American can concentrate on American peace rather than European war. The average American can stop picking sides. Neutrality begins in the mind of the individual not in the legislative halls. When we think unneutral thoughts we're scuttling American peace.

Seventh. The average American can realize that his voice is the most potent in the world. He can accept the challenge to find the way to embargo war.

Eighth. In general, the average American can think less of Europe and more of America.

Thus far we have discussed two of the factors which make for war or peace: Hitler and his future acts, and the American people and their future acts.

The next determining factor is the political leadership of America and its future acts. How can that leadership practice peacetime patriotism?

First. The political leadership of America, both executive and legislative, can write a moratorium on politics where peace is at stake and follow the same peacetime credo that we have just outlined for the average American.

Second. The political leadership of America, both legislative and executive, can give more time to the consideration of Washington's advice—no entangling alliances—remembering that alliances, financial and economic, may be as dangerous to peace as alliances political.

Third. The political leadership of America can accomplish a constructive purpose by standing for an added check on the dogs of war—aiding in getting a war referendum amendment passed, making it necessary for Congress to have a mandate from the people before this Nation can engage in foreign war.

Fourth. The political leadership of America can formulate legislation and plans that not only will aid our national economy now but will especially prepare for the shocks and problems that will arise when this war in Europe ceases.

Fifth. The political leadership of America can define and restrict the powers of the Executive in relation to our foreign affairs. Rightly or wrongly, the haunting precedent of totalitarian states makes the average American fearful of the encroachment of any one man on the powers that must be shared in a republic.

Sixth. The political leadership of America can stimulate trade with South America and other noncombatant countries; think our farm problem through; think our labor-capital problem through, and solve these problems.

Seventh. The political leadership of America can reinstate in the American people a feeling of confidence; it can demonstrate the Government's ability to balance the Budget; it can get rid of government by experts and return the Government to the people.

Grave as the European situation appears, we in America need not be appalled—need not fear and distrust the future of our country. Men's minds here are alert, independent. They are not palsied—they are active. We are arising to meet the challenge head-on, and my faith is that it will be met and America will remain at peace. In spite of the fear mongers and the hysteria begetters, I am glad to ascertain that more and more people are coming to the conclusion that we will not be drawn into this European war. They are realizing that Congress alone has the power to declare war, and that this power is the greatest insulation against America's involvement.

Let us "trust in the Lord with all our hearts and lean not unto our own understanding." If "in all our ways we acknowledge Him, He will direct our path" and America will remain at peace.

Address Before American Legion, Department of Maryland

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. SHERMAN MINTON

OF INDIANA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, October 16 (legislative day of Wednesday, October 4), 1939

ADDRESS BY HON. PAUL V. McNUTT, FEDERAL SECURITY ADMINISTRATOR

Mr. MINTON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an address delivered at Baltimore, Md., on October 14, 1939, before Social Security Board Post 142 of the American Legion, Department of Maryland, by Hon. Paul V. McNutt, Federal Security Administrator.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

I count it a double privilege to meet with you here tonight; first, because I share your allegiance to this great Legion, under which those of us who have served our Nation in war have carried on its ideals in times of peace; second, because we are all of us working at the same task—that of administering Federal activities through which the American people have set out to make social security a reality on their jobs and in their homes. Our paths, both as members of the American Legion and as public servants engaged in social-security activities, lead in converging lines toward the same goal—that of realizing the full promise of American life, of making this country a better, safer, and freer place to live.

Two of the most important steps the Federal Government has taken in this direction have occurred within the past few months—the establishment of the Federal Security Agency in July and the strengthening of the Social Security Act through the amendments passed in August.

In grouping the Social Security Board and its five fellow agencies under our new overhead organization, the President's reorganization plan looked toward economy and efficiency—and much more. In bringing together major Government services for the welfare of the family and its individual members, this action unified a policy; it set an objective. The President himself has stated the purpose toward which all of us are working: "To promote social and economic security, educational opportunity, and the health of the citizens of the Nation."

This is a pledge to every man, woman, and child in the country—a pledge that the rights of a free people shall not be denied them because of personal misfortune. There is nothing new about this; it simply reaffirms a time-honored principle. The Government of the United States was founded on this principle of equal opportunity for all; our history has repeatedly proved that it works. It is working today. But because today we are a vast and varied, yet closely knit Nation of 130,000,000, we must now apply this principle on an equally Nation-wide scale.

Security—a sound footing on which to build our individual lives is a necessity common to us all. Some of us are rich and some poor. But rich or poor, we need Nation-wide protection against sickness, ignorance, and the economic hazards of our industrial society. We all know how one typhoid carrier can wreck the health of a community. We are beginning to recognize that unleashed ignorance is an equally menacing contagion. And we have learned from experience that the worst of all epidemics is economic instability. It has not been so long since we emerged from such an epidemic, and we know its cost, not only in dollars and cents, but also in human hopes and happiness. We know that health and education alone will not forestall want—that threats to the people's pay envelopes can be equally devastating.

It takes various kinds of security to protect every group and every age. True, every living human soul needs shelter and food and clothing. But security limited to that alone is the security of a prison or a poorhouse. This is not the security that a free people will tolerate for its children, its youth, its working men and women, its aged. Each of these groups and each person in these groups has individual needs. And our privilege to call ourselves an enlightened democracy depends on how well we meet the needs both of the individual and of the group.

That is what we are working toward in all the programs which now come under the Federal Security Agency—security for the individual and for the group. And of all, that group which most needs security, and which contributes most to individual security, is the family. There—on family security—is exactly where the greatest emphasis belongs; on the security a man builds up for himself and his wife and children during his working years; the security that goes on when he is too old to work; the security that doesn't vanish when he dies. And that is the kind of security these Government services in which we are interested seek to promote.

It is a security based on self-respect and self-sufficiency, not on regimentation. No man, woman, or child is made a better individual through regimentation growing out of need. I have seen soup kitchens, I have seen poorhouses, I have seen orphan asylums; and I can say this—though such institutions are needed to meet some problems, for people with homes and families, however modest, these homes and families are the foundation of the kind of life we prize. And because this is so, it is right and proper that the American Government should be concerned for the welfare of American families.

This Government concern for family security naturally demands Nation-wide Government organization, and that in turn demands efficiency and economy all along the line in the Federal Government, the States, and their local communities.

But economy must be interpreted in its broadest sense—as a tool of effective and constructive administration, a method of assuring an equitable income for those who need the protection of social-security legislation. There's nothing new in saying that the money put into the family pocketbook increases not only their security but also that of the merchants and others with whom they deal and that of the communities in which they live.

We have come a long way toward assuring this kind of security in the past few years. But there is much still to be done. The 1930's presented a problem of Nation-wide need, and we attacked it and solved it in the best and quickest way we knew. Looking back with the perspective of experience we can see where mistakes were made, where organization and activities were duplicated. The 1940's should improve administration and consolidate the gains of the 1930's. The framework has been established. The task now is to simplify and perfect the human relationships involved—between all of us who help to administer Government services on the one side, and the millions of men and women who stand to benefit from them on the other.

When we look back on all that has been accomplished for social security in the short time since this national enterprise was initiated we can afford to smile at the doubting Thomases who thought it wouldn't work. Facts—facts which are known not only to those of us who have an inside view but also to the entire country—have answered these earlier doubts.

But the troubled times in which we now find ourselves may breed new ones. And I'd like to say a word to spike them in advance. Come what may—the state of limited national emergency which the President recently declared, or even some disaster which would hurl us into war, as we all pray it may not and feel that it will not—come what may, social security marches on. The 46,000,000 workers who have Federal insurance accounts need feel no fears that their social-security cards will become valueless scraps of paper. They can be confident that the added protection recently provided both for their own old age and for the future of their families will be forthcoming at the appointed time. Nor need anyone fear curtailment in the other parts of the Social Security Act—job insurance and public assistance and public health, and child welfare.

The same thing is true of all the other measures through which we are now promoting the security of the American people. Our united purpose is to make security a reality throughout the length and breadth of the country. This purpose has been given national expression and added impetus in the creation of the Federal Security Agency. This new national organization simply brings together Federal agencies dedicated to the common cause of human betterment. Through the Board's new Bureau of Employment Security we are helping the States to bring men and jobs together and to provide out-of-work benefits to bridge the gap between the old job and the new. Through the Public Health Service we are combating the menace of contagion, epidemics, and other widespread health hazards. Through the Office of Education we are stimulating the varied educational opportunities essential to a democratic people, and we are providing vocational rehabilitation so that handicapped workers can again become self-supporting. Through the Civilian Conservation Corps and the National Youth Administration we are giving youth a chance to build up their bodies and their morale, a chance to learn how to work and to get training for future work, a chance to provide for their own support and their families' support, and a chance to contribute to the wealth of the Nation by public work well done. On this front youth has fought a winning battle against its twin enemies of want and idleness. We have seen across the seas what happens when youth refuses longer to be frustrated and responds to any summons that promises them a future, no matter if that future does turn out to be one of destruction.

The Federal Security Agency and its five member organizations are not only the only ones dedicated to this purpose. For in its broader sense, social security embraces all the measures through which the American people are utilizing Government as a channel for mutual service and joint protection—including those that safeguard the health and welfare of children, that deal with wages and hours of labor, that protect the people's savings, that promote agricultural rehabilitation, and that provide decent, healthful housing. In all these fields, a beginning, and more than a beginning, has been made; and continued growth may be expected. In others, we are still only feeling our way—notably in the development of a comprehensive and effective national health program. But the line of progress is clear. In this country all our forces are geared to the conservation not only of our natural resources but also of our human resources.

The spiritual heritage of our great democracy has never been more virile and vital—or more needed—than it is today. The preservation and the enrichment of our American way of life is what we are striving for in the broad social-security program of which all these Government measures are all a part.

This principle—the principle of social security—has been repeatedly reaffirmed. The constitutionality of social security has been upheld by the Supreme Court. The administration of social security has been integrated and improved through the creation of the Federal Security Agency. The scope of social security has been expanded, and the protections it offers strengthened by the amendments to the Social Security Act. Social security in this country is so firmly rooted, so effectively moving toward its appointed goal, that its continuation and its further development are beyond all doubt or question.

I speak positively, and I do so for three reasons. First, because I know that it is the considered and constant determination of the American people to get this social-security protection. They need it, and they want it. They propose to utilize their Government machinery as one method of achieving it.

Second, as Federal Security Administrator, I can say that the Federal and State officials to whom the administration of these programs has been delegated are determined to fulfill the mandate which the people have placed upon them. And in saying this I speak not only for those of us within the administrative agencies, but also for the President of the United States. Our national objective remains, as it has always been, construction, not destruction.

The third reason for my conviction that nothing will curtail our progress toward social security is based on the history of European social legislation. Even in countries that have experienced war and the fear of war, these disasters have not stemmed the tide once it was turned in this direction. Germany, France, and Great Britain, for example, were aware of the needs of their people and had taken some steps to meet them before the dark days of 1914 to 1918. In France protective measures were still pretty scattered; in Germany social insurance was fairly comprehensive; and in England health insurance and unemployment insurance were established. In spite of the travail of war, these countries provided government allowances for those in need; and they supplemented and expanded their insurance measures, so that more people were benefited than before. These developments went on even during the war years, and everywhere they formed the basis for a notable expansion of social insurance as soon as the war ended.

These are some of the reasons why I have no fear that war or any other eventuality will rob the American people of the genuine security which they have been, and are, building by their own efforts. But there is another and still more potent reason. And here I speak as a member of the American Legion to my fellow members. Because we have no illusions about war, to us the making and the keeping of the peace are more than words. Because we know what war means, we hope and pray that our Nation will not be put to this bitter test, that we may continue the ways of peace not only in social security but also in all our other national and personal pursuits.

And so, in closing, I know I may restate, for you as for myself, our pledge of faith to the American idea—a pledge which President Roosevelt recently expressed in these words: "If we fight with all our strength for the preservation of the liberty in which this Nation was conceived and the principle of equality on which it was founded; if we recognize and protect ourselves from the dangers that threaten from without and within; if all groups and all classes work together in a spirit of tolerance—then we can be sure that we will not come to the end of our dream."

Repeal of the Arms Embargo

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOSH LEE

OF OKLAHOMA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, October 16 (legislative day of Wednesday, October 4), 1939

ADDRESS BY HON. ELBERT D. THOMAS, OF UTAH

Mr. LEE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the Appendix of the RECORD a summary of the remarks made by the junior Senator from Utah [Mr. THOMAS] before the American Academy of Political and Social Science, at Philadelphia, Saturday evening, October 14, in support of the repeal of the arms embargo.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

It would be wrong to say that the considerations before Congress today on our peace policy are unimportant simply because both sides want peace. Public interest in our special session was at the seething point until it was discovered that there is no war party in the United States and no war bloc. Since then it has flagged. Nevertheless, as earnest as we are, we are divided into two definite groups as to how best to remain a calm, energetic, peaceful nation, attending to our own affairs and expecting others not to molest us, and remain not only at peace but a peaceful influence upon a belligerent world.

Once we discover our issue we are safe in discussing it. The issue is not peace or war. It is not a question of this being a step toward war, and that being a step away from war. There are no steps to war in contemplation. There is the law of cause and effect, and from the premise that we repeal the arms embargo, enact the restrictions laid down in the new proposed neutrality resolution, and give some greater degree than now of recognition to the principles of international law—from that premise we are confronted with an almost inescapable conclusion, namely, that we are making more sound and more certain the American position as a neutral.

It follows that our embargo of today may seriously be mistaken for lack of national fortitude and lack of confidence that we are indeed a free Nation, and that our failure to enact the other features of the projected resolution is simply a failure to restrict our citizens wherein they should be restricted.

We have today freedom of the seas, with our ships laden with all sorts of deadly materials, such as metals, oils, gasoline—yes, and even rubber, which we should conserve, inasmuch as it is not grown in the United States—steaming unarmed and unescorted into ports of belligerents and offering, if they choose, long-term credit. In contrast it is proposed to let them have the finished product, since we let them have the raw materials anyway; make them take title here and carry it away in a cash transaction or its equivalent, so that there will not be any thought later to have the Government become a lender under any conditions. Will anyone seriously contend that to remove the embargo under these conditions is not tightening up our neutrality, removing haphazard national shipping policy, and securing to us a position of strength, dignity, and peace?

But it has been said we have no right to change the rules during progress. Or, shall we call war a game? Let us make a legal case in equity out of it and see what we have under contemplation. We have a situation in which our neutrality law is unsuited. In the heat of a summer and in the press for adjournment the Senate Foreign Relations Committee voted by a close poll not to pigeonhole the bill but to lay it aside for the period of the regular session for an emergency session such as this if it should come. Meanwhile, the House of Representatives, by enacting it, had served notice to the world that the present law is unsatisfactory. Meanwhile, the President of the United States and the Secretary of State and his State Department have served notice to the world that the law is unsatisfactory. Meanwhile, the Senate will not consider its amendment or repeal only because the Senate is fagged and because the European war has not started and because a filibuster is threatened. There is no nation on earth that was not on notice that we would be summoned into extra session and a resolution amending neutrality probably be forthcoming almost the minute that there was an emergency abroad which might threaten our safety. Some who say we have no right to change our rules today refused to consider them yesterday on the ground that there was not going to be any war. If that was a reason not to consider them yesterday, is it valid to say today that we shall not consider them because there is a war? Is it right to say that we won't call the doctor because we are not sick, and then, becoming thoroughly ill, say that we still won't call the doctor for the reason that we now are sick? This is not logic, and it is not law, and it is not international good morals. The world was on notice last spring that Congress would act to revise the neutrality law.

I have urged in many forums, and cannot repeat it too many times, that that which we are considering is domestic law. It is meant to set up a code of domestic conduct for this Nation without impressing too greatly the rest of the world. Argument that we have been helping Germany and are about to help England and France is utterly idle. We are not about to assume any larger right than we have always had. Our net claims to neutral rights have always been less than international law allows, so there is no question of being unneutral. Our law today allows us less license than would straight international law. Our law, when we pass the embargo repeal, with its other features, will allow us even less tomorrow than today. One may not menace his neighbors by failing to assert his rights. It is overassertion, not underassertion, that creates damage and violates the security of others and is unneutral. Restriction must never be confused with its opposite—enlargement. We may not foresee, much less plan, all the complications which may arise from America's leading a normal international life. Your grocer does not pick his customers. They just come to his store, if they will. He does not sell his top apples to Mrs. Jones and his bottom apples to Mrs. Smith. They come with their baskets, and they go in peace. So, it must follow, may nations; and if one comes in brutal, drunk, and swaggering, this Nation still is well enough policed and strong enough, I take it, to eject him. If our customers are like Hatfield and McCoy of the famous "feuding" families of another generation, we cannot help that, so long as they have the money to buy our goods and go on. We do not force our wares on anyone, and we do not count Hatfield's cash or McCoy's cash to see how much each has and to make sure it is equal and that we are being fair to both; neither do we examine their fortifications to see whether one may get home safely with his basket and the other not. We are minding our own business, and this America proposes to do in a rather affirmative but modest and not arrogant sort of way, thus basing our neutrality upon the right of a nation to stay at peace in the midst of a warring world.

Pending Neutrality Legislation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. BENNETT CHAMP CLARK

OF MISSOURI

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, October 16 (legislative day of Wednesday, October 4), 1939

EDITORIAL BY WILLIAM HIRTH

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the RECORD an editorial from the Missouri Farmer, written by William Hirth, president of the Missouri Farmers' Association, which is the largest farm cooperative in the United States. The editorial is entitled "If This Be Treason."

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Missouri Farmer]

IF THIS BE TREASON

No doubt some of our readers think I am "tearing a passion to tatters" because I write so much about the new hell that has broken loose in Europe, but I am doing this because, in my opinion, if we should become actively involved in it we will be the biggest pack of fools in Christendom, and that ere we emerge from it we will have wrecked the American Republic. Our National debt is already $45,000,000,000, and approximating what we would have to spend for new ships, guns, munitions of war, etc., and the new billions we would be forced to lend to England and France (who already owe us billions from the last war which they never expect to repay), and the added billions that would be required for relief when the senseless slaughter comes to an end, and when the millions employed in our war industries would once more be thrown out of work, these various expenditures which are too vast for the average mind to comprehend would more than double our present national debt, and our taxpayers simply could not carry such a load—not only would it bankrupt the Federal Treasury—but with our country already honeycombed with Communists and others who hate our institutions it would mean a dictatorship, and finally revolution. Not only would our participation mean billions of dollars in increased taxes, but having once more covenanted to "save" the rotten democracies of Europe, we would be asked to send millions of young Americans to the shambles across the sea, and the chances are that one or more millions of them would remain dead upon the foreign battlefields, where 37,568 erstwhile young Americans already lie under little white crosses—and who can place a fair value on the lives of a million young Americans who have no quarrel in Europe, and who passionately pray God for the right to live in peace with their fellowmen?

It is for the above reasons that I am so deeply concerned over the crisis that confronts our Nation, and why, if the fateful and senseless issues in Europe are not compromised, I am hoping that the President and Congress will serve notice upon England and France that they must survive or perish upon their own resources—that having had one sad experience in trying to "make the world safe for democracy" we will not engage in a similar fool's adventure. And the surest way to get the President and Congress to do this is for the overwhelming mass of our voters to impress upon them that they will scourge from public life any man or set of men who will permit the United States to once more become a cat's-paw in the affairs of war-cursed Europe, and thus menace the continued existence of our own institutions. Ours is still a "government of, for, and by the people" if the millions on the farms, and in our offices, shops, and factories will make vigorous use of their right of free speech and a free ballot.

In 1937 Congress enacted the present Neutrality Act by an almost unanimous vote, and under its terms we served notice upon the nations of the world that in case of war we would not sell munitions and other implements of war to the belligerents, and not only in our own land, but in other lands, this act was hailed as a tremendous step toward world peace. Through it we served notice that we did not intend, in times to come, to commercialize these instrumentalities of death, and we felt good about it, and had a right to. But since the "four horsemen" have begun to ride and hell has broken loose certain Members of Congress have changed their minds. Now these gentlemen say, in substance, that we will be willing to sell implements of war to all comers if the matter can be so handled that our own feet will not get caught in the bear trap, and they make no bones over the fact that they have changed their former position, first, because they want England and France to win, and, second, because they wish to put our unemployed to work making guns, shells, war planes, etc. In other words, after thinking it over, they see no reason why we shouldn't make some easy money out of the European situation if we can do so safely. Gone is the noble resolve to contribute to world peace that was behind the Neutrality Act when it was enacted back in 1937! And the astounding thing is that these Members of Congress insist that we can play into the hands of England and France in this manner and still remain neutral. And, of course, the most of them know better than this; they know that when we permit English ships to begin loading war munitions along the Atlantic seaboard German bombers will not hesitate to blow up these ships as they steam out to sea, and that it is not unlikely that they will go a step further and endeavor to blow up the plants that supply their cargoes of death, and thus is not the responsibility these gentlemen are asking our country to take a frightful one? Does not any sane man know that if we want to stay out of the war the only certain way to do it is to give aid and comfort to neither side?

And now what about the hue and cry of "saving the democracies" of Europe? Is there any "democracy" left in Europe that is worth saving? What of England's heartless crushing of the Boer Republic in South Africa some years ago? And what of England and France's consent to the murder of Czechoslovakia only a few months ago? And did not these countries dictate the Treaty of Versailles, which was a hell's broth that made the present conflict inevitable sooner or later? Agreeing that Hitler is a renegade and a menace, from time out of mind have not the statesmen of Europe been a pack of wolves who have been actuated by territorial spoils, and have they ever been deeply concerned over the liberties of their peoples? Has there ever been a time when "Peace on earth, good will to men" dominated their objectives? And having had one experience in "saving" the schemers of Downing Street that came perilously near wrecking our own beloved Republic, shall we again place ourselves in position where we will be asked to send millions of young Americans across the sea to pull their chestnuts out of the fire? If we would serve the cause not only of democracy but of civilization, we will lose no time in building an army and navy that can protect our American democracy and the Monroe Doctrine against all comers, and I hope the time is close at hand when our young men will band themselves together and solemnly declare, "We will gladly shoulder guns to defend America against an invader, it matters not who he is or from whence he comes, but, so help us, God of our fathers, we will not offer up our lives on the battlefields of Europe, and if this be treason, let those who will make the most of it." And then let us see what the powers that be will do about it.

Finally, let us remember that we have not as yet conquered the depression; that we still have idle millions who are a heavy burden upon the Government; and that the farm question is as far from being settled as it was when Secretary Wallace began his guinea-pig experiments.

America's Attitude Toward European Conflict

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LYNN J. FRAZIER

OF NORTH DAKOTA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, October 16 (legislative day of Wednesday, October 4), 1939

ADDRESS BY JOHN B. TREVOR, JR.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an address delivered by John B. Trevor, Jr., first vice president of the Allied Patriotic Societies, Inc. The address discusses the position the United States should take in view of the present European conflict.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

It appears to the chairman of your special campaign committee that the most important problem before the Allied Patriotic Societies is the position we should take about the present European conflict. In some ways our task is easier than in most of the issues in which we have been involved. We do not have to contend with an apathetic public opinion. The country is aroused to the need for action. Congress is being flooded with letters and telegrams on a scale seldom seen before.

There is need, however, to clarify the issues. Leaving aside the minor points, the basic issue at stake is, Shall we continue to remain a neutral in the conflict now raging in Europe, or shall we enter the war as a belligerent? There is no third course. We cannot be in the war in the economic field and out of it in the military. In making our decision let us be guided by reason and not by our emotions.

We are probably safe in assuming that the vast majority of the American people want the country to remain neutral. They remember all too clearly the horrors of the last war, which they know will be eclipsed by a present-day world conflict. The dislocation of our economic structure, due to the staggering total of loans to our late Allies, which were never repaid, is still with us. We cannot forget that the terms of the peace which they imposed on the vanquished generated a bitterness which is chiefly responsible for the present situation. We remember that we received no share of the vast territories taken over by the conquerors.

Looking at the Europe of today, our conviction to stay out should grow stronger. The only possible reason to enter the war is to save the institutions of the so-called democratic nations from subjugation by the totalitarian powers. But let me point out that England and France are no longer democracies. Messrs. Hitler and Stalin have won a crushing victory on the ideological front. In England elections have been suspended for the duration of the conflict. France is ruled by decrees issued arbitrarily by the Government without regard to the popular will. Even Canada has taken steps which make it a semidictatorship. Let us not think that if we enter the war we will escape this inevitable process. Legislation has already been drawn up which will confiscate in case of war up to 75 percent of the individual's property. On the plea that since we draft manpower we should also draft capital, such a proposal would have an excellent chance of passing. We would then become a corporate state very similar to Italy. Nominally, of course, these special measures should lapse upon the declaration of peace, but how much do you suppose the individual would get back, bearing in mind governmental inefficiency and the reluctance of the bureaucrat to disgorge special powers?

The Honorable William R. Castle, former Under Secretary of State, says, as quoted in today's New York Times, "that if the United States were dragged into another European conflict we would be, when the war was over, only another dictatorship."

If we stay out of the war, we shall be following the traditional American policy. James Monroe, in the message to the Congress which is known as the Monroe Doctrine, said:

"In the wars of the European powers in matters relating to themselves we have never taken any part, nor does it comport with our policy so to do. It is only when our rights are invaded or seriously menaced that we resent injuries or make preparations for our defense. * * * Our policy in regard to Europe, which was adopted at an early stage of the wars which have so long agitated that quarter of the globe, nevertheless remains the same, which is not to interfere in the internal concerns of any of its powers; to consider the government de facto as the legitimate government for us; to cultivate friendly relations with it, and to preserve those relations by a frank, firm, and manly policy, meeting in all instances the just claims of every power, submitting to injuries from none."

We never hear the above extracts from the Monroe Doctrine but they are just as vital to our national safety as the matter with which we are familiar. Disregard of President Monroe's dictum that we should consider the government de facto as the legitimate government has in one current case brought our international relations to an absurd impasse. For the purpose of assigning immigration quotas we lump together the quotas of Germany and that area which formerly composed the Czechoslovak state. We also apply the penalty duty put on German imports to imports from Czechoslovakia, presumably to punish the Czechs for allowing themselves to be defeated, yet we do not recognize that the German Government is the de facto government of this region.

As a result of this war, and perhaps as the result of wars to come, the boundaries of Europe are almost certain to undergo change and readjustment. Unless we go back to the Monroe Doctrine and recognize de facto governments, we may well get into the impossible position of not recognizing the actual governments in large areas of Europe. Such a situation would be most awkward for our commerce, and would, in a very real sense, constitute insult and provocation.

The Monroe Doctrine is the path of sanity and safety. In only one respect might we reasonably clarify it. It would be to our interest to refuse to recognize the de facto government of an area where such government or a subsidiary is advocating the overthrow of the Government of the United States by force and violence. Extending recognition to such a government would be merely extending the cloak of diplomatic immunity to its propagandists in this country.

If it is our wish to stay out of war, we must refrain from doing any unneutral acts. It is not sufficient for us to announce our desire to be neutral, the belligerents must also recognize our neutrality by acquiescing in it and by not treating us as a party to the war. This will not happen if we commit acts in defiance of international law for the purpose of helping one side and hindering the other.

Let me read what three authorities on international law say on the question of neutrality:

From A Digest of International Law, by the American authority, John Bassett Moore, under the heading, "Neutrality, Its Significance," he quotes from Mr. J. Q. Adams, Secretary of State, to Mr. Gallatin, May 19, 1818:

"By the usual principles of international law, the state of neutrality recognizes the cause of both parties to be just—that is, it avoids all consideration of the merits of the contest."

Mr. Moore also quotes from a decision of a Federal court:

"The idea of a neutral nation implies two nations at war, and a third in friendship with both."

From Le Droite International Theorique et Pratique, by Calvo, the well-known South American authority on international law:

"The first duty imposed on a neutral state is that of being impartial in its relations with the belligerents, to abstain from all acts having the nature of a favor, to aid one to overcome the other."

According to International Law, A Treatise, by Oppenheim, an adviser at the British Foreign Office:

"Neutrality as an attitude of impartiality involves the duty of abstaining from assisting either belligerent either actively or passively * * *."

The most immediate danger is that we will compromise our neutrality by a repeal of the embargo provision of our neutrality law. Such a measure would partake of the nature of an unneutral act. In the words of Mr. Henry S. Fraser, technical adviser to the late George W. Wickersham on the League of Nations committee for the codification of international law:

"There is an established principle of international law that a neutral may not, after the outbreak of war, change its legislation for the purpose of assisting one of the belligerents."

If the embargo is repealed, Mr. Fraser adds:

"Germany will instantly have the right under international law to take steps of reprisal and retaliation against American ships."

Our Government has in the past recognized the justice of this point of view. During the last war, while we were still neutral, the German Government requested us to place an embargo on shipments of arms to the belligerents. Previously we had had no such embargo. Consequently the application of an embargo would have changed our relations with the belligerents. The situation was identical in principle with the present proposal to lift the embargo. The Secretary of State replied to the German Ambassador in part as follows:

"This Government holds, as I believe Your Excellency is aware, and as it is constrained to hold in view of the present indisputable doctrines of accepted international law, that any change in its own laws of neutrality during the progress of a war which would affect unequally the relations of the United States with the nations at war would be an unjustifiable departure from the principle of strict neutrality * * *."

Let me point out that the two usual arguments in favor of repealing the embargo are fallacious in the extreme. It is often said that our industry will be benefited by the arms orders from the belligerents. This does not appear to be the case if a long view of the matter is taken. If we insist on cash payment, and actually get it, the Allies will have to pay us either in their holdings of American and other foreign securities or in gold. Of course, if we do not insist on cash payment, the last war probably gives us a notion as to when we shall be paid. Now, England has large holdings of foreign securities, but it is very doubtful if she would consider using them for this purpose. For many years she has had an excess of imports over exports and has used the income from her foreign holdings to pay the deficit. Without these holdings she would have great difficulty in supporting her large population. Therefore it seems probable that gold will be used to pay us. If several billion dollars of gold is added to our already inflated reserves, the foreign nations will be left with a deficiency of gold. Then the logical step for them to take would be to demonetize gold—leaving us with a hoard of yellow metal completely useless for financial transactions. The effect on our internal economy can be imagined.

Some advocates of repealing the embargo are so strong in their desire to help the democracies that they ignore all other arguments. But would repealing the embargo help them for any length of time? There is reason to doubt it. According to today's papers the Soviet Government has agreed to rush goods to the Reich. What could be easier than for the Soviet Government to order needed arms from us for shipment to Germany? If delivery was made by the Pacific route the military and legal obstacles in the path of the Allies, if they attempted to stop the trade, would be very great.

Now, in regard to other phases of the war situation. No doubt some additional legislation is needed or at least desirable. Measures which tend to protect American citizens from getting involved in the hostilities or in aiding them to leave the scene of war quickly are worth while. It might be well not to issue any visas to immigrants while Americans are stranded in Europe in appreciable numbers so that our citizens can get accommodations on the liners. We would be quite within our neutral rights in adopting the cash-and-carry plan for materials not covered by the embargo, and some such provision would no doubt be a protection to our interests, a provision excluding American shipping from an actual war zone, provided the definition of "war zone" was made sufficiently flexible to take care of possible changes that may be needed. Additional precautions against subversive activities are also in order.

But all these matters are questions of detail. The basic problem is to keep America out of war. If we get in and lose the better part of our manpower and economic resources, we will have set the stage for dictatorship in our own country. I therefore move the following resolutions:

"Be it resolved, That the Allied Patriotic Societies, Inc., is opposed to the entrance of the United States of America into the present European war; and be it

"Resolved, That the Allied Patriotic Societies, Inc., is opposed to the repeal of the arms-embargo provision of the present neutrality law or the adoption of any other measures likely to affect our neutral position; and, furthermore, be it

"Resolved, That the president be instructed to send a copy of this resolution to Senators WAGNER and MEAD, and to the leading metropolitan newspapers."

(NOTE.—This resolution was adopted by the Allied Patriotic Societies at their regular monthly meeting on October 9, 1939.)

Neutrality

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EDWARD R. BURKE

OF NEBRASKA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, October 16 (legislative day of Wednesday, October 4), 1939

RADIO ADDRESS BY RT. REV. MSGR. JOHN A. RYAN, D. D.

Mr. BURKE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that there be inserted in the Appendix of the RECORD a radio address delivered on yesterday afternoon by the Rt. Rev. Msgr. John A. Ryan, D. D., of Washington, respecting the repeal of the arms embargo.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

In this broadcast I do not profess to represent the Catholic Church, nor the National Catholic Welfare Conference, nor the Catholic Association for International Peace. I am speaking only for myself, as an American citizen who believes that he knows something about the principles of international morality.

Much time has been wasted and millions of words uttered within and without Congress in an empty and futile dispute concerning the meaning of neutrality. Those who denounce the existing embargo on the sale of munitions to the belligerents maintain that it is unneutral because it favors Germany and is unfavorable to England and France; the opposing group declares that lifting the embargo would be unneutral because it would help England and France and injure Germany. Both groups are right.

According to Webster's International Dictionary, neutrality in international law means: "The condition of a state or government which refrains from taking part directly or indirectly in a war between other powers." Note the word "indirectly" in this definition. To keep the embargo would indirectly aid Germany and injure Britain and France; to lift it would indirectly aid Britain and France and injure Germany. If the disputants would make a distinction between neutrality in itself and in its effects they would avoid much confused thinking and much waste of time and language.

When the United States maintains an embargo against the sale of arms to all belligerents, its action or attitude does not, as such, favor either side; when, as I hope will happen, it lifts the embargo it will continue to refrain from directly taking sides. But the effects of the new attitude upon the two belligerent parties will be vastly different from the effects of the older attitude; that is, the effects of the present law and embargo. The difference in effects will be due specifically to the difference in the conditions of the belligerents themselves.

As the distinguished Austrian jurist, Anton Menger, pointed out many years ago, "Nothing is more unequal than to treat unequals equally." Aristotle said the same thing more comprehensively almost 23 centuries ago. No position which any state may take can treat equally belligerents whose conditions are unequal, any more than a mother can treat her 18-year-old daughter and her 4-year-old daughter equally if she provides both with garments of the same dimensions. The primary concern of the United States today, is neither to maintain a strict technical neutrality nor to treat the two sides equally; both these thing are impossible.

The advocates of the embargo and the proponents of repeal agree in their desire, before everything else, to keep the United States out of the war. While I am heartily in favor of that objective, I dissent from those who contend that the more effective method of attaining it is to retain the embargo. Those who desire arguments for lifting the embargo I would refer to the speeches delivered in the Senate by the advocates of repeal. To me those speeches are sufficiently cogent and persuasive. The assertion of the isolationists that selling arms to the belligerents got us into the last war, and would have a similar effect now, is not impressive. It lacks logic and is too simple. Other factors than the sale of arms contributed mightily to our decision to enter the great war. Some of these factors no longer exist while other factors are now present which were absent in 1917.

Happily, the repeal of the embargo would not only promote our national welfare and safety, but would be in conformity with the precepts of morality and religion. Some of the utterances by isolationists, both inside and outside of Congress, suggest the inference that our country has no obligations of love and charity to any other country. These men advocate not only political but moral isolation. They contend that the injustice inflicted by the Hitler government upon the peoples of Poland, Germany, and Austria, and the manifold injustices which it will inflict over wider areas if it is successful in this war, are no moral concern of ours. They remind us unpleasantly of Cain, who demanded: "Am I my brother's keeper?" They imitate the Priest and the Levite, who passed by on the other side, remaining neutral to the suffering and helplessness of the man who had fallen among robbers. The person who asserts that we should be impartial and indifferent with regard to the conflict between the Hitler government and the Allies, repudiates not only Christ's gospel of brotherly love, but the principles of natural morality.

States, no less than individuals, are subject to the moral law. And they are bound not only by the precept of justice but, likewise, by the precept of charity. In the present crisis our country is morally obliged to do all that it reasonably can to defeat Hitler and destroy Hitlerism. Victory for this evil genius and his evil principles, in this war, would mean the destruction of Christian civilization throughout a large part of Europe. This tragic result would follow inexoraby from the Nazi philosophy and the Nazi policies which have been pursued during the last 5 years.

Upon what specific grounds do I base this assertion? First, the Hitler government has been continuously engaged for more than 5 years in a cruel and insidious campaign for the destruction of the Christian religion in Germany, and latterly in Austria. In a joint pastoral letter issued about 4 years ago by the hierarchy of Germany, the bishops protested against "the propagation of a new paganism," and declared that the Hitler government was attacking not merely "a particular article of faith but the very essence and fundamentals of the Christian religion * * *." Three years later, or about 1 year ago, another joint pastoral letter of the German bishops declared that, in the intervening 3 years, the persecution of religion had become "more hostile and more violent," and that the government was striving for "the uprooting of Christianity in general, and the introduction of a faith that no longer has the least relation to belief in God and the Christian belief in a future life."

Second, the Hitler government has consistently and continuously flouted the principles of charity, justice, and truth, which were brought to Germany by St. Boniface more than twelve hundred years ago and which have been diffused, developed, and made effective by Christian teaching alone.

Third, the Nazi philosophy and the Nazi government have substituted the absolute and totalitarian state for Christian democracy and have brazenly outraged the sacredness and rights of the individual.

Fourth, the alliance between Hitler and Stalin suggests that victory for the former will greatly strengthen the position of communism.

No genuine believer in Christianity or in the moral law can be neutral, or impartial, or indifferent in this awful situation. No intelligent man who holds that states as well as individuals have duties of charity to one another will deny that the United States is under moral obligation to do all that it reasonably can, to employ every means that can be employed without disproportionate inconvenience, in order to defeat Hitler and save Christian civilization in Europe. To permit the sale of munitions and other materials under a cash-and-carry system would not involve unreasonable inconvenience or grave risk and might be decisive in the conflict.

The issue between Hitler and the Allies is sometimes misstated by those who oppose the policy of assisting France and Britain. "Why," asks a certain columnist, "should we punish only Hitler? Why should we not also wreak vengeance upon the Allies, who are responsible for Hitler through their infamous creation, the Treaty of Versailles?" Other confused persons declare that we should not close our eyes to the crimes of injustice committed by England during many centuries in many countries. I can fully understand this emotional attitude. One of my father's brothers, a newborn babe, died on the roadside when his parents and brothers and sisters were evicted from their home, as an incident of the accursed system of landlordism which England maintained in Ireland for centuries. My grandparents on my mother's side were forced to leave the Emerald Isle by the cruelty of the notorious landlord Scully, in another part of County Tipperary. But the Englishmen who committed these crimes are all dead. "Let the dead bury their dead." Today we have to deal with not only the English people who are living but also the German people who are living and who are being robbed of their religion, their liberty, and all the moral values which lift men above brutes.

The moral question confronting America is not that of "punishing villains in Europe," whether living or dead. It is the question of contributing, so far as we reasonably can contribute, to the valiant effort now being made by British and France to prevent the triumph of paganism and barbarism in Europe. Hitler is a madman and a monster. As Rev. Robert Gannon, S. J., said recently, "Hitler is the most pestilential and altogether infuriating character of all times." One has to go back to Attila or to Genghis Khan to find men comparable with this "pestilential and infuriating character." And his capacity for evil is much greater than was that of either Attila or Genghis Khan.

Neutrality

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN A. DANAHER

OF CONNECTICUT

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, October 16 (legislative day of Wednesday, October 4), 1939

RADIO ADDRESS BY MAJ. AL WILLIAMS

Mr. DANAHER. Mr. President, one of the most distinguished of American fliers overseas during the World War was Maj. Al Williams. On October 12, over a coast-to-coast network, he broadcast an address entitled "Neutrality." I ask unanimous consent that it be inserted in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

I am an ordinary American, of a plain American family. Yesterday I talked to my mother. She seemed confused about the so-called neutrality wrangle going on in Washington. That sweet little lady saw her two sons put on the uniforms of fighting men and march away in 1917. She stifled her tears and prayed. And if she is confused, perhaps others are confused as to just what the politically tinted neutrality row is all about, and what it will lead to.

I want to answer my mother's questions in your hearing, in the same simple words she used to teach me my prayers—the same plain words with which she taught me to say "Sir" and how to guide my tongue from the babble of babyhood to simple sentences, with one important distinction, namely, that I'm going to talk to you in the language we used as youngsters on the baseball diamond—sentences clipped and clear, so clear that no American can misunderstand them.

I have waited, in vain, for some American political leader who would dare to do this—dare in plain, simple sentences to tell us what strict, true neutrality means, and why it is essential for the continued peace and safety of America. No, they are splitting hairs, dodging plain talk, for fear the real problems and dangers will be understood.

People, common people like me, want peace. We know that these oceans on either side of us are God-given bulwarks of safety, as long as we keep our thoughts, emotions, and our greed for profits within our own boundaries. Certain leaders are trying to sell you and me enough so-called neutrality to soothe our consciences, and enough loopholes in that neutrality to grab the profits of supplying materials and weapons for killing other men.

Even as you listen to these words men are being killed in Europe—men who are, or were, the husbands, sons, and sweethearts of other women; men who are screaming in pain as their torn bodies stumble in the mud, fall from the sky, or sink beneath the waves, while the high-powered propagandists of Europe are in our midst trying to convert and confuse Americans or influence our leaders. None of these propagandists will stumble and die in the mud, burn in the air, or choke in the sea. You bet your life they won't.

The gall of these fellows—propagandists, native or foreign—to even try to sell us another bill of goods for joining in another European war, without even changing the slogans that tricked us into the last war.

How can we insure American peace? Is neutrality the only answer? Still talking from third base, I say "yes" to my mother, "yes" to the men and women of America, and a still louder "yes" to the political leaders who tricked us into the last World War, and who will trick us into this one unless we clamp down on them—now. So let's get down to brass tacks.

What is neutrality?—since our leaders refrain from telling us.

According to Webster's International Dictionary, "neutrality is the condition of a state or government which refrains from taking part, directly or indirectly, in a war between other powers."

There are no "ifs," no "ands," no "buts," no "whereases," in that definition; no faintest hint of hopes for curing unemployment, nor how to make profits justifiable before God out of the business of putting weapons or materials in the hands of other men to kill still other men.

There's no middle course. We are going to be neutral or we are going to be unneutral. We cannot sell anything to any warring nation and maintain our neutrality and our peace.

The fate of this country and everything it stands for hangs upon just how well you understand this, and how determined you are to insure American peace, and just how determined you are that Congress and the President shall execute your determination. If there were no profit in selling to Europe right now, there would be no foggy neutrality wrangle right now.

Long since a flat and complete embargo would have been clamped on our export trade to Europe, and our risks would have been eliminated. But no. The difference between the strict neutrality which we want to insure American peace for all of us and the split neutrality which they are trying to sell us is no promise of peace for any of us but the hope of profits for a few of us.

Complete neutrality, by which we sell nothing to any European warring nation, has a price tag on it—in dollars and cents—in the dollars and cents you won't make in sales by insuring American peace.

There's a price tag on split neutrality, too—and it's in American blood—written in the blood of your loved ones.

And if the bloody price tag is to be paid—there's another payoff in the depression after the drunken war profits cease. And remember, we'll have that depression with us, because we still haven't found the answers to that depression which has been with us for the past 9 years.

The people of this entire planet must—in a wide sense—be regarded as a community. Just keep that community idea in mind—and see where it leads us.

The present European war is a disease epidemic that is killing men, women, and children, but only a few isolated men have dared tell you to stay away from that disease epidemic. Switch the analogy to your own community. Suppose an epidemic of infantile paralysis was raging there. Would you be thinking of your lofty rights and privileges or profits, or your safety, and the safety of your loved one, big and little?

Suppose you are trying to avoid epidemic localities. You have a right to enter them, at your own risk. There's a wild-eyed fellow on a soapbox telling you: "It's your right to go into those places, and no one can stop you." Would you heed him, or keep on your way, without worrying about your rights and such rot? You'd keep moving, just as I would. Contact with the epidemic center means greater risk of becoming infected. You'd keep moving—or more sensibly—you'd stay home and keep your people at home.

Apply this analogy to the war in Europe and you've got the answer.

What will we do about our export trade if it is cut off from Europe temporarily? To the south of us is a great continental market, rich in raw material and low in factory-finished products. Cultivate and take that market with good old American business sales methods, and hold it with sound American products—especially now—while Europe, which has always had an eye on that market, can't get at it, being too busy cutting throats.

What about that "wolf-wolf" gag, about "maybe we will have to fight the winner of the present European war?" That's assinine. It's a gag to mislead you. When this war is over, Europe will be so distressed sharing the spoils, if any, and trying to hold their respective governments together, that America will be safer than ever. Especially will this be true if, instead of arming any of them, we get down to brass tacks and arm ourselves with the finest equipment for an impregnable national-defense system.

Europe is a bad business risk for Americans. We underwrote Europe, and its hazy democracy, in 1917. And, as a businessman, I'd say to Europe: "No more American support—money or otherwise. You're busted again. You fail to show a profit by preserving the democracy we financed in 1917. And if we back you again, you'll be back again in a few years asking for another handout. Nothing doing! We're going to preserve the democracy of the only nation in the world where democracy seems to mean something, and when you're all through with your power politics slaughtering, we will still be a going democratic concern. You! Europe, started this brawl without asking us—now finish it—and pay for it—without asking us."

I know some of the foreign propagandists who are in America now and perhaps listening to me—and I am talking to them as well as to Americans—I hope they understand that we are onto their game and want none of it. And so, to you smart propagandists, "Get back to your homes in Europe where there's death and war, and for once be found dead, if necessary, in the front lines, where no propagandist has ever been found, dead or alive.

We have had our one bloody lesson and your unpaid debts accuse themselves."

And, still speaking as an ordinary American citizen, I challenge anyone to show me that any of the proposed so-called neutrality laws proposed by the administration and now under consideration, are neutral in fact or are sponsored by anyone whose record has been stainlessly neutral to date.

The National Association of Manufacturers, and some sections of big business, came forth with a general statement: "We can and must stay out of war. Industry opposes the utilization of war emergency to boost prices for the purposes of making excessive profits." That statement was planned to prove American big business does not want war. I say the issue is not war; it is neutrality. But they say nothing about neutrality.

All America wants peace. Some of America had been led into thinking there is a way to insure peace, yet make money out of peace. Part of this confusion is the result of foreign propaganda—part from the efforts of so-called Americans, who are selling you on foreign entanglements while waving the American flag, and the rest of the confusion is attributable to an administration that is unmistakably unneutral and has been unmistakably unneutral in utterance and attitude.

And by the administration, I mean the President, his Cabinet, and certain portions of the Congress. What have I got to back up that statement? Well, here's the story as I see it:

The President's speech on "the quarantining of aggressor nations" scared the wits out of me. That speech meant he proposed to enforce peace—a world-wide policing job.

Prior to that, Americans had been worried about the moves of the President and Secretary of State Hull to back up England's plans for bluffing Mussolini out of his Abyssinian campaign.

The President, and Secretary Hull, and the entire Cabinet, tolerated the Chinese-Japanese War for years, and refused to declare a state of war existed—even though hundreds of thousands of soldiers were killed and armies were in the field.

The President has persistently used the scare phrase when leaving or returning from vacations: "Unless there is war in the fall; unless there is war."

Do you recall the crash of that Douglas bomber—which even American airmen were not allowed to see? When that ship crashed—killing my friend, Johnny Cable—a passenger was found on board. At first he was given a false name but later was identified as a representative of the French Air Minister.

Who cooked up that deal—and what other deals are in the making?

The most devastating recent shock to the nerves of Americans was the President's report to his press conference that two submarines had been sighted near the American coasts. That report should have come from the United States Navy. Coming from the President, it scared the country—and his jocular comment, after refusing to identify the subs: "They might have been Swiss submarines"—did not reduce the scare effect.

I have disagreed with other administrations and other Presidents in the past. That's my right. I expect to disagree with other administrations and other Presidents in the future. But this is the first time I have ever feared a President or an administration.

And now this same administration is seeking full and complete authority to handle our neutrality policy while a war is on in Europe. Looking over that record, I say, "Don't give them that authority."

Without further ado, what does the President mean by urging that "we return to international law?" England made her own international law in the last war. The German subs made theirs—and when we entered the war we made our international law.

My answer is that there is no such thing as an international law that will hold in wartime. Don't take my word for that—read history. And since there is no international law I ask, Who or what is going to decide what becomes of America in case we insist upon trading with warring Europe?

The President and the administration want such authority under the proposed repeal of the Embargo Act. I say again, "Don't give it to them." The men who wrote the Constitution, upon breaking with a tyrannical English King, wrote it with one basic idea, namely, that no one man or group of men outside Congress should ever again have such powers to run this country and the destinies of its people by proclamation. They knew the bitter taste of dictatorship. If you permit that authority to pass into the hands of any one man and slip that one remaining anchor chain of liberty, you are done as a democratic nation. Insist that the present Embargo Act be held as it is—unchanged.

Insist that Congress remain in session to handle our critical foreign affairs and until peace is declared in Europe. Under the Constitution this is the right and the function of Congress, not of the President. Insist that Congress muzzle the loose talkers in this administration, who, pretending to speak for themselves, are actually and deliberately shaping our international relations toward war. Democracy is not on trial; it's the leaders of democracy who are on trial. Democracy will live on forever. May God give you one ray of light to see the safety and sense of sticking for strict neutrality and for paying the price, which is a money price, and not a blank mandate on American liberties nor on American blood.

And if this is all too plain and too clear, just remember that, inspired by and paraphrasing the words of John Hancock, "Here it is—big enough and blunt enough for anyone to understand it."

Peace is a state of mind—of mind your own business. And America's business is here in the Americas.

Aspects of War in Europe

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EDWARD R. BURKE

OF NEBRASKA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, October 16 (legislative day of Wednesday, October 4), 1939

ARTICLE BY JACQUES MARITAIN

Mr. BURKE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an article under the heading "Europe is already saved," written by Jacques Maritain, and published in the Commonweal.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

EUROPE IS ALREADY SAVED

(By Jacques Maritain)

The thing which I want to say at once and that I want to cry from the housetops is that the spiritual situation of Europe has completely changed and that the salvation of Europe has begun. I am absolutely convinced that western civilization will be saved. To be more precise, it is already saved. At the price of whatever mass sacrifice, perhaps of what torrents of blood, of what destruction, after however many months of sorrow and agony, this salvation may be realized in events themselves, I beg you to believe that on that subject I am not suffering from any optimistic illusion.

I know what night we are entering; into what general ruin it is feared that the civilized universe may be thrown. But I also know that in this ruin the universe will not perish; I know that this night is not a night of despair but a night of resurrection. For anyone who seeks to understand the drama of human history from a point of view beyond that of the immediate moment, it seems that he must have an unshakable confidence in the final result of the war which has just begun.

I said that the spiritual situation of Europe has completely changed: The striking indication of this change is the Russo-German alliance. It has completed the unmasking of the enemy. For a long time, for a very long time, people everywhere—in the Old World as well as in the New—had been asking themselves this question, "Are we not forced to choose between communism and Hitlerism?" How many souls were tempted by their just horror of the Fascist and totalitarian slavery to sympathize with communism; how many were tempted by their just horror of the Communist slavery to sympathize with totalitarianism? In the name of the "principle of the lesser evil," falsely applied, were thus excused all crimes.

And when we took pains ceaselessly to explain that here was a question of two opposite aspects of the same evil, of two horns of the same devil, only those understood who attached some importance to the philosophy of history. Now the whole world understands, in the shattering clarity of events. One has only to see in one's mind Herr von Ribbentrop, the promoter of the anti-Comintern agreements, decorated with the Order of Lenin; it is sufficient to see Stalin and Ribbentrop shaking hands while they smile at one another the cynical smile of accomplices.

The moral sickness from which the Occident was wasting away, the horrible lie by virtue of which each believed himself obliged to choose between one bad thing and another bad thing and to set up one evil in opposition to another evil—such was the profound thing which threatened the civilized world with a self-destruction for which there was no remedy. That thing has disappeared. The false front of being a defender of order and civilization by which with diabolical hypocrisy the revolution of Hitler had disguised itself has fallen away. Iniquity and violence have met; the Marxist opposition to Christianity has embraced Hitler's opposition to Christianity.

Everybody clearly realizes that, whether bolstered by the myth of the dictatorship of one class or by the myth of the superiority of one race—by the Marxist-Stalinist myth of the state calling itself Socialist, embodying the proletariat and its destiny, or by the Hitler myth of the state calling itself "proletarian," embodying the superior race and its destiny—there is only one revolution; and this revolution is in essence directed against the first principles of all Christian civilization, against everything which indicates the mark of God on man, against everything which implies respect for the human person, for justice, and for truth, against everything which relates to greatness and liberty of the human soul. Hitler is the precursor (fourrier) of Stalin.

The illusion which held that the world was divided between the two antagonistic forces of Communist totalitarianism and of racist totalitarianism has been dispelled. Moreover, we know clearly that both one and the other totalitarianism are in reality but a single spirit, a single homicidal force. And face to face with that force is another which one can no longer call a third force (since the two which it opposed at the same time are now joined together)—that very force which created Europe and which has its purest sources in the Gospel, and which, while it requires our civilization to purify and renew itself in a radical way, nevertheless appears manifest as the vital principle of that same civilization. Here is the capital historical change which, in the spiritual order, we have just witnessed.

I have said that western civilization is already saved. The signal indication of that salvation is the way in which two people who have a horror of war have entered into war to stop the monstrous enterprise of Hitler's domination. When, on the level of temporal strife, anti-Christian totalitarian force took up with Hitler the arms of military aggression; when, treading underfoot all international good faith, German National Socialism undertook to impose by violence its will upon Poland and to devour that country while sheltering itself under the terror of a general European war, at that moment France and Great Britain took up the challenge; they deliberately opened the gates of war, knowing to what they exposed themselves. * * *

Civilization does not die unless it betrays itself. As long as it is capable of actions such as this one, it can suffer the most enormous losses; it is sure that it will not perish. However terrible may be the ordeal it will not be a tragedy but a sacrifice. And the end of a tragedy is death; but the end of a sacrifice is salvation and resurrection.

Jeanne d'Arc left us this prophecy: That one day France and England would unite to accomplish together a great enterprise. In one sense the present war seems to be the continuation of the war of 1914, but now its apocalyptic aspect has become manifest. Quite obviously it is for the common good of civilized humanity that France and England suffer and fight and that Poland has been martyred; it is for the fundamental human values to which every free spirit in the world, particularly the spirit of the American Nation, is attached. I know that the American public is clearly aware of this; that is why it is sufficient for me to mention the point briefly. If Hitler should triumph, the ideal of a society of free men, based on an effective respect for the rights of the person, offering to each an equal opportunity to develop the gifts which each has received from God, and allowing for fraternal cooperation, would receive a heart's blow. But Hitler will not triumph.

Permanent Crop Control

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN H. BANKHEAD, 2D

OF ALABAMA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, October 16 (legislative day of Wednesday, October 4), 1939

EDITORIAL FROM THE BIRMINGHAM NEWS OF OCTOBER 13, 1939

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a splendid editorial from the Birmingham News of October 13, 1939, on the subject of permanent crop control.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Birmingham (Ala.) News of October 13, 1939]

CROP CONTROL IS HERE TO STAY

Out of the efforts made during the last decade to improve the position of the American farmer, at least one national policy of major importance seems to be definitely established as a part of our agricultural economy. That is crop control.

In the light of events in recent years, it is hard to see how we can do without some kind of control over production in the few major crops, particularly cotton, wheat, tobacco, and possibly one or two others. It seems to be the only device whereby ruinous overproduction of these staple commodities can be prevented.

We shall probably continue to have crop control for two reasons. One is that it seems necessary, and the other is that the farmers themselves apparently do not intend to let go of the device, which in general has worked reasonably well for them.

After crop control was first adopted—with the consent of the farmers themselves—prices of the major agricultural commodities rose from the extremely low levels of the worst depression years, and the huge surpluses began to diminish. By preventing too great overproduction and cutting down the surpluses crop control put agriculture on a sounder and more stable basis. On crops of more moderate size farmers were able to obtain better prices and realize a higher income.

American agriculture was doing better from 1933 to 1936 than it had in years, largely because of crop control. Then in 1936 came the Supreme Court decision which invalidated the Agricultural Adjustment Act, and as a consequence of that the crop control acts were repealed. Immediately, we had overproduction again in the major crops, and prices tumbled. The farmers were almost back where they were before 1933.

In 1937, the first full crop year after the A. A. A. decision and the repeal of the crop-control acts, we grew the largest cotton crop in history, about 19,000,000 bales. In other major agricultural commodities we grew crops that were among the largest on record, if not the very largest.

This was no accident. The crops of 1936 were held to reasonable limits because, even though the A. A. A. was invalidated and the control acts repealed early that year, the machinery for controlling crops then being planted had already been put into operation. Crop control continued in existence for the crop year of 1936.

When almost all effective regulation of crops had been removed, farmers overproduced enormously in 1937, and the resulting collapse of agricultural commodity prices was probably the most important factor in bringing on the business recession which began that year.

Then, in 1938 and again this year, a measure of production control was again established in some of the major crops, though not all, and yields were once more brought within fairly reasonable limits.

The history of the improvement in the agricultural position from 1933 through 1936, the severe setback in 1937 after the invalidation of the A. A. A. and the repeal of the original crop control acts, and the beginning of another upturn in agriculture following the reestablishment of crop control in the last 2 years, offers convincing evidence of both the need and the effectiveness of regulated production.

Further proof of a very significant nature is found in the experience of one major farm group in the last 2 years—the bright-tobacco growers. These producers rejected the control plan for bright tobacco in the crop year of 1939. In the referendum a majority of the tobacco growers—50-odd percent—voted for crop control, but the majority was less than the required two-thirds, so there was no limitation of production. If memory serves, this was the first time that producers of a major crop failed to authorize control.

The result was that this year's crop in the bright-tobacco region was the largest in history—1,014,670,000 pounds. This overproduction glutted the market, and prices fell by one-third from the 1938 levels. Naturally, the bright-tobacco growers found themselves in a distressful condition.

The bright-tobacco growers learned their lesson from this experience. In the referendum held a few days ago on the question of a control program for the 1940 crop they voted overwhelmingly for control. The majority was about 9 to 1 in the six States participating—Georgia, Florida, Alabama, North Carolina, South Carolina, and Virginia. The percentages of the vote in favor of control ranged from 82 percent in Florida to 97.5 percent in Alabama, and the average for the six States was 89.9 percent.

With the record production this year and a carry-over of nearly 2,000,000,000 pounds, obviously the sensible thing to do was to restrict production for next year. The aim of the 1940 control program is to limit acreage to an amount that will produce not more than 660,000,000 pounds.

After experiences such as farmers have had in cotton, wheat, and tobacco in recent years, it is to be expected that in the future they will generally vote for crop control. As long as the farmers themselves have the decision on production control in their own hands, and as long as a two-thirds majority is required to make it effective, the device will be democratic in nature, and therefore not subject to objection on the ground that it is regimentation by government.

Crop control may not solve all our agricultural problems. But it is now clear that, whatever else is done, control of production in the major crops is essential to the stability of our agricultural economy.

A Comparison, Germany Today—And in 1914

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EMANUEL CELLER

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, October 16, 1939

RADIO COLLOQUY BETWEEN HON. EMANUEL CELLER, OF NEW YORK, AND DR. MAX WINKLER

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following colloquy between Dr. Max Winkler and myself, over station WOR, of the Mutual Broadcasting Co., on Friday, October 13, 1939, at 11:15 p. m., entitled "A Comparison, Germany Today—And in 1914," as follows:

Congressman CELLER. My attention has been directed to a statement in the Voelkischer Beobachter, Hitler's own newspaper, prior to the outbreak of the present conflict. It read, in part:

"Germany today is stronger than she was in July 1914. * * * The potential production of German industry in case of war is * * * much greater today than in 1914 because of the installation of modern machinery."

In your opinion, Dr. Winkler, is this statement true?

Dr. WINKLER. It is not. It was in all probability designed to impress the German reader, or those who are ignorant of the profound changes which have taken place in Germany since 1914 along economic and financial lines. I would say the reverse is true.

Congressman CELLER. In other words, Germany today is much worse off economically than she was at the outbreak of or during the first World War?

Dr. WINKLER. That is correct. Germany's own official figures, which certainly do not understate the situation, will prove it.

To begin with, Germany's stock of gold, which is still the universally accepted standard of value, has all been dissipated, with the result that German money has ceased to have any value in the financial markets of the world.

Congressmn CELLER. How do you explain another observation made by the Voelkischer Beobachter, namely:

"The times when it was predominantly necessary to have gold to wage a war are past"?

Dr. WINKLER. This would be true if Germany had either credit or foreign investments which could be liquidated and the proceeds used to pay for much that is needed by Germany to prosecute a war.

Congressman CELLER. But Germany has neither. Her credit has been destroyed as a result of her repudiation of virtually all legitimately contracted debts. Her foreign investments are estimated at a maximum of 5,000,000,000 marks, and much of it is in countries with exchange restrictions or regulations, thus rendering liquidation thereof difficult, if not impossible.

	Now	Prior to war	Decline
			Percent
Gold stock	RM70,773,000	RM1,238,000,000	94.28
Notes in circulation	8,092,000,000	2,742,000,000	[1] 195.11
Ratio of gold to notes	0.87	45.15
Federal debt	32,580,000,000	5,157,897,000	548.40
Exports	5,911,000,000	10,198,600,000	42.88
Imports	5,468,000,000	11,206,100,000	52.16
Total trade	11,379,000,000	21,404,700,000	46.85
Foreign investments	5,000,000,000	30,000,000,000	83.33

[1] Increase.

Dr. WINKLER. What was Germany's political position in the last World War and her economic advantages as a result thereof?

Congressman CELLER. When Germany plunged the world into war a quarter of a century ago, the Reich had an alliance with Austria-Hungary, Italy, and Rumania. She was successful in inducing also Bulgaria and Turkey to join what was known at the time as the Quadruple Alliance. This combination was, without any question, a much more powerful factor to be reckoned with than the Germany of today. Because of these alliances, Germany had complete access to, and control of, the rich wheat fields of Hungary and Rumania, the rich oil fields of Rumania and Austrian Poland. She had control of the Dardanelles and thus occupied a very important and most enviable position in the Near East at the gateway of three continents.

Dr. WINKLER. Is it not true also that even in the battlefield the Germans managed to achieve marked success?

Congressman CELLER. Certainly. Within a relatively short time Germany was successfully waging the so-called blitzkrieg. She invaded and occupied almost one-third of France, including its most important industrial section. She even came within a few miles of Paris. She invaded and occupied all of Belgium and controlled the important seaport of Antwerp. She invaded and occupied virtually all of Russian Poland and pre-war Serbia. But after the war had progressed, both Italy and Rumania decided to throw in their lot with the Allied Powers. As a result, the German armies invaded and occupied virtually all of Rumania. Technically, Italy today is still an axis partner of Germany. But, undoubtedly, when Mussolini refers to this partnership he does so with his tongue in his cheek. It is significant that Air Marshal Italo Balbo, who undoubtedly speaks with the knowledge and consent of Il Duce, has called the Soviet leaders "tragic buffoons" and "models of gross bestiality." Certainly this characterization of Germany's newest partner suggests very strongly that history may repeat itself and that Italy again will take its place at the side of the Allies.

In the spring of 1918 the Russians were forced to lay down arms, and by virtue of the treaty which was signed with the Russians at Brest-Litovsk, virtually all of the Czarist Empire came under the control of Germany. Is it not obvious from all this that the Germany of a quarter of a century ago was immeasurably stronger than today?

Dr. WINKLER. It would seem so. One more thing: Hitler storms against the Versailles Treaty.

Congressman CELLER. It hardly lies in his mouth to complain. He seems to have forgotten the outrageous terms which were imposed upon the Russians or Rumanians by the conquering Germans. The shoe was then on the other foot. The Treaty of Brest-Litovsk provided that Russia cede to Germany an area of more than 300,000 square miles with a population of about 50,000,000, or one-third of the population of all Russia.

The territory ceded contained 35 percent of the entire transportation system of the Czarist empire, three-quarters of all the iron production, and almost 90 percent of the entire coal output. In addition, Russia was obliged to pay at the earliest possible moment a war indemnity amounting to 6,000,000,000 marks, or one and one-half billion gold dollars, and surrender the entire gold reserve of the Russian State Bank.

It is characteristic of German promises and the manner in which they keep them that prior to the Brest-Litovsk Treaty the German Government solemnly declared that the basis for negotiations with Russia would be "no indemnity and no annexations."

How about Germany's treatment, or, rather, mistreatment, of the Rumanians after they laid down their arms?

Dr. WINKLE. Two days after Brest-Litovsk the Rumanians were forced to lay down arms and seek for peace. A treaty was signed at Bucharest on May 7. The most characteristic provision of the treaty was an agreement whereby Rumania was to sell to Germany, for a period of 2 years, the surplus of its entire agricultural and mineral production at about one-half of the prevailing market prices, with the German Government reserving the right to renew this agreement for an additional 7 years. It was further provided that all Rumanian demesnes were to be leased to a German company for a period of 90 years, Rumania agreeing to supply labor in connection with the exploitation of the land. When the Rumanian delegate was on the verge of collapse as a result of being called upon to sign this shameful treaty, the German spokesman encouraged him by saying:

"This is indeed a treaty of genuine friendship compared with what we have in mind for England and France."

Congressman CELLER. Apparently, as to harshness and cruelty, the Versailles Treaty fades into insignificance when compared with the treaties of Brest-Litovsk and Bucharest, which Germany foisted upon Russia and Rumania.

Dr. WINKLER. Incidentally, what is your opinion about the Fuehrer's latest peace overture, and do you think it is a sincere offer of peace?

Congressman CELLER. No. Emphatically no. Hitler is really in a state of panic. He certainly is most anxious for peace, despite his successful blitzkrieg in Poland. His offer is prompted, however, by a genuine desire to save Germany from inevitable collapse. He is also reminded, perhaps, of the deposition and flight of the Kaiser. The situation in Germany as revealed by statistics, both official and semiofficial, is most desperate, and, despite all the assurances to the contrary, Germany is in no position to last through a protracted war.

Dr. WINKLER. The unholy alliance with Moscow is likely to prove an empty victory if not a real embarrassment. Foxy Stalin is playing both ends toward the middle. Note his recent barter of English rubber and tin for Russian timber—and he guarantees delivery to Britain, this despite German submarine menace.

Congressman CELLER. Is it not also true that Russia is in no position to supply Germany with raw materials, even if she were willing to sell to the Reich in return for very dubious I. O. U.'s?

Dr. WINKLER. This is absolutely so. I have before me a compilation of Russian production which was published in the Deutsche Volkswirt under date of August 11. Some 16 different products are examined, and it is found that in 13 cases the amount produced is either substantially below or just about equal to the minimum requirements within Russia. In only three cases is there any excess over domestic needs.

Congressman CELLER. These figures, moreover, apply to a peacetime consumption. In wartime the excess of output over home requirements is substantially less. Remember, also, that the only products which can be exported to Germany are manganese, timber, less what she barters to England, and very little oil. And as to these, the rising demands of Stalin's army may exhaust all surplus. Then, again, the difficulties of transportation are almost insurmountable. Practically all rail lines in Poland between Russia and Germany have been wrecked. There remains the Baltic, but this is too roundabout a way, as these products come from southern Russia.

Dr. WINKLER. There is no doubt about this.

Congressman CELLER. Much has been said about the enormous reserves which Germany has in food. What is Germany's position in this respect?

Dr. WINKLER. Here again we have official statistics which disprove the German boasts. The Frankfurter Zeitung, in an article published August 29, points out that the food reserves amounted on July 31, 1939, to 4,489,000 tons, of which 289,000 tons were in the hands of farmers and the remainder in warehouses and elevators. On the preceding day, August 28, the German Minister of Food Supplies, Walter Darie, in a broadcast to the German people, presumably for the purpose of allaying their fears created by the distribution of food ration cards, said, and I quote:

"We possessed on August 1, 1939, exclusive of the new harvest, a reserve of agricultural products aggregating 8,600,000 tons. The importance of this huge reserve is apparent if one realizes that all the requirements of the German people for bread and flour do not amount to more than this figure for a full year."

Congressman CELLER. It would, therefore, seem that the actual amount, as given by the Frankfurter Zeitung, is just about enough to last Germany slightly more than half a year.

Dr. WINKLER. It is apparent, is it not, Congressman CELLER, that the Nazis are repeating their exploits of the World War?

Congressman CELLER. Indeed they are. As in 1916–17, they have already sent forth their armed raiders disguised as merchant ships and these masked surface bandit ships are wreaking tremendous havoc to Swedish, Danish, Norwegian, Dutch, Finnish, and other neutral shipping. At this very moment the Nazis are conducting powerful propaganda in this country to continue the arms embargo. I personally am receiving mail sacks full of letters which bear Nazi earmarks. Among those I have received in opposition to my stand favoring the repeal of the arms embargo, are some 45 communications, presumably from 45 different constituents in my district. Strangely enough, the letters, all exactly alike, emanated from one address. I took the trouble to search out the house and, to my amazement, found it to be an empty lot. I have answered many of the other letters. Scores have replied that they were surprised to receive the acknowledgment, inasmuch as they had not written me. They complain that in all likelihood their names have been used by pressure groups. Hundreds of my acknowledgments have been returned to me marked "unknown at address." Furthermore, over 200 mimeographed postal cards bitterly assailing me were presumably sent out by residents in my district. Upon close examination we discovered that all of them are mailed from a Long Island City post office substation at 10 a. m. on the same day. Long Island City is far removed from my district.

In 1916 the Germans had a well-organized campaign to establish the arms embargo. The Source Records of the Great War, particularly volume 3, make interesting reading indicative of the extremes to which the Germans went in 1916–17 to influence public opinion in this country, especially to develop sentiment for an arms embargo. Count von Bernstoff openly boasted in his cables to the German Foreign Office that he was quite sure of a successful campaign to secure a majority of both Houses concerning the embargo. The American embargo conference was one of the Kaiser's numerous propaganda organizations in the United States. It was established to prevent the exportation of munitions to the Allies. The outfit distributed to 5,000,000 voters letters advocating an arms embargo. Twenty thousand dollars was paid into the Chicago offices alone of the two telegraph companies. Millions of pamphlets and circulars were also distributed, particularly denouncing American makers of munitions. In the volumes aforesaid there may be found frequent requests successfully made by Von Bernstoff to Wilhelmstrasse for additional funds to force pro-German policies on Congress. President Wilson was in fact accused of unneutrality in permitting exports of munitions concerning which Count von Bernstoff lodged a protest with the State Department. Wilson denied the request of Von Bernstoff and refused to depart from the neutrality that the United States had always followed, as that doctrine had been understood in international law. Frankly, I say again that we must stand by that international law. It is our anchor to windward. We always relied upon our right to purchase munitions from neutrals in our hours of war and need. A right which we always asserted for ourselves we cannot now deny to others.

Dr. WINKLER. Is not Hitler's recent speech a bullying bid for peace very much like the Reich 1916 peace note?

Congressman CELLER. The resemblance is unmistakable. Germany made a peace move in 1916, after the fall of Bucharest, Rumania. She had been dreadfully weakened by her losses in the Battle of the Somme. Emperor Franz Josef and his Austrian-Hungarian Army were getting scared. Food and fuel were running short. The Kaiser then sought peace as Hitler now seeks peace—for the same reasons. The Kaiser's military staff cautioned him not to make any bid for peace and at the same time give any hint of weakness. He must wait until after an important German success. The dodge is being revived by Hitler. The victory of Bucharest provided the opportunity then, just as the fall of Warsaw provides it now. Examine Hitler's speeches and the Kaiser's plea for peace and you find both containing the same admixture of cant, bombast, and sheer gall.

Apparently there is nothing new. Just as in the World War, the German Government gave repeated assurances which proved worthless, so, too, Hitler, in the last few years, has likewise made pledge after pledge which he has convincingly demonstrated to be so many scraps of paper.

Dr. WINKLER. Do you not agree that it is the economic war rather than the war on land or in the air which Germany dreads most?

Congressman CELLER. I certainly do.

Dr. WINKLER. In other words, we are more or less in agreement as to the importance which economic weapons play in modern warfare. The employment of these weapons which are possessed by the western powers and not by the autocracies justify the hopes and expectations that the tyranny of Hitler and all that Hitlerism stands for will collapse, as did the tyranny of the Hohenzollerns and all they stood for 20 years ago. Democracy then triumphed over autocracy and will undoubtedly triumph again.

Strengthen Defenses; Keep Peace Uppermost in Mind

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. IVOR D. FENTON

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, October 16, 1939

Mr. FENTON. Mr. Speaker, under permission to extend my remarks, I want to emphatically state that our country must be kept out of the European war. Our Army and Navy must be strong enough to defend the United States from invasion, and which will also help to guarantee the peace of our Nation.

I have received thousands of petitions from my constituents in the hard coal area of Schuylkill and Northumberland Counties in Pennsylvania. Hundreds have come from other parts of the country.

Many petitions favor retention of the arms-embargo provision of the present Neutrality Act; others propose repeal. Many citizens want no change in the act; others urge different forms of modifications.

With some of the greatest countries of the world now in conflict, God only knows what the morrow will bring. The momentous question of neutrality is one in which there is a great variance of opinion.

Personally, I pray to God that the United States will not become involved in another conflict which will sap the life and vitality of our Nation. As one who has served in the World War, I think I can speak authoritatively of the horrors of war.

In my every action I have endeavored to follow principles which I conscientiously believe will help keep our country from becoming involved in foreign entanglements.

I hope, in the future, the Almighty will grant me the foresight and wisdom to act in a manner that will safeguard the neutrality of our country at a time when judgment is so sorely pressed, and what we might regard as a trivial move might have far-reaching and disastrous consequences.

I am 100 percent for an Army and Navy strong enough to defend our country from invasion, and which will help guarantee the peace of our Nation.

Our country must be kept out of the European war. Never again should the life of our manhood be sacrificed on the blood-stained battlefields of Europe.

As we are in special session my thoughts in Congress and my actions will certainly reflect the spirit of my constituents at home, whom I have faithfully endeavored to serve during the last session.

It is my fervent prayer that during the present situation my actions will be in the best interests of my constituents and our beloved country.

The people of the United States are a peace-loving people. The best way to protect that peace is to strengthen our defenses, and keep peace uppermost in our minds.

Dedication of the Hispanic Room in the Library of Congress

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JERRY VOORHIS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, October 16, 1939

RADIO ADDRESS BY ARCHIBALD MacLEISH, LIBRARIAN OF CONGRESS

Mr. VOORHIS of California. Mr. Speaker, as war rages in Europe our relations with the Hispanic American republics become increasingly important. The inescapable forces of foreign war constantly raise up problems of cultural, diplomatic, and commercial relations with our neighboring American nations which require the friendliest atmosphere for their solution. Although friendship between nations is an end in itself, there is now more justification than that for good relations. The American nations must draw together, in free and voluntary union, for defense against the forces threatening their peace, their freedom, and their ancient democracy.

Few Government agencies are so well situated to aid in advancing this necessary and desirable common front as the Library of Congress. On Columbus Day Archibald MacLeish, Librarian of Congress, dedicated the Hispanic room in the Library of Congress. His address was broadcast to Central and South America. It was a magnificent beginning of what will undoubtedly be a most important contribution by the Library of Congress to the cause of better American relations. I take great pleasure in extending my remarks with the following text of the address by Dr. MacLeish:

REMARKS OF ARCHIBALD MACLEISH, LIBRARIAN OF CONGRESS, ON THE OCCASION OF THE DEDICATION OF THE HISPANIC ROOM IN THE LIBRARY OF CONGRESS, OCTOBER 12, 1939

This is an occasion without precedent in the history of the Library of Congress. But not perhaps for the reason of which you think. It is an occasion without precedent in the history of the Library of Congress because it is the first time in the Library's history when the Librarian has opened a new building or a new division with a speech.

The Library moved across from the Capitol to the building in which we stand to the accompaniment of an eloquent and admired silence. Forty years later it pushed its frontiers across the street to the Annex, which can be seen from these windows, without a single word. Today it opens its Hispanic room with a speech by the Librarian.

Unkind critics or unkinder friends will suggest that the difference is a difference in Librarians—that my predecessor being truly a librarian knew the golden value of that silence to which students in libraries are continually admonished; whereas I, being a versifier, suffer from the itch for words which has always characterized my calling. It is a plausible explanation for it contains much truth. There is indeed a difference in Librarians and a difference, I fear, for the worse.

But the real explanation is not this. The real explanation is that the times change as well as the men. There are times when a great institution can let stone and mortar speak for it. And there are other times when it must attempt to speak, however haltingly, for itself.

This is such a time. Once the value of the things of the spirit could be taken for granted. Once it could be taken for granted anywhere in the civilized world that the free inquiry of the free spirit was essential to the dignified and noble life of man. Once it could be assumed as a matter of course that the work of artists, the work of poets, the work of scholars, was good and should be respected and would be preserved. Now it is no longer possible to assume these things. Now—and it is still incredible to us that it should be true—now such an act of faith in the life of the human spirit as we perform here today, such an act of respect for the labor of poets and scholars and of love for that which they have made, cannot be taken for granted; cannot be left to speak for itself even in a room as beautiful, as eloquent as this. It is necessary for us to say what it is that we are doing and why it is that we are doing it.

I for one am not proud of this necessity. I am not glad that it is necessary to speak.

What we do is this: We dedicate here a room and a division of the Library of Congress which has been set apart for the preservation and the study and the honor of the literature and scholarship of those other republics which share with ours the word American, and which share with ours also the memories of human hope and human courage which that word evokes—evokes now as never before in the history of our hemisphere.

Why we do it is also obvious. We do it because this literature and this scholarship are worthy in themselves of the closest study and the most meticulous care and the greatest veneration; and because they, more than any other literature and more than any other scholarship, help us in this Republic to understand the American past which is common to us all.

We are beginning to perceive, as the peaceful dream of the nineteenth century fades away and the economic theories and scientific theories, which were to explain everything, fade away with it—we are beginning to perceive that man never was, and never can be, such a philosophic abstraction as the thinkers of that century supposed—that man is a creature living on this earth and that the earth he lives on qualifies his life. America has shaped and qualified and redirected the lives of men living on her continents for 400 years. But we who are born in America and live our lives here, have not very well understood our relations to these continents, nor our debt to them, nor in what way they have altered us and changed our bodies and our minds.

We have not understood this because we have turned, for the most part, to the literature and the scholarship of Europe for instruction, and for the interpretation of our world. Those of us who were of Latin origin have turned to the literatures of latinized Europe, and those of us who were of English and Celtic and Scandinavian and Teutonic origin to the literatures of northern Europe. We have found there great treasures, great wisdom, high instruction—but only rarely an interpretation of our own lives in terms of the earth we know. Even the American child reading his European poems feels the strangeness: the seasons are wrong, the springs too early or too slow, the birds and animals different.

It is a curious condition but one which, by long habit, we have come to take as natural. We have looked at America with borrowed European eyes so long that we should hardly recognize the country if we saw it with our own. Doubtless we shall continue for many generations to look at America with these eyes. Our cultural inheritance is European by origin, and like other European legatees of other legacies we can enjoy it only in the original currency. Which means inevitably that we employ that original currency to value our American lives. But though it is inevitable that the great richness of our European past should impose its values upon our American present, it is not inevitable, and it is surely not desirable, that the great richness of our European past should exclude us from the richness of our own.

From the beginning of the sixteenth century there has been accumulating on these continents a body of recorded American experience of the very greatest importance to anyone concerned to understand the American earth and the relation of that earth to the men who live upon it. Because this experience has been recorded in several languages and because it has been deposited in scattered places—places as far apart as Santiago de Chile and Bogotá and Buenos Aires and Mexico City and New Orleans and St. Louis and Quebec—because, furthermore, it has been overlaid with the continuing importation of European literature and European thought—for all these reasons the recorded American experience has not influenced the common life of the Americas as it should have influenced it. It has not been useful to an understanding of the Americas as it should have been useful.

Other men who know these continents better than I know them—other men who know these records of the American experience better than I shall ever know them—will think of many instances in their own lives when the words of men who lived in the Americas before them have made suddenly clear, and suddenly explicable, matters they had long wished to understand. But even in my shallow knowledge of these things there is one such indebtedness. Some 12 years ago in a Paris library I came upon a copy of Bernal Diaz' True History of the Conquest of New Spain. There in that still living, still human, still sharply breathing and believable story of Mexico it seemed to me that I understood for the first time the Central American experience—the experience which is American because it can be nothing else—the experience of all those who, of whatever tongue, are truly American—the experience of the journey westward from the sea into the unknown and dangerous country beyond which lies the rich and lovely city for which men hope.

I tried at that time to make a poem of this understanding. The argument of my poem began—

> Of that world's conquest and the fortunate wars;
> Of the great report and expectation of honor.
> How in their youth they stretched sail; how fared they > Westward under the wind, by wave wandered,
> Shoaled ship at the last at the ends of ocean.
> How they were marching in the lands beyond.
> Of the difficult ways there were and the winter's snow;
> Of the city they found in the good lands: how they lay in it;
> How there was always the leaves and the days going.

Other men will say the same thing in other words and many of them better. Historians will tell us how their study of the documents and monuments of Mexico and Peru opened to their minds the true perspective of American civilization—a civilization of which the first European date is the year 1523 when a school for Indian boys was opened in Mexico City—of which the first American date lies deep under the limestone waters of Yucatan and the iron earth of Guatemala. Scholars will speak of the year 1539 when the first book to be printed in the Americas was printed in the city of Mexico. Lovers of human liberty will remember the name of Carlos de Sigüenza y Góngora who, in the year 1691, at a time when witches were being hung in Salem, successfully defended against the ecclesiastics of Mexico his opinion that the great eclipse of that year was a natural event. They will quote against all witch-burners in all centuries and countries his noble words: "I stood with my quadrant and telescope viewing the [blackened] sun, extremely happy and repeatedly thanking God for having granted that I might behold what so rarely happens in a given place and about which there are so few observations in the books."

No man living in the United States can truly say he knows the Americas unless he has a knowledge of these things—a knowledge of this other American past, this older American past which shares with ours the unforgettable experience of the journey toward the west and the westward hope.

What we are doing in this room, then, is to dedicate to the uses of the citizens of the United States, and to the uses of learners and readers everywhere, these records of the American experience. In this Hispanic room of the Library, students of the Americas may follow the great Iberian tradition which has populated with its ideas and its poetry by far the greater part of these two continents. Here they may read the rich and various works written in these continents in the Iberian tongues—the two great tongues which, with our own, have become the American language. Here, if our hopes are realized, Americans may some day find the greatest collection of Hispanic literature and scholarship ever gathered in one place.

There are men in the world today—and many rather than few—who say that the proper study of mankind is not man but a particular kind of man. There are those who teach that the only cultural study proper to a great people is its own culture. There are those also who say that the only real brotherhood is that blood brotherhood for which so many wars have been fought and by which so many deaths are still justified. The dedication of this room and of this collection of books is a demonstration of the fact that these opinions are not valid in the Americas; that in the Americas, peopled by so many hopes, so many sufferings, so many races, the highest brotherhood is still the brotherhood of the human spirit and the true study is the study of the best.

This is the belief of the people of this Republic expressed by the action of their National Library in the dedication of this room.

Why Be Foolish Again?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EARL C. MICHENER

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, October 16, 1939

EDITORIAL FROM THE DETROIT FREE PRESS

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Speaker, the Detroit Free Press is one of the outstanding newspapers in the State of Michigan and the Middle West. A constituent has called my attention to a recent editorial in the Detroit Free Press, which I feel confident expresses the sentiment of an overwhelming majority of the people of Michigan.

Pursuant to the authority given to me to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include this editorial, which is as follows:

[From the Detroit Free Press of September 24, 1939]

WHY BE FOOLISH AGAIN?

We in America separated from Europe and put an ocean between ourselves and that continent because we wanted to live more free, more wholesome, more comfortable and saner lives than could be lived there.

We came to America because we wanted to get away from the silly festering quarrels and enmities of the Old World, from its barbarous wars and from its miasmic morals.

We came to America because we didn't want to be ruled by an overlord or a military caste, or by autocratic fiat, but wanted to rule ourselves.

Then in 1917 we found ourselves inveigled and bullied into going back and wallowing in the old mess.

This was in part because we listened to seductive propaganda, and in part because we had neglected to maintain a power of self-defense which would have made even reckless belligerents respect our rights.

The rewards for our foolishness were the lives and limbs of thousands upon thousands of the best of our youth, a war debt of billions of dollars, a moral and economic upset from which we have not yet recovered, and flagrant, and in some cases abusive, ingratitude from those we had aided.

And all we did was a total loss. We did not help Europe, and we hurt ourselves grievously and dangerously.

Now efforts are being made by all sorts of propagandists to induce us to do the same foolish thing a second time.

These propagandists try to appeal to our sympathies and to our sentimentality, to our prejudices and to our hates. They undertake to flatter and scare us. They try to tempt us with promises of gain and to intimidate us with threats of loss.

We are told by people who wag their heads mournfully that we "can't stay out."

But all this is just the old gold-brick game, whether it is run from Washington or London or Paris or by whisperers in parlors and clubs and on street corners.

Twenty-two years ago we allowed ourselves to be led across the ocean by the nose to grovel in the chronic slaughterhouse which is Europe. We know what the reward was. Why in the name of common human intelligence should we fall for that sort of thing again?

Civil Liberties in America

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CHARLES H. LEAVY

OF WASHINGTON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, October 16, 1939

ADDRESS BY HON. FRANK MURPHY

Mr. LEAVY. Mr. Speaker, the matter of what constitutes civil liberties and what constitutes an infringement thereon is always of great concern in our country. In unusual periods of national and international stress, when our emotions rather than our reason control our actions, civil liberties are often endangered and impaired. We are passing through just such a period at this time, and the sound, patriotic counsel of men who understand and know is entitled to unusual consideration.

On October 13, 1939, in New York City, at a conference on civil liberties, the Honorable Frank Murphy, Attorney General of the United States, delivered an address which was broadcast throughout the Nation on this important subject of civil liberties. Attorney General Murphy has demonstrated time without number, as head of the chief law-enforcing agency of the United States Government, that he is a man of sound judgment, high ideals, and a patriotism not excelled anywhere in this great land of ours. This address, entitled "The Test of Patriotism," will serve for many years as a guide for every liberty-loving American.

I am proud to have the privilege of making this speech of this great man a part of the permanent records of this Congress by having it inserted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, and I cannot too highly commend it to my fellow citizens everywhere. The address follows:

Five months ago, when the western world was still clinging to an uncertain peace, I was privileged to meet with a group of municipal officials and to discuss with them the subject of civil liberties. I had occasion to say that in my settled conviction the finest contribution which America has made to civilization is our loyalty to the idea of civil liberty.

Tonight, when much of the western world is torn by a fierce and bloody war, I want very heartily to reaffirm that conviction.

It is true that in certain parts of the world might for the moment appears to be triumphant over right. It is true that in many countries the traditional civil and religious rights of the individual are no longer recognized.

These are realistic facts that we must realistically face. Common sense dictates that with virility and courage we must prepare ourselves to guard all the magnificent physical and spiritual resources that make up our national heritage. To let our defenses weaken, to be soft or infirm in our attitude toward national security, would be a faithless and unworthy thing.

But while we must be strong to protect our democratic heritage, we can and must still recognize that the heart and soul of our heritage is the civil liberty of the individual, and that in protecting our physical wealth we must not destroy our spiritual wealth of freedom. For civil liberty is still the finest possession of the American people. It is still that priceless thing without which life loses its dignity and becomes only a hopeless form of spritual slavery.

And by the same measure that civil liberty is precious to us we must be willing and determined to defend it against the forces that threaten to destroy it.

In a world filled with many uncertainties there are some things that are certain.

We know that in the hearts of the American people there is a great, steadfast desire to keep out of war. It is a desire for peace that no public servant or political leader in this land can afford to underestimate.

But we also know that in a world where force has been unleashed the mere desire for peace is not a guaranty that a peace-loving nation can remain at peace.

It is not enough for us merely to say that we want peace and that we abhor war—that we will have no part of war. When the world is aflame with war, or gravely threatened by war, it is the duty of a responsible government to do something more than talk peace. First, it must take active steps to prevent unnecessary involvement. Second, it should make itself ready to resist attack—not only attack from without but attack from within as well—attack by sabotage and subversive activities.

I am concerned tonight to discuss our defense from internal aggression. For we cannot be unmindful of the fact that the present attack on peace and liberty in Europe originated in the internal aggression of powerful groups against the democratic authority of their own lawfully established governments.

But in our zeal to protect ourselves from internal aggression, we must be on guard that we ourselves are not guilty of aggression against the civil liberties of our own citizens. We must not fall victim to the infection of despotism that in recent years has been sweeping the world. For if we suppress civil liberty, we suppress democracy itself.

In our own land this generation has seen a little of what happens when a crisis develops and the Government is not prepared to protect its people against internal attack. I have in mind the period of the World War and some of the wrongs against liberty that were done in the name of patriotism.

Let me make it plain that I have not come before you in the role of the "second guesser" who always knows afterward what should have been done in a particular situation. I am speaking only as a citizen and public servant who earnestly hopes and confidently believes that we, the American people, will profit by our own wartime mistakes and, even more, by the mistakes of other democracies that no longer live to tell the story.

I believe we all should recognize that however tragic the wrongs that were done, they sprang from misdirected zeal rather than evil intent.

We should remember that in the feverish, warlike atmosphere—an atmosphere which inevitably is dangerous to liberty—average citizens, normally calm and reasonable, became so imbued with the rightness of their cause that opposition or criticism was intolerable to them. Not only could they brook no open disagreement with national policy, but the failure of others to share their own attitude became in their eyes evidence of lack of patriotism.

From suspicion and distrust it was for some people an easy step to violence and vigilante activities. In some communities, irresponsible, extralegal organizations assumed functions that belonged properly to the civil authorities. And in some cases the civil authorities themselves were carried away by a hysteria of fear. Defenseless men and women were mistreated by such groups on mere suspicion. On many occasions the constitutional right of peaceful essembly was violated and homes were invaded and searched in the dark of night for evidence of disaffection and disloyalty. In their zeal to help defend their country well-meaning people resorted to methods which in the calm of peacetime would not be considered.

Even if we recognize, as we must, that this condition was not general, it is a picture that friends of democracy have every reason to regret. But I want to emphasize how much I believe that instead of viewing it with rancor toward anyone we should keep two things carefully in mind.

First, we should remember that much of this was done sincerely in the name of patriotism and national defense.

Second, we should keep in our minds and hearts a firm resolution that while making the security of the country our first and greatest concern in this troubled hour, we will injure not one of the qualities that have made this Nation the strongest haven of democracy and freedom on earth.

I know there are sincere individuals who earnestly believe that in a period like the present, when the country is seeking ways to avoid war but yet must prepare its defenses, it is not possible to maintain both civil liberty and a strong defense against internal attack at one and the same time. They are convinced that we must choose between the temporary suppression of civil rights and a weak and ineffective internal defense.

I do not believe that we face any such choice. I do not believe that a democracy must necessarily become something other than a democracy in order to protect its national interests. I am convinced that if the job is done right—if the defense against internal aggression is carefully prepared—our people need not suffer the tragic things that have happened elsewhere in the world and that we have seen, in less degree, even in this land of freedom. We can prevent and punish the abuse of liberty by sabotage, disorder, and violence without destroying liberty itself.

At the time of the World War, the country's defense against internal attack was not fully prepared, and events took their natural course. The civil authorities were not trained for their new responsibilities. The door was wide open for irresponsible organizations to set themselves up as agencies of law enforcement. That is precisely what happened.

Today the picture is quite different. The delicate business of combating espionage has been coordinated under the Department of Justice. Under responsible direction, it will be carried on, as it is today, not by overzealous, inexperienced laymen, but by men who have been equipped for the work by careful training—training that includes instruction in the rights of the citizen as well as in methods of crime suppression. And we have every reason to expect them to be worthy of their training and instruction.

This work should be done and will be done by responsible employees of the Federal Government, acting in cooperation with the duly constituted law-enforcing agencies of State and local governments. There will be no alinement with agents of vigilante groups or private industrial organizations which are concerned primarily with industrial disputes and labor problems. Enforcement officials will themselves obey the law of the land.

I believe that in this way we can eliminate at least the occasion for many of the wrongs that were done under the stress and strain of the World War. But at the same time, I recognize that preparedness on the part of the Federal Government is not by itself a guaranty that these things will not happen again. To meet the double responsibility of self defense and preservation of civil liberty, we need from every State and local government and, preeminently, from every citizen, an equal determination that this responsibility shall be met.

We need, and we earnestly ask, from every citizen and every government an unswerving resolve that for as long as this crisis endures, we will keep our heads—that we will not abandon our bill of rights—that whatever measures we may adopt for our defense against subversive activities, we will use them just as calmly and judiciously as we do firmly and resolutely.

But given a thoroughly prepared internal defense, given the proper mental attitude of calmness and cool reasoning, we need something more. We need a sound sense of direction—a clear understanding of our own policy and our own position.

First, we need to remember that in an emergency it is right and just for our democracy to be on guard not only against internal attack by foreign agents but obstructive activities by people in our own ranks as well.

We have a right to expect that once a policy has been formulated and adopted by constitutional, democratic procedure, it will be accepted and observed by all as an expression of the sovereign will of the people, until such time as the policy is changed by constitutional methods. Even those who disagree with it should do their part to make it effective. This is the democratic way in peacetime; it is the democratic way in time of war.

Finally, we have a right to expect that attempts to prevent the fulfillment of a policy by sabotage, violence, or subversive activities can and will be dealt with vigorously and according to law.

And here we can take our lesson from those democracies abroad that failed to deal vigorously with illegal activities against the democratic process and that now are only memories in the minds of men.

The second thing we need to remember is that an emergency does not abrogate the Constitution or dissolve the Federal Bill of Rights. That is not only good sense; it is good constitutional law.

Seventy-three years ago, 1 year after the Civil War, the Supreme Court declared in the famous Milligan case that "the Constitution of the United States is a law for rulers and people, equally in war and in peace, and covers with the shield of its protection all classes of men, at all times, and under all circumstances."

To the many friends of civil liberty gathered at this conference I want to give the emphatic assurance that in this emergency, as well as in time of peace, the Department of Justice embraces that policy without reservation. And because we are convinced that it represents the wishes of the overwhelming majority of the American people, we are determined to apply it and to practice it as thoroughly and intelligently as men are capable of doing.

We are aware, and the pepole should also be aware, that this will be no simple task. It is a problem of steering an even course that will invade neither of the two boundaries that I have mentioned. In brief, it is a problem of finding a sound basis for maintaining public safety without encroaching on the Bill of Rights.

In enforcing some laws we must not violate other laws. In upholding the Constitution we must not infringe on the priceless heritage of civil liberty which the Constitution guarantees. To do that—to suppress or suspend the Bill of Rights—would be to destroy the very democratic principles that we are seeking to preserve. It would be to yield to the same autocratic psychology that we want to keep out of this country. We must not let that come to pass. We must have it understood that while we will oppose firmly and vigorously any illegal activities we will do so in a responsible manner and within the orbit of the Constitution. That is the American way.

The immortal Justice Holmes laid down a formula which I believe will help us to keep a true course. In a celebrated war-time case, involving the very things we have discussed here tonight, he wrote these lines:

"When men have realized that time has upset many fighting faiths, they may come to believe even more than they believe the very foundations of their own conduct that the ultimate good desired is better reached by free trade in ideas. * * * While that experiment is part of our system, I think that we should be eternally vigilant against attempts to check the expression of opinions that we loathe—unless they so imminently threaten immediate interference with the lawful and pressing purposes of the law that an immediate check is required to save the country."

The willingness, the determination, the ability to follow that democratic principle, so ably stated by a great friend and interpreter of democracy, will be, in my estimation, a real test of patriotism in this or any future crisis.

The true citizen of America will remember that loyalty to our tradition of civil liberty is as much a part of patriotism as defense of our shores and a hatred for treason. He will never forget that civil liberty under the American system is a legal right in time of war as well as time of peace—that, whatever the time, it is liberty for all, irrespective of the accident of birth.

The true American will remember that, whether it be peacetime or wartime, there could be nothing more unpatriotic in this land of many peoples and many creeds than the persecution of minorities and the fomenting of hatred and strife on the basis of race or religion.

He will realize that if, in the atmosphere of war, we allow civil liberty to slip away from us, it may not be long before our recent great gains in social and economic justice will also have vanished, for a nation that is calloused in its attitude toward civil rights is not likely to be sensitive toward the many grave problems that affect the dignity and security of its citizens. We must not let this crisis destroy what we have so dearly won.

Many years ago, in the midst of another great emergency, Abraham Lincoln put this question to the Congress of the United States:

"Must a government of necessity be too strong for the liberties of its own people or too weak to maintain its own existence?"

Let us in this troubled hour answer that question as befits a great and enlightened democracy. Let us prove for all time that ours is a twofold strength—the physical strength of self-defense and the moral strength of unflinching devotion to our own ideals.

The Russo-German Alliance

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. THOMAS F. FORD

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, October 16, 1939

ARTICLE BY JACQUES MARITAIN

Mr. THOMAS F. FORD. Mr. Speaker, the hypocritical attempt on the part of the totalitarian dictators to maintain the fiction that Hitlerism and Stalinism were motivated by different objectives has at last been abandoned, and the world now sees both communism and nazi-ism as identical enemies of western civilization and Christianity. In fact, the Hitler-Stalin pact is the mating of the "Beast of Berlin" with the "Brute of Moscow."

Just what effect this throwing aside of the mask by these two cynical, bloodthirsty tyrants will have on the future of the world is the theme of the following splendid article from the pen of Jacques Maritain, which appeared first in the Commonweal and was reprinted in the Washington Post of Sunday, October 15, 1939:

[From the Commonweal]

EUROPE IS ALREADY SAVED

(By Jacques Maritain)

The thing which I want to say at once and that I want to cry from the housetops is that the spiritual situation of Europe has completely changed and that the salvation of Europe has begun. I am absolutely convinced that western civilization will be saved. To be more precise, it is already saved. At the price of whatever mass sacrifice, perhaps of what torrents of blood, of what destruction, after however many months of sorrow and agony, this salvation may be realized in events themselves, I beg you to believe that on that subject I am not suffering from any optimistic illusion.

I know what night we are entering; into what general ruin it is feared that the civilized universe may be thrown. But I also know that in this ruin the universe will not perish; I know that this night is not a night of despair but a night of resurrection. For anyone who seeks to understand the drama of human history from a point of view beyond that of the immediate moment, it seems that he must have an unshakable confidence in the final result of the war which has just begun.

I said that the spiritual situation of Europe has completely changed. The striking indication of this change is the Russo-German alliance. It has completed the unmasking of the enemy. For a long time, for a very long time, people everywhere—in the Old World as well as in the New—had been asking themselves this question, Are we not forced to choose between communism and Hitlerism? How many souls were tempted by their just horror of the Fascist and totalitarian slavery to sympathize with communism? How many were tempted by their just horror of the Communist slavery to sympathize with totalitarianism? In the name of the "principle of the lesser evil," falsely applied, were thus excused all crimes.

And when we took pains ceaselessly to explain that here was a question of two opposite aspects of the same evil, of two horns of the same devil, only those understood who attached some importance to the philosophy of history. Now the whole world understands in the shattering clarity of events. One has only to see in one's mind Herr Von Ribbentrop, the promoter of the anti-Comintern agreements, decorated with the Order of Lenin; it is sufficient to see Stalin and Ribbentrop shaking hands while they smile at one another the cynical smile of accomplices.

The moral sickness from which the Occident was wasting away, the horrible lie by virtue of which each believed himself obliged to choose between one bad thing and another bad thing and to set up one evil in opposition to another evil—such was the profound thing which threatened the civilized world with a self-destruction for which there was no remedy. That thing has disappeared. The false front of being a defender of order and civilization by which with diabolical hypocrisy the revolution of Hitler had disguised itself has fallen away. Iniquity and violence have met; the Marxist opposition to Christianity has embraced Hitler's opposition to Christianity.

Everybody clearly realizes that, whether bolstered by the myth of the dictatorship of one class or by the myth of the superiority of one race—by the Marxist-Stalinist myth of the state calling itself Socialist, embodying the proletariat and its destiny, or by the Hitler myth of the state calling itself "proletarian," embodying the superior race and its destiny—there is only one revolution; and this revolution is in essence directed against the first principles of all Christian civilization, against everything which indicates the mark of God on man, against everything which implies respect for the human person, for justice and for truth, against everything which relates to greatness and liberty of the human soul. Hitler is the precursor (fourrier) of Stalin.

The illusion which held that the world was divided between the two antagonistic forces of Communist totalitarianism and of racial totalitarianism has been dispelled. Moreover, we know clearly that both one and the other totalitarianism are in reality but a single spirit, a single homicidal force. And face to face with that force is another which one can no longer call a third force (since the two which it opposed at the same time are now joined together), that very force which created Europe and which has its purest sources in the gospel, and which, while it requires our civilization to purify and renew itself in a radical way, nevertheless appears manifest as the vital principle of that same civilization. Here is the capital historical change which, in the spiritual order, we have just witnessed.

I have said that western civilization is already saved: The signal indication of that salvation is the way in which two people who have a horror of war have entered into war to stop the monstrous enterprise of Hitler's domination. When, on the level of temporal strife, anti-Christian totalitarian force took up with Hitler the arms of military aggression; when, treading underfoot all international good faith, German national socialism undertook to impose by violence its will upon Poland and to devour that country, while sheltering itself under the terror of a general European war, at that moment France and Great Britain took up the challenge; they deliberately opened the gates of war, knowing to what they exposed themselves. * * *

Civilization does not die unless it betrays itself. As long as it is capable of actions such as this one, it can suffer the most enormous losses; it is sure that it will not perish. However terrible may be the ordeal, it will not be a tragedy but a sacrifice. And the end of a tragedy is death, but the end of a sacrifice is salvation and resurrection.

Jeanne d'Arc left us this prophecy: That one day France and England would unite to accomplish together a great enterprise. In one sense the present war seems to be the continuation of the war of 1914, but now its apocalyptic aspect has become manifest. Quite obviously it is for the common good of civilized humanity that France and England suffer and fight and that Poland has been martyred; it is for the fundamental human values to which every free spirit in the world, particularly the spirit of the American Nation, is attached. I know that the American public is clearly aware of this; that is why it is sufficient for me to mention the point briefly. If Hitler should triumph, the ideal of a society of freemen, based on an effective respect for the rights of the person, offering to each an equal opportunity to develop the gifts which each has received from God, and allowing for fraternal cooperation, would receive a heart's blow. But Hitler will not triumph.

Proposed Argentine Trade Agreement

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HARRY B. COFFEE

OF NEBRASKA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, October 16, 1939

Mr. COFFEE of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following statement made by me before the Committee for Reciprocity Information:

A reduction in the tariffs on the competitive agricultural commodities listed in this proposed trade agreement with Argentina presents a serious threat to agriculture and in turn to the general welfare of this country. While my protest will be particularly directed against the reduction in tariffs on the livestock products listed, I want it understood that I am definitely opposed to making any tariff concessions on any competitive agricultural commodity listed in this agreement.

This trade agreement would accentuate the trend which has been so apparent since the World War toward industrializing this country at the expense of agriculture. In the efforts that have been made to restore foreign commerce through these trade agreements, agriculture, and particularly the livestock industry, has borne the brunt of the concessions that have been made.

To reduce the tariff on canned, cured, or pickled beef, hides, tallow, casein, turkeys, corn, and the other competitive agricultural commodities listed would tend to add to our accumulation of price-depressing surpluses.

There can be no justification for reducing the tariff on any of these competitive agricultural commodities when millions of dollars from the Federal Treasury are now being spent in reducing production and in aiding the disposal of the surpluses. The American market must be preserved for the American farmer if agriculture is to receive its fair share of the national income. Restoration of the purchasing power for American agriculture will provide a greater market for industrial products and more employment than restoration of purchasing power in some foreign country. There is no doubt that we might increase our sales of automobiles and industrial products to Argentina if under this agreement we tear down our protection and permit a flood of competitive agricultural commodities to enter this market. But what about the sales that will be lost in the domestic market? Sixty-eight percent of all the automobiles in the world are owned right here in this country.

The United States is a surplus-meat-producing country. Between 1925 and 1929 we were exporting more than a billion pounds of pork products a year—as much as all of the other countries of the world combined. Pork is the chief competitor of beef. A surplus of either commodity adversely affects the price of the other. Argentina normally exports more than a billion pounds of beef, which constitutes approximately one-half of the total beef exports of the world. Isn't it unreasonable and illogical to assume that we should encourage the importation of meat when we have a normal exportable surplus?

Under the Canadian trade agreement of last year the tariff on cattle was again reduced, with Mexico the principal beneficiary. During the period from January to June this year 486,000 cattle were imported as compared to 242,000 in the same period last year, an increase of 100 percent. I appeared before you at the hearing protesting these concessions.

In the event the 6-cents-a-pound tariff on canned beef is reduced, the same concessions would automatically be extended to Uruguay, Paraguay, and Brazil. Less than half of our canned-beef imports have been coming from Argentina. These foreign countries now practically monopolize the canned-beef market in the United States. Even with the 6-cent tariff it has been impossible for domestic producers and processors with their higher costs to compete with the South American product produced and processed with cheap labor. To reduce this tariff would not only preserve this monopoly but encourage a large increase in the imports of canned beef, which competes directly with our domestically produced beef, pork, lamb, poultry, and other food products.

An analysis of our trade with Argentina shows that during the period 1911 to 1915 our exports to Argentina amounted to $47,251,000, and our imports from Argentina amounted to $47,800,000; almost in balance. The next 5-year average, embracing the war period, 1916 to 1920, our exports averaged $131,000,000, but our imports from Argentina jumped to an annual average of $185,000,000—an adverse trade balance during that 5-year period of about $250,000,000.

If during the present war Argentina's normal outlet for its beef exports to Europe should be curtailed, our domestic market will be flooded with surplus canned beef not alone from Argentina but from other South American countries.

This agreement also proposes to reduce the 25-cents-a-bushel tariff on corn. With an estimated two-and-a-half-billion-bushel corn crop, a carry-over of 470,000,000 bushels, and Government loans outstanding on corn to the extent of $146,000,000, it is inconceivable to me that such a proposal could be seriously considered. Practically all of this corn must eventually be converted into beef, lamb, and pork. Unless the American market can be preserved for the American meat producers, the corn farmers' plight will be accentuated, and the tendency will be for increased demands for subsidies from the Federal Government and greater losses for the Commodity Credit Corporation and the taxpayers of this country to bear.

There can be no justification for any reduction in the very low tariff now provided on hides amounting to only 10 percent ad valorem. Hides are the most important byproduct in the slaughter of cattle. The tariff is now so low that it is insufficient to curb imports when a price-depressing surplus occurs in the United States. To further reduce this small protection would antagonize every dairy farmer and livestock producer in the United States. They are certainly entitled to this meager protection on this important byproduct.

The American dairy and livestock producer can supply the American market adequately with all the beef, tallow, hides, casein, and other livestock products that can be utilized in the domestic market if given the opportunity. They have learned from sad experience that only a small surplus is needed to depress prices below cost of production.

Because of the drought and the depletion of livestock aided by the purchase and slaughter of 8,000,000 cattle by the Federal Government, the livestock industry is now on a relatively stable basis. The cattle population was reduced from 74,000,000 in 1934 to 66,000,000 in 1938. Since that time the cattle population has been on the increase and it is estimated that there will be approximately 2,000,000 increase shown January 1, 1940, over the 66,821,000 head as of January 1, 1939. For the first 8 months of 1939 there has been a decline in the slaughter of cattle and calves compared with 1938 of approximately 470,000 head. This indicates restocking and that the cattle industry may soon be faced with a surplus again.

The domestic sheep industry is in a period of increased production and the slaughter of hogs for 1939–40 market year is expected to be about 7,000,000 head larger than a year ago. Instead of negotiating trade agreements to facilitate increased imports of meat the State Department should be exerting every effort to find new markets for our surplus livestock products.

Farmers throughout the United States are shifting their production in an effort to produce some product for which they can find a market at a fair price. Producers of exportable surplus commodities for which foreign markets have been lost are gradually shifting to the production of other commodities, which in turn create further agricultural problems. Many of the farmers in my State and throughout the Nation have gone into the production of turkeys, and now under this proposed agreement it is contemplated to reduce the tariff of 10 cents a pound on dead turkeys. The tariff on live turkeys was reduced under the Canadian trade agreement from 8 cents to 4 cents. This tariff reduction is proposed in the face of a 22-percent increase in turkey production this year in the United States, which is 15 percent greater than any previous year's production. (This might be in anticipation of two Thanksgiving Days; I don't know.) However, I do know there can be no justification for encouraging foreign importation of turkeys when our domestic growers can supply the market. Turkey production in Argentina is in large-scale units and on a commercial basis. If this tariff protection is reduced, our domestic market will be flooded with Argentine turkeys, depressing not only the price of turkeys but the price of all poultry. Poultry competes with other meats, and depressed poultry prices tend to depress the price of other meats. Consequently those of us who are interested in the welfare of agriculture view with alarm any attempt to reduce the tariff on any agricultural commodity which the American farmer can supply.

National prosperity cannot be restored to this country until agriculture receives its fair share of the national income. I want to call to your attention the following facts supplied me by the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce, which is a clear indication of the tendency that has been prevalent since 1922 to industrialize this country at the expense of agriculture. In 1922 we exported $1,884,000,000 worth of agricultural products and $1,881,000,000 worth of nonagricultural products. Agriculture's proportion of our export sales was 50 percent. Since that date the proportion of agricultural products exported has been year by year gradually dwindling until last year, when agriculture accounted for only 27.1 percent and nonagricultural products accounted for 72.9 percent. During the first 8 months of this year agricultural products' share of our export trade has fallen to 18.4 percent, as against 81.6 percent for nonagricultural products. To rehabilitate agriculture and restore prosperity in this country this trend of sacrificing agriculture for industry must be stopped. No group nor section of the country can expect to prosper long at the expense of another. This maladjustment must be corrected. This proposed trade agreement with Argentina, instead of helping our domestic economy, will further throw it out of balance.

While I recognize the desirability of friendly commercial relations with Argentina as well as with all foreign countries, I also recognize the fact that Argentina's agriculture is similar to our own and that we are both confronted with the same problem of finding markets for these same products. Certainly a fair analysis of our own agricultural problems would convince even the most skeptical Argentinean that this Government, in fairness to its own citizens, would not be justified in encouraging the importation of these competitive agricultural commodities, which could only add to our domestic difficulties.

While we all deplore the war now devastating Europe, it has nevertheless offered American industry an opportunity to expand its sales in South America without the necessity of sacrificing the American farmer and livestock producer.

In closing I want to sound this word of warning: That if this proposed agreement is made, carrying tariff concessions on these competitive agricultural products, the next session of this Congress will probably refuse to extend the life of the Reciprocal Tariff Act unless provision is made for Senate ratification of the trade agreements. I am already convinced that such is necessary to properly protect agriculture, and particularly the livestock industry.

The Issue of National Pensions Is More Alive Today Than Ever

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JERRY VOORHIS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, October 16, 1939

ARTICLE BY S. HOWARD LEECH

Mr. VOORHIS of California. Mr. Speaker, one of the most disturbing things about the present atmosphere in the National Capital is the almost complete absorption of most legislators and officials with the European situation. Important as that situation is, it certainly is more necessary now than ever for the Congress to consider those great domestic issues which must be settled in a sound manner if our democracy at home is to be a dynamic force. One of these issues is that of national pensions. Therefore, I have asked permission to have included with my remarks the following article by S. Howard Leech, of Baldwin Park, Calif.:

A COMMON SENSE NATIONAL PENSION

(By S. Howard Leech, national correspondent)

In our first press release we stated the next consideration in establishing the fundamental justice of an old-age pension would be to consider at what age such a pension should begin, how much this pension should be, and how the money should be raised with which to pay these pensions.

Let us first consider the age at which such pensions should begin. It is now thoroughly realized by all intelligent, thoughtful, well-informed citizens that the employment age at which industry will employ workers is being steadily lowered. In the greater part of the large industrial plants this age limit is about 40 years, and there are but few industries which will employ workers over 45 or 50, and in some cases this age limit has been reduced to around 35.

From an economic standpoint, therefore, some provision must be made for those beyond the employment age, otherwise they must inevitably become charges upon the county, State, or Nation. A common sense national old-age pension is both the most logical, the most just, and at the same time the cheapest method of reaching the millions beyond the age of 60. It is quite possible that ultimately the Nation will be compelled to lower this age limit to 50 or even 45. However, this is for future consideration and will depend, in a large measure, upon the economic-financial conditions of our Nation in the future.

It is generally conceded by practically all advocates of a national old-age pension that such pensions should begin at about the age of 60 years. All existing economic conditions point to this age as a present logical starting point in this necessary national old-age pension. In the first place, any man or woman who has lived and worked in this Nation for 40 years—from the age of 20 to 60—has earned by this work a dividend on the wealth that person has produced during this 40-year period, as shown in release No. 1.

In the second place (except in rare cases) as industry will not employ workers over 60, some provision must be made for those who have not inherited, or been able to save, enough to provide for their old-age requirements. The percentage who have been able to do this under our existing economic-financial conditions, is very small, therefore, the absolute necessity for a common-sense national pension. All such citizens who have reached this age and are willing to withdraw from competition in the labor field, should be paid a dividend from this wealth they have produced to give them reasonable social security, with a comfortable home, good healthful food, adequate comfortable clothing, with a few luxuries and pleasures of life.

The bill H. R. 5620, now before Congress and already sponsored by 128 Congressmen, calls for a minimum pension of $30 a month, with a maximum of $60. While it is fully realized this would not give an individual who had worked for his country for 40 years, a luxuriant living, or a man and wife with double this amount, any opportunity to enjoy world tours, buy high-priced automobiles or expensive clothing, it is held by the promoters of this bill that it would at least, be a beginning and a great relief to millions of elderly citizens now actualy suffering for the bare necessities and comforts of life.

The next logical step is to consider how the money with which to pay these pensions is to be raised. This, let us admit, in the minds of some, may be a controversial question, but the method which at this time seems the most practical, the most cheaply administered with the greatest tax spread is the gross income-tax method, with proper regulations. A transactions tax has been advocated by some, but the most of the well-known economists, statisticians, industrial leaders, Senators, and Congressmen are not in favor of a transactions tax for the reason, they point out, that it would have a strong tendency to pyramid, and would compel the small-business enterprises to pay the larger part of the tax. Other proposals have been advocated, such as income taxes, inheritance taxes, special taxes on luxuries, amusements, and what not, none of which seem to be of a definite positive nature.

As to the gross income tax we have two outstanding examples of its practical workings and positive results. A gross income tax—in lieu of some unsuccessful and unpopular taxes—was enacted in the State of Indiana in 1933, where it has proven to be most successful; having brought the finances of the State out of the red up to a point where for the year 1939 the budget shows a fund of nearly $14,000,000 for local schools, more than $38,000,000 reduction in property taxes, about nine and a half million for needy blind, aged, and dependent children, with a local bonded indebtedness reduced more than $38,000,000 and with the tax base broadened, and no new taxes.

The Territory of Hawaii also adopted a gross income tax, as a replacement tax, several years ago with the same general results achieved in Indiana. This is reported to be a system heartily endorsed by the majority of corporations, large- and small-business concerns, and is generaly acknowledged both in Indiana and Hawaii to be the most equitable and the most economical of administration of any tax measure ever adopted in these political subdivisions. The gross income tax is, therefore, very generally conceded to be a fair, reasonable, practical tax base, if and when, certain provisions are incorporated in such a measure. Some of these provisions will be discussed later in this series.

Neutrality or ——?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. DAN R. McGEHEE
OF MISSISSIPPI
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, October 16, 1939

ARTICLE FROM THE TIMES-PICAYUNE, NEW ORLEANS, LA.

Mr. McGEHEE. Mr. Speaker, the Times-Picayune, a daily newspaper, published in New Orleans, La., offers periodically prizes to the students in the territory in which it circulates, for the best essays on some current topic or subject. On last week the subject was neutrality. The adjudged essay on this subject was written by James Magee, of the Brookhaven, Miss., High School, it receiving first prize of the thousands offered.

It being the outstanding essay, in my opinion it is also worthy of being printed in the Appendix of the RECORD. I therefore ask unanimous consent that I may extend my remarks and include same therein.

[From the Times-Picayune, New Orleans, La.]

NEUTRALITY OR ——?

(By James Magee, Brookhaven (Miss.) High School)

As Europe's war continues to gain momentum and to tighten its deadly grip throughout the world, the United States Senate in special session engages in a miniature conflict closer at hand—the debate over present neutrality legislation. Upon the results of this debate may depend the commercial and economic future, not only of America, but, to a large extent, of the rest of the world.

Whether the United States will lift the embargo on munitions trade with belligerents or draw closer into her shell of "super-neutrality" in an effort to stay out of war at all costs is a factor which, with consideration of hitherto unparalleled international interdependence, can eventually determine, besides the duration of hostilities, the very outcome of this second World War.

With the cash-and-carry plan of conducting trade with belligerents, must repeal of the arms embargo necessarily mean America's entrance into the war? Moreover, can she maintain strict neutrality behind self-imposed barriers to unrestricted trade—depriving England and France of manufactures and munitions necessary to carry on war and thereby unintentionally fighting against the very democracy for which she struggled in the last great war?

Against this muddled background one fact stands out with startling clarity: America cannot hope to maintain absolute neutrality. Consequently, since the fate of the arms embargo must choose for her one side or the other, and this choice must have marked effects on existing international relations, the neutrality dispute arises as public interest No. 1 of the week.

Highway Improvement

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EUGENE B. CROWE
OF INDIANA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, October 16, 1939

ADDRESS BY HON. EUGENE B. CROWE, OF INDIANA

Mr. CROWE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address delivered by me at the convention and twenty-fifth anniversary, American Association of State Highway Officials, held at Washington, D. C., and Richmond, Va., October 9 to 13, 1939:

Mr. President, delegates, ladies, and gentlemen, I am glad to attend this convention and appreciate the honor of sharing the platform today with your president and other members of this association on this, your twenty-fifth anniversary and silver jubilee. I am glad to have taken part in some of the prearrangements for this jubilee.

I appreciate the honor of being a member of the Roads Committee of the House. I serve on that committee with the very able chairman, Mr. WILBURN CARTWRIGHT. On February 27, this year, Mr. CARTWRIGHT introduced House Concurrent Resolution No. 10, asking that the Congress of the United States recognize the fine services and splendid work done by the American Association of State Highway Officials since its inception 25 years ago. Following that, Mr. CARTWRIGHT was in the hospital for some time following an accident and prevented from attending to his official duties for some time. Accordingly, he asked me if I would please pilot the resolution through the House. I was glad to do this, and after some time was heard before the Rules Committee, which committee suggested that I take the resolution directly to the House and bring it up under unanimous consent. The bill, however, had been referred to the Committee on Rules, but it was their pleasure that I bring it to the House without a rule. Following this and after some further preliminary work, I was recognized by the Speaker of the House, the Honorable WILLIAM B. BANKHEAD, and there being no objection, it was given favorable consideration by the House. After this I took it to my friend, the junior Senator from Indiana, the Honorable SHERMAN MINTON, where he looked after the resolution in the Senate, and I am informed it was passed by the Senate without a dissenting vote. I am sure your association will appreciate the fact that the great deliberative body, the House of Representatives, passed this resolution unanimously, and you will further appreciate the fact that it passed the Senate in the same manner. You are to be congratulated on the respect and high opinion in which your organization is held by the Congress of the United States.

A tremendous change has come over the highways of the United States during the last 25 years. Great improvements are yet to be made and will be made in them. I realize the change as much as anyone. I recall vividly my early driving when I owned my first car in the year 1911, traveling a distance of 60 to 75 miles to visit a friend or relative and have noon lunch with them and getting back the same day could only be accomplished if both the automobile and the roads behaved themselves perfectly. A shower of rain or a blowout or two of a tire rendered it more than a day's trip.

My State, Indiana, is making great progress in road building, particularly during the last 7 years. Prior to that, it was more of a haphazard, hit-and-miss proposition. Prior to these late years, when the slab was layed, there was no bridge to cross the stream, or if they built a bridge across the stream, there was no slab. After both slab and bridge were constructed, then you would have to beg maybe for months before the berms would be put in condition and still further months before the side roads on curves and embankments would properly be protected by fencing or other safety devices. Today in our State, when the slab is layed, a bridge across the stream is constructed, the sides of the roads are completed, the fencings and guardrails are constructed, and in a businesslike manner the road is completed. This, thanks to our last two Governors and to the very splendid highway commission which we have today consisting of Mr. Dicus, Mr. Siniff, and Mr. Atchison. They, together with the engineer and other officials, are doing a splendid job. I have had the pleasure of driving over the roads of a lot of States of the Union, and I feel no State which has better highways better marked and safer to drive over than are the highways of Indiana.

We construct highways for utility. The better they are constructed, the more substantial they are built, the more worth while they are for utilitarian purposes. Great improvements can yet be made for those purposes. Second, good highways are for the pleasure and use of mankind. With present automobiles, perfected as they are today, the better the roads, the more the pleasure of driving over them is enhanced, so that is a second purpose of a good highway system. There is a third great purpose which we are so apt to overlook, and that is the use of highways in our national defense set-up.

We realize the highways of some of the nations of Europe, and particularly Germany, have superhighways which were not built alone for utility or pleasure by any manner of means. The real purpose and view in the construction of those highways was for national use in a military way. My opinion is the conditions unsettled as they are in Europe, with no one knowing what will happen there either now or in the years to come, that it is high time that we look after our highways from a national standpoint and for national defense. Furthermore, with conditions as they are in the West and with Japan with her militaristic ideas in the Pacific Ocean, it is high time that we look to this for one of our great arms of national defense. We should not overlook transportation by rail, water, or highway.

For national defense, highways should not just be constructed with the thought of going from city to city. The program should be worked out so as to connect strategic points from a military standpoint as well as from the standpoint of utility and pleasure.

Furthermore, our highways should probably connect with Canada on the north and with Mexico, Central and South America on the south. By all means, we should cooperate with the nations south of us to the end that highways of great consequence could unite us with the Panama Canal Zone. We may find it necessary to transport great amounts of supplies and many troops by highway to the Panama Canal Zone. Furthermore, to better our trade relations and to bring us in closer contact with the states of Central and South America, superhighways should connect the United States with those countries. Through them more travel, both by highway and water, would bring more people of the United States and Central and South America together, and would get them better acquainted. We would learn to know each other which would greatly enhance commerce between these two continents.

Your organization should and will look for greater improvements in your highway building in the future. I am sure that the next 25 years will bring unheard of, unthought of, improvements to the highway systems of the Nation.

I again thank you for the opportunity and privilege of being present on this notable occasion.

Neutrality

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CLARENCE J. BROWN

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, October 16, 1939

EDITORIAL FROM THE McCONNELSVILLE (OHIO) HERALD

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the McConnelsville Herald, of McConnelsville, Ohio:

[From the McConnelsville (Ohio) Herald]

WANT THE KIND OF NEUTRALITY WHICH LESSENS CHANCES FOR WAR OVERSEAS

By and large, there is a more sensible attitude toward our participation in the present war than existed 25 years ago. Today public opinion overwhelmingly favors France and England and we are neutral in that we don't care who licks Hitler. But opinion is just as overwhelmingly against any entanglement in what is generally considered as a European war. Our people are disillusioned and, in our opinion, it would be utterly impossible to again arouse them to a crusading height and the frenzy of a holy war. The last war was one of idealism. We fought "to make the world safe for democracy." Instead of the gospel of democracy being spread throughout the world, we have seen the rise of dictators, backed by mighty armies and all the devilish armament which the inventive genius of man can devise. We were fighting Kaiserism—and today we have a worse form of arbitrary power called Hitlerism. It was to be a "war to end war"—and the nations have been fighting ever since. Again, Americans were disgusted with the peace. They had furnished the men and money which decided the war for the Allies. At its close they sought no territory, asked no indemnity—and naturally they felt much of resentment at the crass repudiation of Allied war debts. Having failed so utterly to solve the problems of Europe by our entry into the last war, naturally little of sentiment exists today for again sending millions of men overseas and for expending billions of dollars upon a similar venture.

But, aside from the lessons gleaned from the last war, Americans are fearful to enter another struggle lest while fighting abroad for democracy this "pearl of great price" be lost at home. With our huge existing debt and our appalling daily deficits in the Budget, thoughtful men and women rightfully fear that the cost of another war heaped upon the last can end only in financial chaos, revolution, and some form of a dictatorship. In many quarters there is also a deep distrust of placing what Senator VANDENBERG has termed "formidable" war powers in the hands of an administration marked throughout by its consistent greedy grabbing for more so-called emergency powers. There is a settled belief that some of the President's advisers, who have little faith in the "profit system," are eager and anxious for the opportunity to employ wartime powers toward the Government operation of industry, and they recall in this connection, with trepidation, the "McAdoodling of the railways," which cost the taxpayers a cool billion during the last war; nor do they like the idea of a state of wartime emotionalism where any criticism of the President or the national administration is treasonable per se.

These are some of the reasons why letters and telegrams in an almost unprecedented volume have poured and are pouring into Congress during the debate on neutrality. Practically all of these letters voice the same sentiment—they know or care little about the technicalities of the neutrality debate. What they do want is the sort of neutrality which lessens our chances for becoming drawn into the vortex of war overseas. That is what the people want the Congress to do—help keep us out of the mess overseas.

We Were There Once Before

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HOMER D. ANGELL

OF OREGON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, October 16, 1939

ARTICLE FROM THE SPECTATOR (PORTLAND, OREG.), OCTOBER 1939

Mr. ANGELL. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article from the Spectator (Portland, Oreg.) for October 1939:

WE WERE THERE ONCE BEFORE—THE TRAGIC LESSON OF THE FIRST WORLD WAR MUST NOT BE FORGOTTEN; THE UNITED STATES MUST REMAIN ALOOF FROM THE EUROPEAN DOG FIGHT

(By Richard L. Neuberger)

America has a job to do. That job is to stay home and preserve democracy here. Europe has started cracking up again. This country had better keep one haven of freedom and sanity, so that the inevitable task of restoring civilization can be undertaken with some possibility of success.

The following quotations have today the same significance they had in 1917:

"This war will not make the world safe for democracy."—Harry Lane, United States Senator from Oregon, 1917.

"We went into a foreign war, a war having its roots in wholly foreign policies. We left our dead on foreign soil. The policies of those countries remain the same. Europe is no nearer peace than before. We have our dead and crippled, our maimed and insane, our wrenched and twisted institutions, while Europe retains her bitterness, her dissension, her old balance of power."—William E. Borah, United States Senator from Idaho, 1934.

The United States moved into a European war 22 years ago. It was supposed to be a war to end war and to make the world safe for democracy. There has never been so little democracy in the world as there is now, and so much war and threat of war. The World War accomplished nothing.

The gangster Hitler, one of the most ruthless men who ever lived, is the immediate cause of the present conflict in Europe. But for the conditions that gave Hitler power in Germany the allied countries are largely responsible. During the last war they told the German people that their quarrel was not with them but with the Kaiser and his regime.

In 1918 the German people began to revolt. The army crumbled and the Kaiser was exiled. Germany drafted its Weimar constitution and set up a republic. Unfortunately for the world the republic perished. England and France helped kill it. They wrote the Versailles Treaty in blood and hate. They exacted reparations the German people could not pay. The Kaiser was gone, yet still the Allies applied the thumbscrews to Germany. The republic waned, and as it waned a gutteral-voiced agitator named Hitler began gaining seats in the Reichstag.

With mercy and justice and help England and France could have saved the republic. Instead they kept on the economic thumbscrews. Today a generation of Britons and Frenchmen may die for that folly. The German people should not trust the cruel Hitler. But should they trust England? "We are not fighting for territory," the British Government assured the world in December of 1916. From the war England got 1,415,929 square miles of land, an area half the size of continental United States.

All this adds up to the conclusion that America should stay behind its shores. There is plenty of work to do here. Civil liberties must be preserved. Natural resources have to be conserved. Widespread unemployment and poverty are yet to be ended. The national health can be improved. Housing facilities are still inadequate. Farmers must get cost of production for their crops. The social-security program requires improvement. These things concern our own people and are sufficiently important to keep the Nation busy at home.

International diplomacy at present is no place for a nation with honor. Russia and Germany, a few months ago supposedly grim enemies, are now locked in totalitarian embrace. England, France, the alleged friends of democracy, sold out Czechoslovakia, which was a democracy, and now defend Poland, which is not a democracy and whose ambassador to the United States approved the annihilation of Czechoslovakia. In the great crusade for freedom England and France are allied with Turkey. Remember the last war? Then the Turks were portrayed as barbarians. Now they have flopped over and suddenly become friends of liberty.

A great country must not repeat mistakes. Two decades ago America was carried away by hysteria. Harry Lane, of Oregon, was one of six United States Senators who said the war would not make the world safe for democracy. Here in his home State, of which his grandfather, Gen. Joseph Lane, was the first Governor, Senator Lane was called a traitor and a man of the stripe of Benedict Arnold. People denounced him in unmeasured terms. He died a few weeks after he had voted against the war. Now the State and Nation know that he was right.

When the Lusitania was sunk in 1915 by a U-boat, Lane and one or two other men in public life asked the populace to keep calm. They were bitterly condemned. Senator La Follette, of Wisconsin, was nearly expelled from the Senate for insisting that the Lusitania had been torpedoed because it was not a peaceful merchantman but was carrying munitions of war. The British press heatedly denied this charge. Our Government refused to reveal the Lusitania's bill of lading. Long after the war it was published. The Lusitania that tragic day had been loaded with 173 tons of ammunition, including 4,200 cases of Springfield cartridges.

What did America get out of its entry into the World War? Approximately 120,000 men died and 182,000 were wounded. To date the war has cost the United States $60,000,000,000, and some of those costs are continuing. Practically none of the countries has paid its war debt to us. Incidentally, Poland still owes America $259,000,000. Great Britain owes this country $5,419,000,000. Hitler has arbitrarily crossed out the debts of Germany and Austria. "Over $13,000,000,000," says Congressman HOMER ANGELL, "which came from the earnings of American citizens as a result of heroic sacrifice and privation, have been confiscated by these foreign powers."

Hitler is one of the worst despots of history. Long ago he alienated the sympathy of men of good will. But Hitler is a problem of Europe. He is a phoenix that rose from the ashes of fires kindled by the statesmen and diplomats of Europe. Other military tyrants—Frederick the Great, Napoleon, Bismarck, Wilhelm Hohenzollern—have not been American problems; and now neither is Hitler. And after this war, unless the rulers of Europe learn a lesson they have not mastered yet, another Hitler or another Napoleon will arise to menace that unhappy continent.

For centuries in Europe people have been persecuted and sent to war. Since the days of Attilla the Hun, men and women have died and suffered in futile conflicts. Catholics, Jews, Huguenots, and all sorts of minorities have undergone discrimination and persecution. Why should America intervene in this welter of hate? America did not formerly do this. Thomas Jefferson did not propose that we enter the Napoleonic wars. Jackson did not put us into Russia's war on Turkey. Grant made no suggestion that we meddle in the war between France and Prussia.

Already people here in far-away Oregon are wondering whether this country can stay out of the present war. Why should there be danger of getting in? Sweden will keep out, and so will Denmark, Holland, and Switzerland. Those countries are right in the amphitheater of battle. Their borders touch the frontiers of the combatants. They can hear the rumble of the artillery. If countries within sound of the war can remain aloof, surely the United States, barricaded behind a vast ocean 3,500 miles wide, should be sufficiently calm and steady to do likewise.

War settles nothing. It leaves a residue of anger and desolation which decades cannot wash away. Benjamin Franklin said that there is no good war and no bad peace. It is my opinion Mr. Roosevelt will go down in history as a great President who has helped the people, but he will sacrifice that status if he leads the Nation into war. This country is different from European nations. Fortunately, our people think differently. Now, we are planning to give the Philippines independence. Has England ever seriously considered lifting the shackles from India or Kenya or South Africa?

Obviously, in the present war American opinion is on the side of the Allies. There is no sentiment in this country in favor of the brutal and arrogant Hitler. But Americans must not forget that the Allies sat by complacently while the German Republic fell and Hitler strode to sovereignty. What is happening in Europe is dreadful and appalling. The United States can best serve Europe by preserving, in at least one nation, the freedom and democracy for which free men yearn. Perhaps, when the horrible conflict is over, an America which is still aloof can dictate a peace which will last longer than 21 years. Then, perhaps, kings and fuehrers and prime ministers and commissars and premiers will not try by fiat to suspend the sixth commandment.

"We should maintain peace, commerce, and honest friendship with all nations," said Jefferson, "entangling alliances with none."

Editorial From Los Angeles Daily News Calls for a Peace College

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JERRY VOORHIS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, October 16, 1939

EDITORIALS BY MR. MANCHESTER BODDY

Mr. VOORHIS of California. Mr. Speaker, the following editorials written by Mr. Manchester Boddy, editor and publisher of the Los Angeles Daily and Evening News, sound such necessary warning and contain so challenging a suggestion that I have asked permission to have them printed in the RECORD:

[From the Los Angeles Daily News and Evening News of September 26–27, 1939]

VIEWS OF THE NEWS

(September 26, 1939)

NATIONAL ASSOCIATION OF MANUFACTURERS OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA,
14 West Forty-ninth Street,
New York, N. Y., September 18, 1939.

MANCHESTER BODDY,
Publisher, Daily News-Evening News,
Los Angeles, Calif.

DEAR MR. BODDY: American industry's attitude on war and peace is not only a matter of first importance to the Nation but is also the subject of much public misunderstanding.

In view of this, I am taking the liberty of sending to you, personally, a copy of a statement by Howard Coonley, president of the National Association of Manufacturers. As you know, the N. A. M. is representative of a large cross section of American industry and I am sure you will agree that its statement on war is not only timely but, as well, is nationally important.

Sincerely yours,

WILLIAM V. LAWSON,
Director of Public Relations.

Following is the statement of the National Association of Manufacturers issued by its president, Howard Coonley, to which Mr. Lawson refers:

"American industry hates war.

"War destroys lives. War wrecks homes. Economic chaos and years of crushing depression are its inevitable aftermath. It imperils representative democracy. Free institutions are among its early victims. Ultimately no one can escape the ruin of war.

"American industry wants peace. Peace is the lifeblood of progress. Peace must be the national objective.

"Industry's position on this matter has been stated repeatedly, and there must be no misunderstanding about it.

"The United States can stay out of war.

"Emotionalism can betray us into war.

"A public will to peace, coupled with wise public policies and affirmative action to this end by our Government, will keep us out of war. A fatalistic attitude that war is inevitable for us is absurd. It presupposes that America cannot conduct itself intelligently to preserve peace and its own interests.

"Europe's problems do affect us, but our domestic problems still must come first.

"If yesterday industry was the only source of prosperity and reemployment, today it is as well the keystone of preparedness and peace. Under any conditions, America must depend on a smoothly functioning, efficient industrial system.

"Manufacturers will not relax their efforts to achieve and maintain sound improvement in our domestic economy.

"Industry opposes profiteering—the utilization of war psychology to boost prices for the purpose of making excessive profits.

"As manufacturers we recognize it to be our responsibility and moral obligation to conduct our businesses so that the prices of the products we produce and sell are related equitably to production costs.

"We pledge our energetic support to this policy.

"The N. A. M. calls upon all its members to exercise vigilance against any price or profit policies not justified by actual cost and anticipated cost of replacement.

"Months ago this association said: 'No sensible person believes that profit can come out of the wreckage of human life and economic dislocation.'

"The use of this crisis as an excuse either to extort unjustifiable profits or to pursue partisan political objectives is not only indefensible and dangerous but reprehensible morally. Nor should pleas of 'emergency' be utilized as an excuse for reaching objectives which the American people would not otherwise sanction.

"The present situation calls for agreement on common objectives, but the democratic process of consultation and criticism must never be abandoned. Otherwise we shall be following in the footsteps of those who believe in government by coercion.

"In a world distraught by force the best way to preserve representative democracy is to practice it."

DEAR MR. LAWSON: I quite agree that American industry's attitude on war and peace is not only a matter of first importance to the Nation but that it is also the subject of much public misunderstanding.

This misunderstanding exists, I think, because the words that proclaim your attitude are not loud enough to overcome the impact of events. Observe I do not say events of your ordering. What I mean to imply is that your attitude becomes unimportant in the midst of the very events that have made the issuance of your statement necessary.

There is no need to elaborate or catalog these events. I interrupt my writing to select these representative headlines from the exchange desk:

"Gains Run to Four Points on Strong New York Market."

"Business Makes Best Strides in Two Years—American Prices Stimulated by War Outbreak; Inquiries Indicate Pace Will Be Quickened."

"Fight Food Price Rise."

"Food Prices Climb."

"Metal Markets Join in Upswing."

"Grain Futures Mount Sharply."

It isn't enough that you add to a list of generally accepted platitudes your statement:

"The N. A. M. calls upon all its members to exercise vigilance against any price or profit policies not justified by actual cost and anticipated cost of replacement."

Even it cannot confidently be said (as you do say): "American industry's attitude * * * is a matter of first importance to the Nation" if all of the calamities that you say may befall our national economy as a result of war, befall it regardless of your attitude.

I am particularly intrigued with the statesmanship evidenced in these concluding paragraphs of Mr. Coonley's statement:

"The present situation calls for agreement on common objectives, but the democratic process of consultation and criticism must never be abandoned. Otherwise we shall be following in the footsteps of those who believe in government by coercion.

"In a world distraught by force the best way to preserve representative democracy is to practice it."

In this spirit may I presume to suggest how the N. A. M. can translate its attitude into action?

(September 27, 1939)

(This is the second installment of our letter to the National Association of Manufacturers of the United States of America.)

It is generally agreed that war economy means more production, higher wages, higher cost of living, a boom in "local business," with about 53 percent of the "new business" made on the "installment" plan.

When war ends—or when nations fall into bankruptcy or internal revolution—immediate economic "reaction" will occur in the United States. Workers who bought on the installment plan will have no money with which to meet payments.

This will start a "cancelation" movement that will gain momentum and volume until it overwhelms the national economy. With this will come an acute attack of economic "jitters." Once more we will hear on every hand the hysterical shoutings:

"My God, here we are starving in the midst of plenty!"

"Factories everywhere and not a wheel turning!"

"I want goods—you want goods—we can't buy any. Why?"

"Who closed down our industries? Why doesn't capital do something about it?"

"Share the wealth!"

"Turn the jobs over to the fellow who wants to use the products!"

Can't you see, my dear Mr. Lawson, how logically, how naturally these conclusions will be reached when war "boom" gives way to the "horrors" of peace? And can't you see how readily such rabble-rousing "truisms" will be accepted by the milling masses of bewildered citizens?

There is nothing farfetched about this. It is so obvious that even today United States industry cannot afford to hope for peace in Europe. If Europe should agree to peace right now the United States would immediately be thrown into a devastating depression, one far more disastrous to the safety of the United States than the war now being fought 3,000 or 5,000 miles away.

A peace scare is already fraught with more potential danger to the economy of the United States than a war scare ever was.

If this sort of feeling has developed in 1 month, what will be the situation if war lasts 6 months, or a year, or 3 years?

The answer is obvious. We will be forced to perpetuate war economy. To do this we will have to invoke the dictatorship provisions of the National Defense Act of 1916, section 120 of which provides, among other things:

"The President, in time of war, or when war is imminent, is empowered, through the head of any department of the Government * * * to place an order with any individual, firm, association, company, corporation, or organized manufacturing industry for such product or material as may be required. * * *

"Compliance with all such orders for products or material shall be obligatory. * * * The President, through the head of any department of the Government, in addition to the present authorized methods of purchase or procurement herein provided for, is hereby authorized to take immediate possession of any such plant or plants * * * and any individual, firm, company, association, or corporation, or organized manufacturing industry, or the responsible head or heads thereof, failing to comply with the provisions of this section shall be deemed guilty of a felony, and upon conviction shall be punished by imprisonment for not more than 3 years and by a fine not exceeding $50,000."

For many years the War and Navy Departments have been working on a plan for the mobilization of the country's economy.

A mobilization plan already adopted by the Army and Navy provides for sweeping economic control, including labor, prices, transportation, power, fuel, and trade generally. Its purpose is to divert materials and services from peacetime to war-making channels.

Surely no one can study these plans and provisions without realizing how thoroughly this country has observed the time-honored injunction:

"In time of peace prepare for war."

The purpose of this letter is to urge that your great organization, in the spirit of its expressed "attitude on war and peace," conceive a new national policy:

"In time of war prepare for peace."

If we would preserve fundamental American democracy, we must prepare to take definite action now probably along these lines:

Create a permanent "peace college" to develop ways and means of meeting peace problems just as we have a War College to develop ways and means of meeting war problems.

This peace college should be composed of representatives of industry, labor, transportation, finance, and agriculture on a nonpartisan basis. It should be dedicated to the preservation of American democracy and confine its operations to the utilization of such tried and approved measures as come within the general "field of agreement" of its various members.

An important function of the "permanent peace college" should be to plan:

(a) The peacetime utilization of surpluses that are produced during the time lag between the end of war and the return to "normal" peace economy, as a basis for stabilizing international finance and our domestic currency and credit.

(b) The coordination of various forms of government relief, insurance plans, public works programs, relief plans, etc., to meet anticipated problems that come with the transition from war boom to normal peace economy.

By keeping the "peace college" in continuous session it will be possible to have such plans and programs worked out in a sane and deliberate manner; it will be possible to submit these plans and programs for approval to Congress for democratic action free from the threat of panic and widespread riot.

There isn't much real danger of the United States actually fighting in Europe, but the very nature of the war now going on over there, considered in connection with our national economic situation, leads inevitably to the conclusion that Europe's war probably will come to the United States.

Let's be prepared to keep it out.

In time of war—prepare for peace.

Very truly yours,

MANCHESTER BODDY.

Committee for Reciprocity

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. PHIL FERGUSON

OF OKLAHOMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, October 16, 1939

STATEMENT BY HON. PHIL FERGUSON, OF OKLAHOMA

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following statement submitted by me to the Committee for Reciprocity in opposition to the reduction of tariffs in the trade-agreement negotiations with the Argentine:

GENTLEMEN: I wish to enter this statement in opposition to the reduction of tariffs in the proposed trade agreement with the Argentine.

The reduction of the tariff on foreign byproducts of livestock, including tallow, hides, blood, bones, etc., would necessitate the lowering of the domestic price of these products. The lowering of the domestic price would mean that the price of the edible meat would of necessity have to be raised.

The domestic price of beef, pork, and mutton, bearing the high cost of distribution, cannot be raised much higher or the consumer will go on a buying strike. If the price is lowered, however, the inadequate percent the producer now receives will of necessity be cut to the place the producer will be forced to operate at a loss.

I also see a severe threat in the lowering of the duty on preserved beef and veal because of the low cost of production in South America.

A special threat to my district is the reduction of the duty on turkeys, which, if cut from 10 cents to 5 cents per pound, would undoubtedly cut the price of turkeys raised in Oklahoma to more than 5 cents per pound, since the eastern consuming centers could buy foreign turkeys much cheaper with this small duty than we could afford to ship them from Oklahoma. The same thing applies to the proposed reduction of tariff on eggs. Eggs and turkeys are a big source of income to farmers in Oklahoma, and we cannot afford to make this sacrifice in a trade treaty with the Argentine.

In conclusion, before the trade treaty was negotiated with Canada, which permitted the reduction of the tariff on cattle weighing over 700 pounds from 3 cents to 1½ cents, I predicted that the tariff reduction would act as an automatic weight on the beef-cattle market. My prediction has been true. Every time the market has started to advance an influx of heavy cattle from Canada and Mexico has pressed the market down. The argument made in favor of reducing the tariff—that the number imported were insignificant—has not proven true in the effect on the market. I plead the livestock producers' cause before the Canadian treaty was negotiated, and I sincerely hope the Committee on Reciprocity will not force the American farmers and livestock men to bear the additional cross of a treaty with the Argentine that will undoubtedly cut the price of beef and mutton further and might well paralyze the turkey-raising industry in this country.

I respectfully submit this statement for your serious consideration.

Second Surrender—European "Friends" Legion Reaction

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN C. SCHAFER
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, October 16, 1939

ARTICLE BY BOAKE CARTER

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article by Boake Carter, which was published in the Evening Public Ledger, of Philadelphia, on September 29, 1939:

[From the Philadelphia Evening Public Ledger, September 29, 1939]

SECOND SURRENDER? EUROPEAN "FRIENDS" LEGION REACTION

(By Boake Carter)

Twenty-two years ago war raged in Europe. The United States determined to make that war—with all its European issues—our own war. We asked our women folk to do war work, knit socks and sweaters. They worked with willing hands.

We asked them to give up their sons, husbands, and sweethearts so that their men could make Europe's cause our cause. They yielded willingly. But their hearts were as hearts of lead.

We surrendered our liberties temporarily. We turned over our factories to the Allies. We opened our Treasury and said: "Take what you need." We sent our battleships to Europe to help them.

We did not rest at "volunteers." We actually conscripted our men to send them "over there" to make their cause our cause. Shipload after shipload departed for France until 2,000,000 of our men stood upon French soil, ready to lay down their lives for European issues and a European war.

We turned over to them our men, the labors of our women, our factories, our money, our trust, and our liberty.

Again war rages in Europe. France and Britain hope that we will open our hearts and pocketbooks again and make their cause our cause once more. They hope that we will begin—by lifting the arms embargo.

Before we yield—if we yield—might it not be well, in justice to those mothers who are called Gold Star; in justice to those Americans—some of them fathers, uncles, brothers, husbands who gave up the dearest possession of all—life itself; in justice to those who, these last 22 years have continued to hobble their way through the rest of their lives, maimed, tubercular, or with shattered nerves; in mere justice to these Americans, might it not be well to review what gratitude we have received from those we helped save?

First, we were ridiculed by our European friends (?) for entering the war so late and after, they said, it was almost won.

The current joke in England was the story about the Rainbow Division being properly named—"the rainbow only comes after the storm."

Our friends (?) whose cause we made our cause to the dirge of death and to the tune of $200,000,000,000 in material losses, charged our Government; meaning us, a rental for the billets occupied by our men who had come to save them.

When we used their ships they charged us a fee for transporting our live soldiers to France.

They charged us a fee for similar transportation of the bodies of our men back from Europe to the peace and solitude of the farm lands of America and the arms of women whose eyes were bright with unshed tears.

They charged us for the cemeteries in France in which we buried our dead—those who did not "come back."

This was the gratitude of our friends (?), in whose defense we poured out our blood, our treasure. They charged us fees for these little things—bills the old folk may have forgotten and bills Young America of today does not know about.

And now—with war again in Europe—our friends (?) turn once more with outstretched hands for arms and eventually more of our men.

And in Chicago, the old folk meet—men who fought the last time. Legionnaires, we call them nowadays. And up rises their commander, Mr. Stephen Chadwick, to report upon an American Legion trust fund. A trust fund originally intended for decoration of the graves of those men of ours who "did not come back" from France.

In 1937 the Legion obtained a court ruling to permit the use of this $200,000 trust fund for other means.

"Under French law," the New York Times reports, "a concession fee becomes due on each grave every 15 years. When the first time limit expired following the World War, it developed the bodies of Americans were to be exhumed and burned in lime pits unless the fees were paid."

Mr. Chadwick reported to the Legion the $200,000 has been used to build underground vaults in Neuilly, overlooking Paris, for "reburials in cases of expired concession fees."

Our friends!

Our men died for them 22 years ago. America debauched her own economy for them.

And now, years later and when they supplicate the United States again for our munitions—well knowing that our men surely will follow behind those munitions once the blood sales are begun—they threaten to pull up our dead of 1917–18 from their miserable patch of strife-strewn earth and burn our men's bones in lime pits because we failed to pay them a fee for the privilege of letting our dead remain in their foreign graves.

Our men were heroes in 1917. Now they are good for lime pits like common carrion.

Our friends!

And we should lift the arms embargo for them?

Pending Neutrality Legislation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. FRANK W. FRIES
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, October 16, 1939

LETTERS FROM HON. WILLIAM B. BARRY, OF NEW YORK

Mr. FRIES. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following two letters written by the gentleman from New York [Mr. BARRY] to his constituency:

CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., October 6, 1939.

DEAR CONSTITUENT: My purpose above all other considerations, is to keep my country out of the European war. We have no stake in it worth one American soldier's life.

It is my firm conviction, after long and conscientious deliberation, that a policy of honest neutrality toward that conflict is the best way to keep this country at peace.

Neutrality is defined as "refraining from interference in a contest." The primary, if not sole purpose of the alleged neutrality bill now being debated in the Senate is to lift the arms embargo, so that the United States can supply Englishmen and Frenchmen with arms and ammunition with which to kill Germans. Every capital in Europe recognizes the obvious purpose of this legislation, and yet its chief sponsors fatuously call it a neutrality measure.

I am convinced that just as soon as we become an arsenal for one side the other side will in all probability retaliate. An act of retaliation, such as blowing up an American munitions plant with a loss of lives, will be all that the propagandists need in order to have us send the youth of America to a futile death on foreign soil.

I am therefore unqualifiedly opposed to lifting the arms embargo. The assumption by some and the contention by others that the present law is not neutral is unsound. It is absurd to contend that America has a duty to supervise every war and supply the weaker side, or the side it favors, with arms and ammunition. How can we be interfering when we don't send arms to either side?

I am also opposed to giving 90-day credit to countries that now owe us billions of dollars which they have never made an honest effort to pay. Once the merchants of death get a financial interest in the belligerents they will do their utmost to drag us into the war to protect their loans. There is no conflict between the arms embargo and the cash-and-carry plan for other commodities. I am in favor of Congress enacting both as an additional safeguard.

Sincerely yours,

WILLIAM B. BARRY, M. C.

CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., September 14, 1939.

DEAR SIR OR MADAM: Since hostilities started in Poland, many anxious Americans have asked me whether or not Congress will permit the United States to be dragged into another European war. My answer is that Congress will do whatever the American people demand of it.

I am therefore convinced that it is the urgent duty of every patriotic citizen, who believes that we have no stake in Europe worth shedding American blood over, to commence a determined crusade to keep Congress in a neutral state of mind. A country-wide movement should begin immediately before propagandists have had time to inflame the Nation.

Speaking for myself, I will never even consider voting for war unless this country is actually attacked; or the Monroe Doctrine violated; and any informed person with common sense will admit that there is absolutely no danger of such events happening. No nation or combination of nations could make a successful invasion and none would be foolish enough to try it. Our only enemies are foreign propagandists and American partisans whose alien interests are placed before that of their own country.

In spite of emotional hysteria and propaganda, the war in Europe is but a repetition of the countless conflicts that have taken place over territory and power for many centuries on that unfortunate continent.

When one examines the actual sequence of facts leading up to the struggle, and the present and potential line up of warring nations it is silly to believe that the powers are waging a fight over the ideal of democracy, for which we thought we fought the last war. Unquestionably geographic location and a common interest in the well-known law of self-preservation are the dominating, if not sole, reasons for the two so-called democratic nations being arrayed on the same side. Despite the contentions of the alarmists who claim that dictators and democracies are destined for a death struggle, these different forms of governments like different religions, have, since this Republic was founded, existed side by side in this world and will continue to do so.

Furthermore, it is not our responsibility to spread or preserve democracy all over the world by force of arms. Nor is it our duty to protect weak European or Asiatic nations from the strong. The Monroe Doctrine confines our activities in that respect to North and South America which continents cover enough territory for us to be concerned about.

We can best serve the world and democracy by illustrating that peace can be maintained on the Western Hemisphere between nations whose peoples' ancestors came principally from war-torn Europe. The United States must prove to peoples who have yielded to dictators that democracy is still the best way of life by winning its own bloodless war over unemployment. We must prove that a democratic nation guarantees economic security to its people as well as civil and religious liberty, else we may get a dictator ourselves.

In conclusion, I wish to emphasize that I am well aware of the fact that certain men are more responsible for Europe's present tragic plight than others. I know that it is impossible for human beings to watch the terrible struggle without sympathizing with one side as against another. However, I do know that a proper restraint on the part of the American public plus a resolute determination to avoid involvement will keep us out of war. We must never forget what the last war did to the youth of America—and that it apparently taught Europe nothing.

Sincerely yours,

WILLIAM B. BARRY, M. C.

Dedication of the Abe Lincoln Ferry Park

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. LOUIS LUDLOW
OF INDIANA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, October 12, 1939

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Speaker, on Sunday, October 1, 1939, a new Indiana Lincoln Park was dedicated, to be known as the Abe Lincoln Ferry Park. This park is in Spencer County, Ind., on the banks of both the Ohio River and Anderson Creek, and marks the place where, in the years 1825 and 1826, young Abe Lincoln for a period of 18 months operated a ferry across the creek, which was then known as Anderson River.

The dedicatory services were under the auspices of the Boonville (Ind.) Press Club, a very notable organization, distinguished by its many successful civic enterprises. This club has been especially active in initiating and carrying on movements to uncover historical facts about Abraham Lincoln and to perpetuate the memory of that great man. Over a year ago this club started a campaign, in which all the civic and patriotic organizations of southern Indiana joined, in requesting the Indiana Highway Commission to buy the land surrounding the old Abe Lincoln Ferry and to incorporate it into a Lincoln park. The site of the Lincoln Ferry consists of 3 acres. A year ago the Indiana Highway Commission bought the land and laid it out in an appropriate manner, one of the improvements being a very attractive shelter home.

The address dedicating the Abe Lincoln Ferry Park was delivered by Hon. T. A. Dicus, chairman of the Indiana Highway Commission, who spoke as follows:

We are standing this afternoon in the presence of a great American ideal. The progress of a nation depends upon a profound, fundamental, spiritually imbued reverence for and devotion to the guiding principles for which that nation stands. These principles are to be found in summarized form in outstanding documents and speeches resultant from the struggle to make us a free, unhampered people, a people immune from the mailed fist and iron heel of the dictator.

We are enjoying the "separate and equal station to which the laws of nature and nature's God entitles us." We are inspired not only by our immediate physical surroundings but by the purpose which impels us to gather here for this dedication service. I am confident that each and every true American citizen understands and is deeply grateful for the ideals of liberty and freedom that characterize our great democracy. I have such confidence because of our efficient educational system that exists primarily for the purpose of inculcating these ideals into the minds and lives of our future citizenship. I have this confidence because our homes are founded upon the belief in freedom and equality. I have this confidence because in our memories we have a constant parade of great Americans who were imbued with the same stellar principles and who crystallized our ideals into realities.

So, we find ourselves upon this occasion in the presence of our ideals. Man never enters into a situation that is more helpful to his better living and contributes more to his personal refinement and tolerant attitude than to stand in the presence of his ideals. Stripped of all petty racial, political, religious, and economic differences, of all selfish and sinister purposes, we are assembled here to envision once more, with common understanding, the divinely inspired American plan.

Equality, liberty, tolerance, human understanding sympathy—all are attributes of American democracy. Each and all are virtues of any great American. No truly great American ever lived but who incorporated these virtues into his philosophy of life. These virtues are fundamentally right because they are Christian. Our democracy will survive and progress directly proportional to our individual and collective appropriation of these virtues into our many activities.

Our history may be read understandingly in the biographies of our great men, and it is refreshing and inspiring to pause here this afternoon and take cognizance of one who possessed to a superlative degree all of the qualities which we have enumerated—the qualities of a truly great American. One who stands in our minds as a positive proof of all of the claims we make for America; one who exemplified in private and public life the practicability of applied American principles; one born of the lowly to rise to the pinnacle of attainment; one whose simple life, loving and human understanding, generous, unselfish, Christ like attitude toward his friends and enemies, won for him the unstinted love and affection of all posterity and the characterization of "Honest Abe" or "the immortal Lincoln."

We strive to explain the tremendous magnitude and quality of Lincoln's character. We find that as soon as his smattering of formal education would permit he became thoroughly acquainted with the Bible—a necessary attainment for those who are to be truly educated. His spirit of adventure was kindled by the lovable character of Robinson Crusoe. His spiritual life was cultured and encouraged by Christian's example in Pilgrim's Progress. His native wisdom was whetted and tempered by the writings of Benjamin Franklin, and his ambition engendered by the life of George Washington. All of these influences—interwoven with the love and sympathetic understanding of his mother and enriched with his romance with Ann Rutledge—destined him to be man among men and a superb example of the true American.

It is most gratifying to Hoosierdom that the boy Lincoln lived and played and was happy even on the soil upon which we now stand; that his formative years were spent in the beauties of our southern Indiana; that one of his earliest adventures was launched from this very spot. It was here that he embarked upon a mission by flatboat, the experiences of which inspired him on to some of the greatest activities of his life.

With this understanding of the significance of this occasion, and "* * * with malice toward none," there is little wonder that we humbly and with reverence assemble here to dedicate this spot to the memory of one whose full, well-rounded life has so definitely and adequately exemplified the spirit of all virtues of the American people; one whose efforts helped to shape the destinies of the greatest nation of all times, a nation of people whose basic principles are identical and correlated with the "way of life" exemplified and lived by our Master—our own United States.

Since the day that Abraham Lincoln embarked at this point to take produce tc New Orleans on flatboat via the Mississippi we have witnessed progress in all fields of endeavor such as no other period of equal time in all the history of the world. The oxcart and flatboat serve only to enrich our memories and increase our appreciation concerning the long and sometimes weary steps in the progress of our country. Ribbons of steel bind our whole country into a closely woven economic and social unit. Miles of highways of more recent development lead into practically each and every community of our land. We believe it will be interesting to speak briefly upon this occasion concerning the Indiana highway system, which contributes much to the reality of our presence here today.

Throughout the ages the progress of a people has been a story of their roads. Today our entire economic and social life is built around good roads which provide rapid communication and convenient transportation of commodities.

Nearly every day we have visitors remark about our wonderful system of State highways, and just as often homecoming Hoosiers say that nowhere did they find a highway system equal to our own. Our highways are the pride of Hoosiers, and right so; but they did not just happen. They are the product of much work by a staff of highway engineers, second to none in the Nation.

Only a little over 100 years ago, when the capital was established at Indianapolis, Indiana was largely wilderness, and roads—such as there were—were mere trails through the forest. About this time the Federal Government began work on the national road across Indiana. The roads of that period may be pictured in our minds from the fact that contracts for this road called for removing trees from the central 30 feet, leaving no stumps higher than 15 inches, and rounding these so that they offered no obstruction to vehicles. This was the first large-scale road building in Indiana.

In subsequent years, under county and township control, we made rapid strides in road building, using native stone, sand, and gravel; until we attained first rank in our percentage of improved roads. Compared to other States they were improved, but contrasted to roads of today they look like cowpaths.

Only 20 years ago the State highway commission was formed, and the first roads taken into the State system. During the two decades since that time a remarkable change has been made in our transportation system.

From the pioneer, Lincoln with his ox team, plodding the crooked paths that were called highways 100 years ago, and from the mud and dust of our so-called improved roads of 20 years ago, I invite you to turn to another picture.

Think of a hard-surfaced highway extending from San Francisco to New York and then to Miami. Add enough intermediate surface, free from dust and mud, to make two roads from Los Angeles to Baltimore. Top it all with one city street extending from Indianapolis to Cedar Rapids, Iowa, and you have an idea of the size of Indiana's State highway system.

This immense system, paid for without one cent of bonded indebtedness, represents a cash outlay of hundreds of millions of dollars and is a monument to the skill of Hoosier highway engineers.

The operation of this great system is one of the biggest businesses in Indiana. Every mile, when once constructed, must be kept in good condition. Just the simple task of mowing weeds twice a year on this system is equal to driving one mower three times around the world.

To mark one center line on this system requires over 100,000 gallons of asphalt paint.

There are over 36 miles of bridges and bridge floors to maintain.

Tons and tons of snow must be removed each winter.

Thousands of yards of stone and gravel are necessary to provide firm shoulders along pavement edges.

Thousands of miles of side ditches must be kept open for drainage. Surfaces must be kept smooth for comfortable travel, firm to bear the ever-increasing load of heavy commercial vehicles, and cracks must be filled to prevent pavement destruction by the elements.

All of this, and much more, is required to provide a way over which traffic may move. But that is not enough. We must also provide for safe, comfortable, economical, and convenient movement of that traffic.

We have on the rural State highways of Indiana over three and one-half billions of miles of travel each year. If you had traveled at the rate of 50 miles per hour, day and night, from the year 6,000 B. C. up to the present time, you would still have 361 years to go to equal the total of 1 year's motor traffic on Indiana State highways. It would take 140,000 cars around the world at the Equator, or it would take each of Indiana's million motor vehicles on two round trips to the New York World's Fair and on a side trip to Kansas City.

One of every five of the cars on State routes is from some other State. Thus, our neighbors travel 730,000,000 miles with us each year and, if all crossed from east to west on one highway, would make one car every 7 seconds, day and night, throughout the year.

One out of every five of the vehicles on State highways is a truck or other commercial vehicle. This tremendous load of traffic is equal to 1,000 vehicles per day on each mile of road, but is, unfortunately, not so evenly distributed, and we find many miles carrying 400 or less, and many other miles carrying from 3,000 to 25,000 per day.

This composite stream of local and foreign traffic, composed of heavy commercial and light passenger vehicles, operated by drivers of both sexes and of all ages, races, and degrees of intelligence, moves at varying speeds over this vast system day and night in all sorts of weather, from the extreme heat and thunderstorm of July and August, to the snow, sleet, and icy cold of Hoosier winters.

We have progressed far in our development of roads and our use of roads since the time, more than a century ago, when Lincoln ferried an occasional team and wagon across Anderson Creek. Today the highway industry stands in the forefront, if not at the forefront, of the fields in which we labor. And yet, we are still seeking, in the building of roads, to do as Lincoln did with his ferry, aid the traveler in reaching his destination, more conveniently, more quickly, and with greater safety.

With our hearts quickened and glad upon this occasion and inspired as we are by this gathering, let us renew our confidence in our destiny, which is imbued with the real American spirit. Let us "press on toward the goal" that we may do honor to our reverend dead and make sure that "this Nation under God shall not perish from the earth."

Neutrality and the Arms Embargo

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. SHERMAN MINTON

OF INDIANA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, October 17 (legislative day of Wednesday, October 4), 1939

ADDRESS BY SERGEANT YORK

Mr. MINTON. Mr. President, if Colonel Lindbergh, who is not a colonel except in an honorary sense, is to be accepted as an authority on war and peace, I think we might well accept as additional authority one who learned war from living in the hell of it. We should therefore welcome the expression of views from a great hero of the World War, Sergeant York. I ask unanimous consent that there may be inserted in the Appendix of the RECORD an address delivered on October 4 by Sergeant York.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Ladies and gentlemen, I have just come down to WSM radio studios after a visit to the home of "Old Hickory"—Andrew Jackson—which is some 12 miles from Nashville.

One of the reasons I left my home at Pall Mall, in the eastern part of middle Tennessee, last night was to make this little radio talk. The other reason was to visit the shrine of Tennessee's greatest hero, Andrew Jackson.

Out at the Hermitage today I was one of the few men in the midst of more than 400 Gold Star Mothers, and it was my duty to speak at the tomb of Andrew in the presence of these Gold Star Mothers and some of my buddies who went across and came back in the last war.

In such company, and on such hallowed ground, I thought a good deal about the course this country should take in the present troubled times.

Surely, we all hope that never again will we have to shed tears with another group of Gold Star Mothers.

And, yet, we Tennesseans are just as firmly resolved that we shall never be untrue to the traditions of bravery and courage and honor that made Andrew Jackson the hero of New Orleans.

I think we must, and will, be true to both these great emotions that I feel, that my people here in Tennessee feel, and I think the people of the whole country feel.

When you come right down to it, this is a problem for the people of the country as a whole, and that's the way it will be solved. That is the true democratic manner.

It is in the democratic manner for me, then, to tell my fellow citizens just how I feel about what is going on in Washington.

The President of the United States, on September 5 last, issued a proclamation of neutrality for the United States in the current war in Europe.

I understand that a proclamation calling for support of the President's proclamation of neutrality was issued today by Governor Cooper, of Tennessee. In that I can say that our own Governor voiced my own sentiments.

In the President's proclamation, President Roosevelt said:

"Let no man or woman thoughtlessly or falsely talk of America sending its armies to European fields."

I heartily endorse such sentiment.

The President also said:

"In modern foreign relations, when peace has been broken anywhere, the peace of all countries everywhere is in danger."

We know that he is right in that serious statement affecting the present peace of neutral nations.

Our duty is to uphold him in his determination that the American desire for neutrality shall not be changed.

But let us not close our eyes to possibilities already on the war horizon. That is not only dangerous, it is downright foolish.

If war becomes necessary—and when and if, and only if, it becomes necessary—then let us stand behind the President as solidly, as heartily, as whole-heartedly, and as completely in time of war as in time of efforts to preserve our peace.

I have known war, and, like President Roosevelt, I hate war.

But let me make this clear. I do not hate war to the extent that I would sacrifice the standing and the national honor of my country to obtain an unsatisfactory, unstable peace—a failure of peace, such as was the conference of Munich last fall.

Today the Congress of the United States is in special session at the call of the President.

The issue of neutrality and the issue of the arms embargo are at stake.

I see no reason why this country should not engage in a "cash and carry" basis with countries of warring Europe.

But when I say "cash and carry" I mean it in the full sense of the words. I mean just that—nothing else.

No terms whatsoever, under whatever circumstances of promises, should be permitted. On this stand we should all be firm and uncompromising.

We should remember, among other things from the last great World War that we should never forget, that the "promises to pay" were broken by every nation to which we loaned money except little Finland. She alone has kept faith with her promise. Her word alone has been worth a dime.

In times of war, to get certain necessities, a nation would promise almost anything and sign almost anything. Almost any kind of promise is born of desperation. But peacetimes bring calmer days and these promises are forgotten.

Common business sense demands today that America remember the lesson she learned during the last war and make her transactions this time on the cash basis—the old-fashioned "cash on the barrel head" basis. That's just good common sense, and I think anybody ought to see it that way.

The main issue confronting the American people, however, is not how much cash money we can make out of the unfortunate people engaged in war but how we ourselves can keep out of war.

We must do it, of course, by honorable means. That's the American way.

But the same energy, effort, and wirepulling we are now putting into the fight for extra wartime business we might well put into the fight for peace, and I'm afraid that's going to be a big battle.

It is necessary that the peace-loving people of America do their individual part toward maintaining our peace, and there is a limit to that part.

It should never consist of any word or thought or move that might be in opposition to the policy of the national administration, and that is strict neutrality.

I have confidence in President Roosevelt.

I believe he will lead the people of America safely and peacefully through the present world emergency.

I believe he is telling the truth when he says repeatedly that he hates war.

He, too, has seen war.

He came to France when he was The Assistant Secretary of the Navy and went up to the front sectors.

He has first-hand knowledge of the horror of war.

I believe that with the vision and memory of the World War and its sacrifices ever before him he will use every honorable resource at the command of this Nation to keep us out of conflict. I pray for his success.

Yet always there must be the uppermost thought in the mind and heart of the good, loyal American that if the neutrality of the United States cannot be honorably preserved, then we must war with those who would war against us.

We must never let our passionate desire for peace be considered by the aggressive dictators of Europe as a sign that we are afraid.

America is not afraid.

Our will to live in peace is not a sign of weakness. It is strength and sanity far greater than some leaders of Europe could understand.

Let them never doubt this. Let Americans themselves never forget it.

We are the strongest, the mightiest, the greatest nation in the world, and we hope to stay that way. In peace we even pray to the God in whom we put our trust that we shall have peace.

But that does not mean we will go to any limits for peace. We shall not go beyond the limits of national honor.

America shall be true to the traditions of Washington and Jackson and Jefferson. We shall fight to keep the democracy they gave us—our greatest heritage.

I believe we can best preserve our democracy in peace. But we will be willing to war, if war be the only chance. Let no man doubt that.

I believe the temper of the American people is for an alert peace.

This was shown a few days ago, in the American Legion convention in Chicago that Governor Cooper and other Tennessee Legionnaires attended.

It was also shown here today when war mothers gathered at the tomb of Andrew Jackson.

Tennessee sent nearly 80,000 men to the last World War.

Nearly 2,000 of them were killed.

More than 500 Tennessee boys are still sleeping in Flanders Fields.

The gold stars are still visible in every city and town and rural hamlet in Tennessee.

We should, if possible, spare our people another great war.

Yet always we should hold fast to the ideal that Americanism can best be preserved by an alert, prepared, honorable peace objective, but a willingness and readiness and ability to fight if that peace is not accepted by those who guide the destinies of other nations.

At night, when I retire, I pray that never again will my country be plunged into the hell that I know war to be.

No future generals would accept my services. For the years have taken their toll.

But I have a son, almost 20 years old, back home at Pall Mall. He is not anxious to go to the battle front. But he is ready if the leaders of this Nation call him.

He trusts our leaders—from the President and the Congress on down—to keep us out of war, if possible.

And, as his father, I pray that my wife shall never become a Gold Star Mother.

Let all America be willing to pray for peace—and fight for peace.

America Needs an Increased Air Force

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JENNINGS RANDOLPH

OF WEST VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, October 17, 1939

ADDRESS BY CHARLES F. HORNER

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address of Charles F. Horner, president, the National Aeronautics Association, at the air-progress rally, Elkins, W. Va., October 7, 1939:

Anyone who makes a prediction of how much progress aviation will make in the next decade would be foolhardy. So much has been done during the three decades of its existence that aviation today is almost a miracle child of American ingenuity, courage, and foresight.

Within the current year we have seen the last of the oceans spanned. Regular scheduled service to Europe, maintained despite war conditions, makes possible transportation of passengers, express, and mail. And only a short time ago, people questioned the ability of our engineers and pilots to build and fly planes which would fly nonstop more than 2,000 miles across vast expanses of water.

Almost 450 years ago, Columbus, with the courage and faith that have since characterized the best type of American pioneers, set forth from a quaint port in Spain. With him was a motley crew of adventurers, some hardy and disciplined, some willing to face unknown dangers only to escape those which they knew lay behind them.

Three small, barely seaworthy vessels made up the ocean caravan destined to light the way to a new record of achievement and to open a world, hitherto unfathomed and unknown. Columbus was buffeted by storm from without, he faced terror by sea, and was beset by mutiny within his ranks. He knew nothing of his course. The haven he sought was little more than a hope. Navigation aids were a dream and faith's holy spark. For 70 days he struggled, found an enchanted isle, and a new world was known to the men of his day.

More than 300 years later, their own faith stirred perhaps by the courage and convictions of Columbus, two American pioneer adventurers, clear-eyed and determined, made an overland journey half across the continent of America. They struggled for months, up racing streams, over rocky wastes, and through the fastnesses of mountains. Many of their men lost their lives, but after many months of weary travel, the eyes of Lewis and Clark were rewarded in the boundless majesty of the Oregon shore.

There are probably not many mature men and women of America who have not, at some time, in their lives, been thrilled by Jules Verne's Around the World in Eighty Days. It was purely a fantasy when written and, although the story stirred the blood of thousands, after all, it was then very much like the management of a grand opera star, or like living within one's economic means would be today—something that really could not happen. To span the earth in 80 days. What a fabrication of fantasy. What a distortion of fact.

It is related that about a dozen years ago, a citizen of Buenos Aires, named Tschiffley, undertook a journey from that great South American city to Washington, D. C. He traveled all the way by land. He used the methods of transportation that were then available over that long and weary way. He came by horseback, traveling northward, ever northward, and finally, more than 2 years later, reached his destination.

Told again and again, these stories may be superfluous. Already you have drawn from your own memories numerous instances in kind. Yet the men who undertook these journeys typify almost every other living person in this enlightened world. To a degree, they personify the compelling quest that surges within the hearts of all civilized men.

I cannot believe that in travel men seek adventure alone or in exploration struggle for personal renown. This lure of travel is not a selfish urge. It struggles incessantly for a wider arena for development, a higher plane of thought and experience.

A few years ago I visited with Glen Martin, a practical idealist, a dreamer of sane dreams, and a man who puts imagination into blue prints and finds romance in revolving wheels. He spoke confidently of a day when the ordinary traveler might leave New York in the morning and, in the miracle of the flying boat, dine in a capital of Europe the following day. A few hours for a journey much longer than that for which Columbus and the Santa Maria required 70 days to complete.

Today the practical dream of Glen Martin is a reality. Huge flying clipper ships wing their sure way across the Atlantic from Port Washington, N. Y., or Baltimore, Md., to European ports in a little more than 24 hours. Already hundreds of persons traveling on business or for pleasure have used this new, this modern, this American manner of transoceanic travel.

Lewis and Clark, in danger, hunger, and disaster, spent weary months back in 1803–4 to achieve the distance that a modern transport air liner can fly in a day. Today, covering the same territory they so laboriously crossed, giant air liners cruise from Chicago to Seattle and Portland in a comfortable overnight journey.

The ships of the sky, flying across the Caribbean Sea and down the coast of South America, now carry mail and passengers from New York to any one of several South American cities across 15 frontiers for a distance of 8,000 miles, soaring above diverse people who speak six different languages, flying over mountains and jungles, as low as sea level and higher than the clouds, kissed by tropical sun and buffeted by zero gales, not in the more than 2 years' travel of poor Mr. Tschiffley, but in little more than a week. * * *

I do not search for miracles or their cause; I seek a place where I may understand in some degree the impelling urge with which man seeks to take the "wings of the morning and fly to the uttermost parts of the earth."

If the Dixie Clipper, spanning the Atlantic, or the China Clipper, diminishing the vastness of the Pacific, are miracles today, the hard-riding cowboys of the pony express were miracles in another age. Whether we creep, or walk, or float, or roll, or sail, or fly, the desire to move is of the very essence of our life.

Thus progress is made and recorded. In this heroic experience we must find a deeper understanding of life.

None can, and, if a full appreciation of its high purpose is understood, none would stop flying. Neither the capsized canoe in a mountain stream nor the Titanic's fearful doom hold boats at their moorings or steamers at their docks. Only the coward would be restrained; only the fool would think that men will be stopped either by fear or disaster, and neither fools nor cowards have achieved a place in America's hall of fame. Aviation, man's most sublime expression of motion, is growing, and will continue to grow in ever-widening circles, for greater distances, to greater heights.

There was a time when men thought flying would be confined to a few thousand feet of altitude. Today men are successfully flying even transport ships at heights of 4 and 5 miles above the earth in complete safety and comfort. There was a time when it took the first mail plane 4 hours to travel from New York to Philadelphia—the time it now takes for a leisurely journey by air from New York or Washington to points beyond Chicago.

But aviation has become more than an instrument of achievement, a conqueror of new worlds.

It has become a force as a liaison between the priest in his cloister, the philosopher in his temple, and those men of action who have given us this great product of their inventive and creative minds and hands.

Despite its employment as a messenger of death on the battle front, aviation was becoming, and in God's good time will become, an instrument of peace and good will. Let a modern air voyager announce his plans to encircle the globe, and immediately the nations he will span offer every help and convenience for his journey. This new, this finer aspect of human relationship promises a better world in which to live.

Flying creates no new philosophy; it enriches and vitalizes the old. It reveals in startling intensity the need to apply it to life that may at times seem confused and complicated with things modern. It is no one's wish that the mind of the inventor, nor the ingenuity of the manufacturer shall too far outstrip the intelligence of average man. These cannot and will not be restrained. These must move forward and discover that that which seemed a menace and a burden may in intelligence become a blessing and a means for security.

Thus, with horizons widened, ocean barriers surmounted, and greater opportunity for enriched international relationships resulting, the progress of flight continues.

To him who finds his pathway in the sky, to him who has conquered the far-flung expanses of the world and dares to dream of the exploration of the universe, to him, in imagination, nations become tiny spots, international boundary lines unseen, selfish dreams of worldly empire an hallucination, and fortifications but a figment of a troubled dream.

While intrepid pilots find new and untried sky lanes, while skilled engineers design new and faster ships, and while visionary inventors develop new and better devices to control and navigate them, others of us may discover a way to define new horizons, adapt an old philosophy to a life whose riches have been multiplied to the end that flying may add to the happiness and not to the danger of a troubled world.

Like religion, and music, and unselfishness, flying is surely effecting a strong kinship and a bond of understanding among those who have tasted the happiness it confers.

The association I represent is exerting all of its power and its facilities to encourage and foster national defense in the air; likewise to encourage and foster a healthy appreciation of what civil and private aviation can mean to this modern world. We also foster and encourage the spirit of sportsmanship and friendly competition to make America lead in the air. All this I heartily endorse and am doing all that I can to advance. But we do this, not to prepare for war but to prepare to avert war, and meanwhile, through this great instrumentality, through aviation, to promote international good will and to widen the scope of our lives.

Beginning with September 11, 750 or more cities in the United States and Alaska, through public meetings like this, in air tours, airport celebrations, junior airplane contests, and in study in the public schools, have endeavored to bring themselves up to date in the great progress which has been made in this new and fascinating activity. After all, I do not come to talk of aviation as a thing of romance but rather as a practicability. It is not simply an adventure in new fields but a growing, forward surge in finding, accepting, and developing a new method to enhance our social happiness, our economic welfare, and our national defense.

During the years of the demoralizing depression, aviation was indeed a small child in the great family of industrial groups. But it, and perhaps it alone, made gain day by day and year by year, while other industries lost. It has now established itself as a practical business enterprise. Every phase of it, scheduled air transport, air mail, military and nonscheduled operations, are growing steadily and satisfactorily. We are slowly beginning to realize that, in the dreary search for means to expand our trade, industries, and employment, aviation shows reasonable hope that it will rapidly become a substantial factor in all. While much has been accomplished, particularly within the last year, there is so much to be done. Aviation is genuinely an institution of public concern, because the people of America as such, dollar for dollar, have a far greater investment in it than have carriers and manufacturers.

That is why in characteristic American fashion the people of America are beginning to express their interest as you are doing today. There is a great work for us yet to do. I cannot, of course, discuss all of the things that should have your careful thought, but rather I must content myself in referring briefly to a few of them. The great field of nonscheduled operations in flying, and included in that are your private fliers, who use the planes for their own business or pleasure, that great backbone of aviation, the private flight instructors, the fixed base operators, including approved schools, are worthy of the backing of sympathetic encouragement, and civic-minded support of all progressive citizens. These have kept aviation alive in lean days. They have paid a price, both in dollars and devotion. They are widely scattered, are unorganized, and it is important that their rights and their potentialities should be kept constantly in view, along with airlines and military air forces. I congratulate the city of Elkins on its vastly improved airport. I hope and believe that you appreciate its value and importance in your civic life. At the present time the airport situation in the country as a whole is one that should cause us all deep concern. During the last few years practically the only money that has been available for airport extension outside of municipal sponsorship has been derived from relief funds. Under a mandate from Congress the Civil Aeronautics Authority undertook, accomplished, and conveyed to Congress a survey of our system of airports, and a report of what should be done to provide an adequate system. Unfortunately, but little heed has been given to this report. Our airlines are moving rapidly forward in extension of airways and volume of traffic. Great and important additions are being made to our military air forces. Private flying is increasing day by day, but there is no plan yet projected to effect a corresponding increase in airport facilities.

Those are two of the things that I think are of primary importance to you as alert and patriotic citizens. The third I am reluctant to discuss, just as we are all reluctant to face grave dangers which threaten the security of the institutions, the ideals, and the happiness of 130,000,000 people. Nevertheless, I think it is my duty to speak to you on the subject of air defense.

I am not a military expert, and I base the following statement upon that which I believe is the minimum of what the American people want. The last Congress, in a highly patriotic and nonpartisan manner, made commendable authorizations which, when effected, will bring the fighting strength of the Army Air Corps to about 5,500 planes. That is splendid, but it is not enough. Does any reasonable citizen doubt that if America had had, within the past year, an invincible and altogether adequate army in the air, that we would face so great a threat of danger today? Indeed it is doubtful, had we been in that happy situation, if a war in Europe would even have been begun. If I sense American opinion correctly, we want not a good air force, but perhaps the greatest air force of the world. In the interest of peace and security and of ultimate economy I believe that our Army air force should be expended not to 5,500 planes but to at least 10,000 planes and that there should be an annual increase thereafter of at least 1,000 planes in addition to replacements for obsolescence and loss. To those who say that our production capabilities are not sufficient to effect this I will say, that is sheer nonsense. To those who say this would present too great a problem in the necessary expansion of personnel, again I say that is also nonsense. There is a great reservoir of trained manpower available, including those almost forgotten men of aviation who are willing, though rusty, but nevertheless competent, the Air Reserves. To those who say that such an expansion would be economically unsound, there are many answers, but one is enough. The whole crushing cost of war is economically unsound.

If I read American opinion correctly, the tax bearers of the country are perfectly willing to expend the few hundred millions of dollars necessary to provide an air force sufficient to defend us, in the great probability that through such an expenditure a cost of many, many billions of dollars may be avoided. I have confidence in the ability, the patriotism, and resourcefulness of our Air Corps. I believe we can trust their leadership, and I think it is high time that the people of America, whose stake is the lives of their sons and their property and happiness, have come to realize and believe that the greatest war defensive air force in the world is not too much for this the greatest Nation in the world.

Col. E. M. House

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. R. EWING THOMASON
OF TEXAS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, October 17, 1939

LETTERS FROM FRANCES B. DENTON AND GORDON AUCHINCLOSS AND AN EDITORIAL FROM THE NEW YORK TIMES

Mr. THOMASON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following letters, signed by Frances B. Denton and Gordon Auchincloss, with regard to a letter recently placed in the RECORD purporting to have been written by the late Col. E. M. House, and also an editorial upon the subject published in the New York Times:

NEW YORK, N. Y., October 16, 1939.

Hon. ROBERT EWING THOMASON,
Room 1730, House Office Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I have read with deep interest the questions you asked Congressman THORKELSON on October 13, 1939, and the answers he gave, all of which appear on pages 391 et seq. of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD under date of October 13, 1939. I have also read the extension of remarks of Hon. J. THORKELSON, of Montana, in the House of Representatives on Wednesday, October 11, 1939, which appear on pages 598–603 of the daily CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of October 11, 1939, and which include, in the words of Mr. THORKELSON, "a letter from Col. E. M. House to Hon. David Lloyd George."

For a period of 45 years prior to Colonel House's death on March 28, 1938, I acted as Colonel House's confidential secretary, and as such took all of his dictation and was in charge of all of his papers and was familiar with all of his correspondence. I can state unqualifiedly that the letter which Mr. THORKELSON introduced into the RECORD above referred to, and purporting to be signed by Col. E. M. House, was never written or signed by him.

I notice on page 391 of the RECORD that Mr. THORKELSON states that he has not the original of this letter, and that he has no evidence with reference to the signature, and that he does not vouch for the genuineness of the letter.

I can testify and will be very glad to do so at any time that the letter was never dictated by Colonel House, never signed by Colonel House, never authorized by Colonel House, and is entirely and altogether spurious, purporting as it does to be a letter of Colonel House.

I am a native of Texas myself and I appreciate very much your action as a Representative of Texas in making it perfectly clear to the Congress of the United States and to the people of the United States generally that the presence of this letter in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD is a rank injustice to a man now dead but who during his entire life worked hard as a loyal American citizen for the State of Texas and for the United States of America.

Yours very sincerely,

FRANCES B. DENTON.

AUCHINCLOSS, ALLEY & DUNCAN,
New York, October 16, 1939.

Hon. ROBERT EWING THOMASON,
Room 1730, House Office Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN THOMASON: I wish to let you know how much the family of Col. E. M. House appreciate your efforts on October 13, 1939, to protect the reputation of Colonel House, as appears on page 391 et seq. of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of that date.

Colonel House, who is now dead, was my father-in-law, and at various intervals during the World War I acted as his secretary on certain of his trips to Europe, including the entire period of the Peace Conference in Paris; and, generally speaking, I was thoroughly familiar with all of his activities during the period in which he acted as an advisor to the late President Wilson.

The letter that Mr. THORKELSON quotes is apparently dated "British Consulate, New York City, June 10, 1919," and is signed "Your humble and obedient servant, Col. E. M. House." On June 10, 1919, and for almost 8 months previous to that time, Colonel House was in Paris acting, first as the President's representative in the pre-armistice negotiations and then as a member of the American Commission to Negotiate Peace, so obviously he was not in New York City on June 10, 1919.

I enclose herewith an editorial which appeared in the New York Times under date of Saturday, October 14, 1939, entitled "A Historical Report." This editorial really makes it unnecessary for me to further characterize this letter, but I will add that from my knowledge of Colonel House's affairs, thoughts, ideas, and general activity I can state that the letter is altogether spurious and was never written by him or authorized by him and never signed by him.

Unfortunately for us, Mr. THORKELSON had to admit, in answer to a question from you, that he did not have the original of the letter, and he simply referred you, when you asked him to give some evidence of the authenticity of the letter, to the American Publishers Society, Bremerton, Wash. May I suggest to you that the Federal Bureau of Investigation report to you promptly with reference to the American Publishers Society, Bremerton, Wash., and that, further, Congressman DIES might be interested to have his committee investigate the activities of this society.

On page 393 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, Mr. THORKELSON states, in answer to your contention that he should provide the House with some evidence that the late Colonel House signed the letter in question, "I do not think it makes very much difference, because the question today is not the reputation of any man and it is not a question of the character of any man. We know we were deceived during the World War and we know we are being deceived today." Does it occur to Congressman THORKELSON that he, himself, in his role as a Representative of one of the great States of the Union, is deceiving the people of the United States by sponsoring a clumsy, spurious document, which is also a forgery, by introducing the same into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD? In effect, Mr. THORKELSON, by printing this letter purporting to be signed by Colonel House, is saying to the American people that in 1919 one of their highly trusted representatives was acting as a secret-service agent of the British Government. If Mr. THORKELSON can prove this to be a fact, it is important. If he cannot prove it—and so far he has not made the slightest effort to prove it—it is important that the American people should thoroughly understand the kind of deception which Mr. THORKELSON is willing to sponsor.

Yours very sincerely,

GORDON AUCHINCLOSS.

[From the New York Times of October 14, 1939]

"A HISTORICAL REPORT"

In the Appendix of the daily CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of October 11 Representative JACOB THORKELSON, of Montana, extending his remarks, covered eleven columns and a quarter with a reprint of what he called "a historical document." This purported to be a letter written from the British Consulate in New York, June 10, 1919, by the late Colonel House to Mr. David Lloyd George. On that date both were in Paris. In President Seymour's "Intimate Papers of Colonel House" we find that Colonel House "remained in Paris until June 11." On the previous day his diary records that he "went today to see Sir William Orpen's portrait of the President." Dipping one's nose into the second column of the historical report one finds reference to a previous report alleged to have been made by the Colonel to the Prime Minister:

"The report I had the honor to submit to you, dated December 1, 1918 (appendix 14), showed that the average angelicization [sic] time for Americans in England had been reduced to 14 days; in America to 29 days 3 hours 16 minutes; that the percentage of angelicization [sic] had risen to 101; that the percentage of failure had fallen to 3.79; and that the cost had been decreased to 53 cents per colonist."

This should have put Mr. THORKELSON on notice. The whole supposed letter is a burlesque so thickly laid on that it becomes almost incredible. Who handed this curious composition to the Honorable JACOB THORKELSON? He doesn't tell us. Some joker must have taken advantage of his innocence. Surely the Honorable Jacob must have accepted this document unread. For instance:

"May I also call your attention to the services of Prof. Richard Gottheil, of Columbia University (the one who pinned the medal on F. D. Roosevelt in 1937 for his distinguished services to the world Jewry), in our campaign against the Hindus."

It was a careless jester who allowed that 1937 to stick out in a letter attributed to 1919, but Mr. THORKELSON, in his large, western way, having plenty of faith, didn't draw on sight. It is a preposterous fake that someone has given him. The American Anglophiles are going to use the League of Nations, of which Mr. Wilson is to be president, to restore the United States to the British Empire. Mr. Wilson's appointment as head of the League would be for life. He would like a privy purse of $100,000,000. "The inventories I have prepared," writes the spurious colonel (appendixes 45–83), show that Mr. Wilson "is now surfeited with diamond stomachers, brooches, bracelets, Gobelin tapestries, mosaics and vases, gold caskets and plates."

This posthumous calumny is so absurd that one can hardly be angry with the author of it. The twinkle in his eye asks for forgiveness.

Our National Defense—We Should Increase and Strengthen Our Pacific Northwest Defenses

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. MARTIN F. SMITH

OF WASHINGTON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, October 17, 1939

RADIO ADDRESS BY HON. MARTIN F. SMITH, OF WASHINGTON, OCTOBER 16, 1939

Mr. SMITH of Washington. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I insert the following radio speech which I delivered over the national network of the Mutual Broadcasting System from Station WOL, Washington, D. C., on Monday evening, October 16, 1939:

Friends of the radio audience, may I at the outset express my appreciation to the Mutual network and its coast-to-coast facilities for making this national broadcast possible.

Here in the National Capital the keenest interest and attention are, of course, being directed to the all-important and all-engrossing subject of neutrality and our foreign relations. The debate in the Senate has proceeded in a dignified, orderly, and constructive manner and according to the best and highest traditions of that august body. The Members of the House are standing by and will not be able to decide their exact position until the form and provisions of the neutrality legislation have been shaped by the Senate. In the meantime House Members are following very closely the discussion in the Senate and giving the entire subject the deepest, earnest study and consideration and will be ready to act promptly and intelligently as soon as the Senate has concluded its deliberations and the legislation comes back to the House for final action.

TO KEEP OUT OF WAR IS OUR MAIN OBJECTIVE

It cannot be emphasized too strongly that President Roosevelt and every Member of the House and Senate, and all the officials of our Government have one all-controlling objective in view, and that is to keep our country out of the present European war and to enact neutrality legislation which will most effectively accomplish this purpose. There exists here in Washington an absolute unanimity of opinion and unity of determination in support of this main objective. Patriotic men and women differ only as to the method and formula to be followed to prevent our country from becoming involved. I do not doubt for one moment that the issue will finally be resolved in favor of the best interests of our own country and our own people.

FACTORS IN FAVOR OF CASH AND CARRY

It now appears probable that the determining factors in favor of the cash-and-carry feature will be: First, that the present law does not bar American ships from combat zones; that the proposed pending act would bar them; second, that the law now does not limit responsibility of our Government for goods other than munitions in transit to belligerents, while the proposed law would; third, that the present law bars only munitions and not other commodities; and, fourth, and very important, cash-and-carry neutrality would aid American preparedness and the strengthening of our national defenses. I intend to elaborate on this feature later in my remarks.

Upon the foregoing provisions we predicate our belief and build our hopes that it will be possible—at least, more likely—for our country to keep out of the European war. By forcing American shipping to stay out of combat zones we will be less affected by submarines and air warfare, which was the direct cause of our involvement in the last European war.

We need to look to our interests in the Pacific, with Japan a potential enemy of Great Britain and Russia alined on the same side with Germany, which is one of the most amazing and threatening developments of this war so far as our future interests are concerned. Australia and New Zealand are defenseless; the Philippines are an American obligation until 1946. Nor should we overlook South America and our maintenance of the Monroe Doctrine.

OUR NATIONAL AND PACIFIC COAST DEFENSES

As one of the Representatives in Congress of a Pacific coast State—Washington—it is only logical and natural that the matter of our national defenses, and particularly our Pacific coast defenses, should be of vital concern to me and the people whom I represent.

"WHILE ENGLAND SLEPT"—CHURCHILL

I recently placed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD excerpts from Winston Churchill's book, "While England Slept," which consists of speeches Mr. Churchill delivered in the House of Commons during the past 6 years urging war preparedness and warning his countrymen of Germany's rearmament and growing war machine and air forces, now estimated at 16,000 planes. The conclusion is inescapable that England neglected her national defenses while Germany built the greatest war machine in human history and the largest air fleet in the world. If England had also prepared and at least maintained a parity with Germany in the air, it is very doubtful, indeed, that there would be war in Europe today, and the recent history of central and southeastern Europe might have been different. The end is not yet and how costly England's neglect will prove to be time alone will tell.

My countrymen, this is a period in history when it behooves our country to look facts straight in the face without blinking and act accordingly.

DEFENSES ON THE PACIFIC COAST

Do we need a two-ocean naval fleet?

Is our Pacific coast adequately protected?

Are the Grand Coulee and Bonneville Dams and Grays Harbor Jetties adequately protected?

Have we sufficient air and seaplane bases on the Pacific coast?

Have we sufficient fortifications and antiaircraft guns on the Pacific coast?

Have we sufficient air defenses on the Pacific coast?

Are the cities of San Francisco, Los Angeles, Portland, Vancouver, Longview, Seattle, Tacoma, Olympia, Grays Harbor, Spokane, and eastern and western Washington adequately protected?

Are the Columbia River, Puget Sound, Grays Harbor, and Willapa Harbor defenseless and vulnerable to foreign attack?

Is the Panama Canal safe from attack?

Do we need the Nicaragua Canal, the Florida ship canal?

PUGET SOUND, GRAYS HARBOR, WILLAPA HARBOR, AND COLUMBIA RIVER CANAL

Do we need the Puget Sound, Grays Harbor, Willapa Harbor, and Columbia River Canal first proposed by Jefferson Davis while Secretary of War, away back in 1856, as a military measure as well as an aid to commerce? The naval forces at the Puget Sound base are at present limited to the Straits of Juan de Fuca for ingress and egress. The proposed canal would permit more than half the commissioned vessels of the Navy to enter and depart by the canal, declared Rear Admiral Luther E. Gregory, C. E. C., United States Navy (retired), who also says that the two lower canals would accommodate three-fourths of the registered ships of the Navy with the tide at mean sea level.

Plans are completed for a submarine base located on the Columbia River. The sea-level canals would allow the submarines to operate from that base through either Grays Harbor, Willapa Harbor, and Puget Sound, in addition to the Columbia River entrance, and come to the relief or support of any naval unit engaged in battle at the straits. Vessels moving from Puget Sound would have three other exits into the ocean if the canals were constructed. The navy yard at Bremerton is becoming a principal base for construction of cruisers, destroyers, and such craft, and for fleet repairs. The proposed waterways would enhance its value to the Nation.

One of the largest military bases on the west coast, Fort Lewis, is being developed as a principal center of military concentration. The safe and rapid transport of heavy ordnance and munitions between defensive points along the coast is now impeded by highway bridges of light capacity and highways which are inadequate.

The Boeing airplane factory at Seattle, one of the largest such plants in the country, produces large numbers of fighting ships for the Government. This industry deserves the extra protection a canal would give.

At Dupont is situated one of the largest powder plants in the country, and Hogum Bay, near Olympia, is a storage plant of the Giant Powder Co. These industries will provide huge war supplies in case of conflict, supplies which can best be moved by water transportation. With the canal completed, transportation would be facilitated.

The cost of one battleship would build the canal, and in the time of national danger the existence of the new waterway might easily be worth a fleet of battleships in its strategic value.

GROWING PROXIMITY OF RUSSIA AND JAPAN

A few years ago Russian fliers flew successfully from Moscow over the North Pole to Vancouver, Wash., in my district, and made a second successful flight to California. If they would take off from the Bering Straits instead of far-off Moscow, how much easier their flight would be.

We have two wide oceans, it is true, but they do not afford us the safety and security they once did, with Colonel Lindbergh telling us about the planes which Germany is building capable of flying 500 miles per hour and remaining in the air 48 hours, and which would readily fly across the Atlantic and back.

My friends, because we take out life insurance is no indication that we expect or wish to die immediately, nor do we take out any kind of protective insurance because we want or expect to collect the benefits at once or ever. I liken the wisdom and advantage of our increasing and strengthening our national defenses as a form of insurance, no more and no less than that.

DANGEROUS POSSIBILITIES OF OUTCOME OF EUROPEAN WAR

I do not expect England and France to be defeated by Germany, but our country would be foolish and reckless, indeed, to not take into account in our plans that very possibility, especially in view of Russia's attitude and that of Italy and Japan. Should we shut our eyes to the fact that this war could continue until Germany, Russia, Italy, and Japan—which God forbid—were all allied and fighting against the western democracies? Our interests are not entirely confined to the North American Continent. As a matter of fact, we are pledged to protect and defend all the nations of the Western Hemisphere, including South America, under the Monroe Doctrine.

If Great Britain and France were defeated and Germany were to become master of the British and French Navies and air and land forces, with her powerful allies in the east, would they extend their dominion and exploitation to undeveloped South America, our next-door neighbors?

WE SHOULD IMMEDIATELY STRENGTHEN OUR NATIONAL DEFENSES

Are our Navy and air fleet comparable with those of Germany and Russia and Japan?

My fellow countrymen, this is an hour in our history for sober, serious, hard-headed, practical thinking and prompt, expeditious action. Would it not be the height of folly, extreme stupidity, and criminal neglect of duty for us to fail to substantially increase and strengthen our national defenses? With our two long coast lines and vast continental geographical area to defend, in the interest of the safety, security, and peace of our own people we should take immediate steps without the loss of another single day to build and construct for our proper and adequate national defense the largest and most modern and efficient two-ocean navy, the most complete coastal land defenses and strongest fortifications, the most effective antiaircraft defenses which science can provide, and particularly the largest air fleet in the world, commensurate with the size, area, and distances of our domain—50,000 planes, according to the advice of Capt. Eddie Rickenbacker, World War ace.

Let us be so well prepared that no combination of foreign powers in the world would dare to attack us. Let us be so well prepared that no combination of foreign powers in the world could attack us successfully.

Good night.

Industrial Mobilization

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. RAYMOND S. SPRINGER

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, October 17, 1939

EDITORIAL FROM THE WASHINGTON TIMES-HERALD

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD, and to include therein an editorial which appeared in the Washington Times-Herald on October 17, 1939, which is both sound and instructive. This editorial follows:

[From the Washington Times-Herald of October 17, 1939]

TOO MUCH SECRECY

Too much secrecy about the War Department's new industrial mobilization plan is breeding distrust and discontent in Congress and out.

This project is not merely the outline of grand strategy for national defense. It can lead to reorganization of our entire industrial system and affect the life, liberty, and pursuit of happiness of every man, woman, and child in the country.

WAR CAUGHT US NAPPING

Prior to 1914 nobody realized how drastically war would affect life in a modern nation. Consequently the great conflict caught the nations napping, and they had to mobilize industry by guess in the very middle of war's confusion. There was terrible waste, graft, and delay.

To prevent such a catastrophe again the War Department started studying, in 1921, the history and possibilities of mobilizing industry. It brought out in 1931 a rough draft of its findings and proposals for the President's action as soon as he feels war is imminent. Attached also were bills for Congress to enact. These have been revised three times—in 1933, 1936, and again this year. The three prior drafts have always been public documents available at the Government Printing Office.

But the 1939 draft, drastically altering the detailed plan, was suddenly jerked back under cover after being announced in the routine fashion. Copies have become so scarce that, according to the Washington Daily Merry Go-Round, even Attorney General Murphy had to photostat a copy which had fallen into the hands of a newspaperman. None of the congressional Committees on Military Affairs have a copy.

HUSH-HUSH IS FOOLISH

This hush-hush behavior by the War Department is very foolish. It causes people to read into the plan meanings which a more forthright handling of a critical public issue would never stir up. We, for instance, have read the hard-to-get plan and honestly admit we'd like further information on some points. For example:

Industries should be classified as war industries and nonwar industries, according to the essentiality of the materials and services they provide. Labor requirements should then be determined for each of these classes, with primary attention directed toward furnishing adequate supplies of labor for the more important industries, thus keeping the job and the worker together, as far as circumstances permit.

There are four newspapers in this city. If war comes, what chance is there that some second lieutenant of ordnance may declare one newspaper is enough to serve this community as an essential war industry?

The thing is full of jokers of this sort. We think Congress had better get a copy of the 1939 mobilization plan and discuss it in detail for all the country's benefit, whether the War Department likes it or not.

Proposed Argentine Trade Agreement

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CLIFFORD R. HOPE

OF KANSAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, October 17, 1939

STATEMENT BY HON. CLIFFORD R. HOPE, OF KANSAS

Mr. HOPE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following statement made by me before the Committee for Reciprocity Information:

I desire to express my opposition to the reduction in tariff rates on agricultural products from Argentina as contemplated in the proposed reciprocal trade agreement with that country.

I do not appear here as one who is opposed to an extension of our foreign trade. As a matter of fact, I represent the greatest wheat-producing district in the country, and my constituents are vitally interested in expanding wheat exports. They realize and I realize that if this is to be done it is necessary to give and take and that we cannot have exports without imports.

I do not believe that our general level of tariff rates on agricultural products is too high. On that question I do not want to go as far as President Roosevelt did in his Baltimore speech on October 25, 1932, in which he said: "I know of no effective excessively high tariff duties on farm products. I do not intend that such duties shall be lowered," because I think there are possibly some agricultural commodities upon which there are excessively high tariff rates, just as there are some industrial commodities upon which the rates are excessive. Perhaps adjustments are needed. I do feel, however, that the reductions in agricultural rates made in previous trade agreements have been entirely unjustified and very definitely injurious to agriculture.

One very good reason why the program might in its early years have failed to help agriculture was because the earlier agreements were in most cases made with countries which were our competitors in agricultural production. However, it was asserted, and it seemed with some reason, that as time went on and agreements were made with countries whose principal interests were industrial, it would be possible to do something for agriculture. Great hopes were held out in connection with the British agreement, but certainly what has occurred during the first 9 months of that agreement has not given us any reason to believe that it will be of any assistance to agriculture. As a matter of fact, the figures show that during the time in which this agreement has been in existence our agricultural exports to Great Britain have declined as compared with the similar period prior to the effective date of the treaty, January 1, 1939.

As far as the product in which I am most interested—namely, wheat—is concerned, such exports as have been brought about during the period of the British agreement have occurred, not because of the agreement, but rather because of a policy which is the very antithesis of the trade-agreement program; namely, an export subsidy. Undoubtedly, had the export-subsidy program not been in effect, our agricultural exports to Great Britain since the agreement with that country went into effect would have made even a poorer showing.

Inasmuch as representatives of the producers of all the products likely to be affected by such reductions in rates as may be made by this agreement are represented at this hearing and will no doubt submit definite figures and specific reasons why no change should be made in the rates affecting particular products, I shall not duplicate what may be offered in the way of statistics and figures, but make my statement as brief as possible and confine it to the general proposition that, in view of the record showing what has been done under the reciprocal trade-agreement program, it is a mistaken policy to undertake a reduction in tariff rates on competitive agricultural products from Argentina at this time.

While I am interested in a fair tariff rate on all agricultural commodities, yet the products under consideration in which I am particularly interested, because they are produced in my district, are beef and veal and their byproducts, including tallow, oleo oil and oleo stearin, and hides; dairy products, including casein and cheese; corn; broomcorn; alfalfa seed; eggs; turkeys; vegetable oils, including linseed; and wool.

Notwithstanding a sharp increase in the price of some of these commodities, practically all of them are today below parity prices, and any reduction in tariff rates cannot help but have a detrimental effect either in reducing prices or preventing prices advancing more nearly to parity. It is true that a few products under consideration, such as wool, have recently passed parity; but whether this is merely due to speculation on account of the war situation or has a more substantial basis it is impossible to say at this time. In any event, any reduction in tariff rates is bound to decrease rather than increase these prices, inasmuch as we are on an import basis on practically all of these commodities.

Irrespective of the merits or demerits of the case as to the individual items under consideration, it seems to me that there are some very cogent general reasons why the reciprocal trade agreement program should not be further extended at this time and particularly should not be extended on competitive agricultural products from Argentina.

In the first place, while I have seen no official announcement as to the items upon which it is proposed that Argentina shall reduce its tariff, press dispatches on the matter suggest that the principal items under consideration are automobiles, cash registers, office equipment, paints, refrigerators, radios, plums, raisins, apples, and lumber. Practically all of these items are noncompetitive so far as Argentina is concerned, while practically every item upon which is contemplated that we will reduce our duties is highly competitive with domestic producers. This very fact, it seems to me, condemns the proposed agreement from the start in that it certainly puts the American Government and the American producer at a disadvantage. Every reduction we make will to some extent injure domestic producers. Every reduction which we make will be upon items which are not needed in this country, because we can supply them ourselves. The items, however, upon which Argentina is expected to reduce its duties are items which Argentina must needs import. They are not competitive with their own producers. Any reductions which may be made in tariff rates will thus directly benefit consumers in that country, while in nowise injuring producers.

Therefore, such concessions as may be given Argentina by reducing our tariffs will be a clear gain for that country with no resulting disadvantages, whereas any advantages which might possibly accrue to industrial concerns in this country are bound to be more than offset by the loss which will be suffered by our agricultural producers. Thus, it can clearly be seen that any agreement with a country like Argentina cannot in any sense be reciprocal, because the advantages are all one way.

A second reason why this proposed agreement should not be entered into is that it would appear to be in direct conflict with the agricultural policy of this country as embodied in the agricultural-adjustment program. This program contemplates a reduction in the acreage and production of our agricultural commodities which go into export trade and an increase in the production of those commodities on which we are normally on an import basis. Thus, the program clearly contemplates a reduction in the acreage of crops like cotton, wheat, and corn and an increase in grass and forage crops and livestock production. This contemplated agreement, however, will, if put into effect, have the opposite result in that it will result in the importation of increased quantities of livestock and dairy products, as well as other commodities like vegetable oils, flaxseed, and poultry products for which there is room for expansion under the present A. A. A. program. Surely, if the present agricultural program is to get anywhere, it must have the cooperation of other branches of the Government.

Furthermore, it would seem to me that the whole philosophy of the reciprocal trade program is so at variance with the general New Deal policies that there is no way of reconciling them. The general policy of reducing tariff rates, which is contemplated under the reciprocal trade agreements program, can, it seems to me, be successful only in the event that we are able in this country to reduce production costs. However, the entire tendency of this administration's program has been to increase production costs through increased wages, increased general taxation, and social security, and other special taxes. In addition there is the certainty of greatly increased taxes in the future in order to pay off existing deficits. Such a program is not consistent with lowered tariff rates—rather it on the contrary assumes the necessity of higher rates, if we are to compete with other countries which have not increased their production costs as we have in this country.

This situation applies to agriculture just the same as it does to all other commodities. His production costs go up along with all others. For years the farmer has been striving to reach a figure known as parity. Today he is practically in the same position as he was 6 years ago. While the price of his products has advanced to some extent, yet the price of the commodities which he buys has gone up in an equal amount, so that today parity is just as far away as it has ever been. If, on top of this present disparity, we are going to further handicap the farmer by taking away some of his tariff protection, it is going to make parity even more a dream which will never be realized.

In addition to what has been said above, it seems to me that this is a particularly inopportune time to tinker with the tariffs on agricultural products. The outbreak of the war has had a marked effect upon the prices of some agricultural commodities. If the war continues for any length of time, still further effects will be apparent. This will no doubt result in shifts in production which will mean great increases in the production of some agricultural commodities based upon war demands. When the war is over, there will necessarily have to be an adjustment. Possibly in some cases lower rates of duty might not have any considerable effect just now, but might have a very detrimental effect when the inevitable readjustment takes place. Whenever changes of this kind are contemplated, it seems to me that they ought to be on the basis of normal conditions. Certainly no one in this country has been injured by reason of the existing tariff rates on the agricultural commodities which are under consideration in this agreement. Even under normal conditions I feel that it would be harmful to American agriculture to effect any reduction in the rates in question. Certainly we are taking even a greater chance if we attempt to deal with them under the existing unsettled conditions.

For these reasons, I feel that it is unwise and dangerous for us to reduce rates of duty on the commodities under consideration. I, therefore, sincerely hope that after a thorough consideration of the matter and of the evidence offered at these hearings it will be found advisable to drop these negotiations and proceed no further with an Argentine trade agreement at this time.

The Christian Church's Message to America Today

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. LOUIS LUDLOW
OF INDIANA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, October 16, 1939

A SERMON PREACHED BY HARRY EMERSON FOSDICK AT THE RIVERSIDE CHURCH, NEW YORK, N. Y., OCTOBER 1, 1939

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Speaker, on October 1 last, Rev. Harry Emerson Fosdick, pastor of the Riverside Church, New York, one of the world's great ministers, delivered a powerful sermon, dealing with the attitude of the Christian Church in the present world situation. By unanimous consent of the House I present his sermon for publication in the Appendix of the RECORD, as follows:

In view of the great disaster that has fallen upon the world, let me speak to you this morning more intimately than usual, as a man speaks to his friends. This new war is the sorriest public tragedy in my lifetime. It means that my generation has failed in meeting one of the greatest opportunities ever presented to mankind.

How better can one begin to face this situation than by trying to disentangle the church's distinctive message from the confused voices in the world outside? To be sure, no one man is commissioned or competent to speak for the whole Christian community. Within the church itself will be deep differences of opinion calling for mutual toleration and understanding. But at least a man can try to see what it is that, at our best, we ought to expect the church, as the representative of Christ, to say to America today.

To put the matter in New Testament terms, Paul, in one of the great crises of his life, fell back on a description of himself that, as he uses it, sounds like a rallying cry: "We are," he says, "ambassadors for Christ." Paul was a Jew, but in a crisis he could not speak simply as a Jew. Paul was a Roman citizen, but in a crisis he could not speak simply as a Roman citizen. He belonged to Someone greater than his race and nation, and in a crisis his message had to be distinctive of that higher loyalty. First of all, and most of all, he was an ambassador of Christ. Alas for a Christian minister now who does not so test his message.

Indeed, I submit the matter to your judgment. When from the world outside, filled with confused and angry voices, you come into this sanctuary of the one God of all mankind and see the cross above the altar, what distinctive note would you like to hear in the church's message? What characteristic and differential emphasis do you think you ought to hear?

For one thing, you ought not to want to hear from an ambassador of Christ any repercussions of the hatred outside. There will be plenty of that and to spare before we are through. Already one American clergyman has gone into his pulpit and announced to his congregation that he had oiled up his old Army rifle. Already here and there one can catch premonitions of those hymns of hate that war inevitably breeds, and that made the record of our Christian churches in the last war so terrible. You ought not to want to hear repercussions of war's hatreds from an ambassador of Christ.

This does not mean that in the conflict between totalitarian and democratic nations in Europe our personal sympathies are neutral. The gist of our American problem lies in the fact that our personal sympathies are not neutral. I am taking it for granted that, though you feel with me the madness of America's entering this war, few, if any of us, in our personal sympathies, are neutral. The most thoroughgoing pacifist here, I venture, hating war and all its ways, convinced, as I am, that in the long run no good thing can come out of it, when he hears of a victory of Nazi arms, says, "That's bad," and when he hears of a victory of French and British arms feels, "That's better." Our American problem is difficult just because our sympathy is not neutral.

If, then, our sympathies are thus engaged, if we deeply disapprove dictatorial government, and concerning some dictator, like Hitler, feel as Jesus did when to the Pharisees who told Him what Herod Antipas was planning, He replied, "Go, ye, and tell that fox"; how can such sentiments escape becoming hatred when war propaganda does its baneful work, invading even the sanctuary of Christ? The sovereign remedy against such h tred in these days, I suspect, is humility. You ought to want to hear that in the church. You will hear less and less of it outside. You ought to desire that emphasis from an ambassador of Christ.

This world disaster is the work of all of us. No nation comes into this conflict with clean hands. We call the 20 years from 1919 to 1939 a time of peace; but it was an evil peace, full of shameful power politics in which every contestant in this present conflict played a greedy part. Do not, I beg of you, listen to those who say that now all that does not matter—the Versailles Treaty, the perfidy that played false with President Wilson's 14 points, and all that wretched two decades of imperialistic greed; it does matter. We Americans will never keep our heads level, our judgments sane, and be prepared for a wise peace if we forget it.

Granted that Hitler, backed by Stalin, is immediately responsible for this war. Granted that France and Britain did not want it and that Hitler forced it. Still, never forget who it was that made Hitler possible. We all did. At the beginning the German people ridiculed him, feared him, hated him. At a session of the League of Nations in Geneva I heard a German statesman, a liberal and a democrat, plead with the nations to show some recognition of the nascent, struggling German democracy and its problems, cautioning them that if they failed, the German people, desperately though they tried, could not prevent some man on horseback from stealing the show. Bruening, going to Paris, begged Prime Minister Laval to help stay the tragedy latent in the German situation, drifting toward chaos and dictatorship, and he was snubbed. The European democracies easily could have saved democracy in Germany if they had cared half as much about democracy as now they say they do, and they refused. As for us in America, we would not so much as join an international organization to help.

Hitler made this war, but we all helped to make Hitler. Not hatred of any people but humility becomes us now.

Out there in the world we shall face persuasive propaganda, trying to make us see one side of this conflict all white and the other all black. There are two places, however, where that picture will be known to be as false as it really is. First, where serious historians gather; they know the sordid story of that 20 years of power politics. And, second, a Christian church, where a minister dares try to be an ambassador of Christ, and amid the hysteria of an angry world still keep insisting, "All we, like sheep, have gone astray; we have turned every one to his own way."

A member of my family motored through Germany a week before war was declared. I have a letter from her, dated a few days before war broke, from Freiburg in the Black Forest, very close to where it is hot today. She was glad, she said, to have made the trip. The German people were so lovable and friendly; no one, apparently, was thinking or talking about war. They were, she thought, an amiable, kindly folk, and she loved them. My soul! In Britain, France, and Germany the plain people are like the rest of us. Nowhere do they want war. Yet see them plunging, like the bedeviled swine in Jesus' parable, down the steep place into the sea. Not hatred—no; not in a church—but humility and penitence become a minister of Christ.

This leads us further to say that when, from the world without, you come into the sanctuary of the one God of all mankind, you ought not to expect from an ambassador of Christ any idealizing of this war, any picturing of it as a holy crusade for godly ends. This statement may go hard with someone here, some British friend from across the Canadian border worshiping with us today. My heart goes out to you. When a nation is at war, and its sons, brothers, and fathers are going to the front, the people are under an ungovernable coercion to idealize it. When we have to die for something, we have to exalt it as a holy cause—how else can we stand it? This strange tribute human nature pays to high ideals, that even when man does the cruelest things he has ever done—using these new implements of war to wreck a continent of homes—he has to exalt the doing of it as a holy cause in order to make it possible.

Remember, however, that all contestants on both sides in every war do that. The French, British, and Germans alike are doing that. Such idealizing of war is not a factual, realistic judgment; it is a psychological, emotional compulsion. Remember how we idealized America's entrance into the last war as a crusade for Christ. One American minister, picturing Jesus armed to the teeth and going into the trenches, even said Jesus "would take bayonet and grenade and bomb and rifle and do the work of deadliness." How we can throw even over the devil the mantle of our idealization! Don't expect that blasphemy today from an ambassador of Christ!

I am talking, however, not to those in this war, but to citizens of the United States. We are not in this war. If we are wise, we will stay out of this war. But if we are going to do that, we must from the beginning refuse to idealize this war. Whether we succeed in that or not will make more difference to our getting in or staying out than the much-discussed embargo.

If anybody here is seriously tempted to idealize this present conflict, remember the last World War. It did not settle a single basic problem in international relationships. President Nicholas Murray Butler, far from a pacifist or a radical, recently said, "That great war, with all its terrible sacrifice of life, of the comfort and happiness of tens of millions of human beings, and of the world's savings for generations, was absolutely futile." That was the war, was it, in which Jesus would have fought? That was the war, was it, that hundreds of us Christian ministers exalted as a holy crusade? That was the war concerning which some minister said that he could see no difference between a soldier going into the trenches and a missionary going to the ends of the earth to preach Christ. Yet it was absolutely futile. Well, 25 years from now serious minds will be saying that about this war. That is the unspeakable tragedy of it! Don't ask an ambassador of Christ to idealize it!

If someone says, "But this war will rid the world of Hitler," I answer that I certainly hope so. Yet the last war rid the world of the Kaiser, concerning whom we said just such things as we are saying about Hitler, but it did not solve a single basic problem. War can eliminate a Kaiser, but it always increases the things that a Kaiser stands for. War can defeat a Hitler, but by its very nature it creates Hitlerism and sows dragon's teeth from which a crop of other Hitlers springs. Be sure of this—however little you wish to be sure of it—this war will create more problems than it solves. A futile conflict a generation ago issued in an evil peace that, after 20 years of power politics, has issued in an evil war. Don't idealize it.

We shall face powerful propaganda centered on making us feel that here, at last, is a holy crusade of mass slaughter for godly ends. That, I think, is factually false, historically untenable, and, as a guide to America's foreign policy, utterly ruinous. But, whatever else it is, I am sure that it is absolutely un-Christian. May the ministers of Christ in America not fall victims to that pagan delusion! As for me, never again will I prostitute my Christian ministry to the idealizing of any war.

This leads us to say further that when from the world outside you come into the sanctuary of the one God you ought not to expect your ambassador of Christ to be content with the slogan, "Keep America Out of War." That does not go far enough for a Christian. To be sure, that slogan is critically important just now. Shout it from the housetops. I shall not today essay the role of political commentator and discuss the congressional debate as to the proper method to be used, but you may expect me, as an ambassador of Christ, through thick and thin, to the last ditch, to stand against America's embroilment in this war. As war goes on, however, especially if Britain and France are hard pressed, our sympathy with democracy is going to make staying out difficult. Watch that sympathy of yours. Sympathy is a powerful sentiment; it does us honor; but few things in this world can cause more damage when unintelligently used. If sympathy is going to decide this issue in America, if our emotions are to determine whether we go in or not, at least spare a little of your sympathy for home consumption before you plunge this Nation into another European war.

I have before me a letter from an American mother. Her husband was in the last war. He was with the "lost battalion" in the Argonne forest. He has been an invalid ever since; and she, as a school teacher, has supported him. And now as another war breaks out she writes me that she has a 17-year-old son. Well, after 20 years supporting the human wreckage of a futile war a generation ago, must she start all over again with her son in another European conflict? When sympathy rises, when emotion answers war propaganda, that American mother and millions of other American homes deserve at least a little consideration. Before God and my conscience I shall not forget them.

Nevertheless, just to say "Keep America Out of War" is not enough. That slogan by itself is negative. It sounds self-centered. It suggests that we have forgotten the world and that we acknowledge no responsibility beyond our own borders. In that sense no Christian can be an isolationist. Did not Jesus say, "Seek ye first the Kingdom of God"? The question is, Why do we want to stay out of this war? Is it to save our own skins, to make financial profit from the miseries of others, to be at ease while others die? Any Christian who today wants America to stay out of war should face himself with the fact that he is in strange company. Father Coughlin and Father Divine want that; all the pacifists and the American Legion want that; the stockbrokers and the social radicals alike want that. All sorts of motives—good, bad, and indifferent—are massed behind America's nonparticipation in this war. No wonder some 90 percent of our people want to stay out. Why should anybody want to get in?

Surely an ambassador of Christ must have a superior motive for staying out. Surely he must be thinking of the kingdom of God in all the earth. Surely, if he desires American neutrality, it is because he is convinced that only so can America, in the long run, make her greatest contribution to world-wide democracy, liberty, justice, and peace. More than once in these months ahead I shall try to think this through with you. Today let me lay down this basic proposition: As an ambassador of Christ I want America to stay out of this war, because I am convinced that America can make her greatest contribution to the world at large only by staying out, putting her house in order, keeping democracy vital here, aligning herself with kindred-minded neutrals, and, when peacemaking comes, preparing herself to throw into the scale on the side of a just peace and a world organization to sustain it the weight of a free, strong, democratic nation, unimpaired by war.

The one thing that most makes it difficult for many Americans to accept that policy is a picture which they have in their mind's eye about the way this war is likely to come out. Many a letter reveals how prevalent this picture is in the imagination of our people. They see Hitler winning in this conflict, and then they picture Hitler, victorious in the European war, starting out to conquer the world in general and us in particular. And they say, "We had better fight now while the fighting is good, alongside Britain and France, before we have to fight alone against a victorious nazidom with Britain and France whipped." If anything carries America into this war, it will be that picture.

Therefore, by way of contrast, let me draw another picture of the way this war is likely to come out that I think is a thousand times more probable. If Hitler ever should win this war, it is going to take a long time to do it. We can be sure of that. Not in a few months or years will Britain and France lie down under a triumphant Nazidom. Underline this then: In a modern war, long-continued, nobody really wins. Prime Minister Chamberlain, himself, only a few days before war was declared, said again what many a serious student has said before—that no one really wins a modern war. So, at the close of this conflict, if long-continued, the actual situation would not be a strong, victorious Hitler starting out to conquer the world. The actual situation would be all the contestants absolutely exhausted—psychologically, economically, materially exhausted—no one of them able for a long generation to lift their heads again. Europe would be a shambles—with Russia, if she keeps unimpaired, still strong, her morale undiminished, her resources untouched, waiting to start a social revolution in the embers of a wrecked Europe. If America wants to help the world most, she will not add herself to that dilapidated wreckage of the nations, but will prepare herself when peacemaking comes, to be still free, strong, her house in order, her resources unimpaired, to throw into the scales of a lasting peace the weight of a powerful democratic nation.

At any rate, my friends, when from the world outside you come into this sanctuary of the one God, you may expect me, in season and out of season, not simply for America's sake but for the world's sake, to plead for peace.

Argentina Reciprocal Trade Agreements

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FRANK CARLSON

OF KANSAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, October 16, 1939

STATEMENT BY HON. FRANK CARLSON, OF KANSAS, BEFORE THE COMMITTEE FOR RECIPROCITY INFORMATION ON THE PROPOSED TRADE AGREEMENT WITH ARGENTINA

Mr. CARLSON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I am including a statement used as a basis of my remarks before the Committee for Reciprocity Information on Tuesday, October 17, at which time the committee was hearing testimony on the proposed treaty with Argentina. The statement is as follows:

Mr. Chairman, I appreciate very much the opportunity to appear before the Committee for Reciprocity Information during the hearings on a proposed reciprocal trade agreement with Argentina. I do not appear as an expert on tariff schedules or rates, but as a representative from an agricultural district and a farmer and livestock man in my own rights I am greatly concerned as to the final draft of this treaty. Everyone must realize that agriculture will be directly affected by a trade agreement with our neighbor to the south. A reduction in tariff rates or concessions which would allow imports of competitive farm products in great quantities would further hamper an already demoralized agriculture. During the past few years billions of dollars have been paid in the form of farm benefits from the Federal Treasury to the farmers of this Nation, but even this aid has not placed the farmer in a position where he can pay his debts or his farm mortgage. This situation is so serious that recently the Farm Credit Administration ordered a moratorium on foreclosures of farm mortgages. There are 6,812,350 farms in the United States, and approxiatemly 35 percent of these are mortgaged. The total farm-mortgage indebtedness in the United States is $7,000,000,000, of which the Farm Credit Administration holds 40 percent, or nearly $3,000,000,000. Last year there were 80,000 farm-mortgage foreclosures in the United States, and of this number 28,000 were foreclosed by the Farm Credit Administration. I mention this not as a criticism of the Farm Credit Administration or any other lending agency but as proof that agriculture has its back to the wall.

The financial and economic condition of the farmer must be taken into consideration when a trade treaty with Argentina is being considered. Argentina and the United States have large fertile fields, produce the same farm crops under similar climatic conditions, with Argentina having the advantage of virgin sod, cheap labor, and reduced fixed charges in the form of taxes. Our farmers should not be asked to compete with them if we are to maintain our American standard of living. During the recent weeks following the declaration of war in Europe every effort is being made to increase our trade with Central and South American countries, and with this I am in entire accord, but we must keep in mind that all Latin American countries have a shortage of foreign exchange, and therefore any increase in trade will be determined by the amount of products we take from them. This being true, it is only natural that our trade with Argentina will be increased by the amount of meats, grains, hides, wool, fats, oils, eggs, turkeys, and other commodities produced in the agricultural sections of our Nation. Statistics have been and no doubt will be presented showing the great indirect benefits that will be derived from this treaty. It will no doubt be shown that this treaty will have an indirect effect on farm purchasing power, that it will contribute much toward friendly relations with our neighbor, and that it is a great gesture of confidence and peace in a war-torn world.

No group or class of American citizens will go further or give more to promote peace and security than the farmers of this Nation, but recent world-wide events seem to indicate that world peace cannot be attained by trade agreements. This being the case, the farmers should not be asked to pay this price. I hope this committee will give serious study to the proposed changes before final conclusions are reached.

There are several items listed in the proposed schedule that are of vital concern to every farmer in the United States—tallow, casein, oleo, oil, beef and veal, hides, cheese, eggs, turkeys, alfalfa seed, and corn.

The Secretary, in his release of August 23 (No. 338A), mentioned specifically that the list did not include fresh, frozen, or chilled meats. This is most gratifying, as every livestock producer is greatly concerned over abrogation of the sanitary agreement between Argentina and the United States. It is my intention to discuss three items, namely, beef, eggs, and turkeys.

BEEF UNDER THE RECIPROCAL-TRADE AGREEMENTS

The production of cattle and calves ranks first as a source of cash farm income in the United States, amounting to an estimated $909,000,000 in 1938. Though income from cattle is important to farmers in all sections of the country, it is particularly so in the Middle Western States, the Southwestern States, and the Mountain States.

For many years domestic meat packers have been faced with strong foreign competition. This is, of course, harmful to the farmer, as anything which adversely affects the meat-packing industry has a direct effect on the farmer. Thus, imports of meat products reduces the farmer's potential market for cattle by the amount imported. In discussing imports of beef products, the classifications set up by the Tariff Commission will be used. These classifications are: Fresh beef, beef and veal (pickled or cured), and canned beef. Each of these will be discussed separately.

The tariff rate on fresh beef has not been changed by any of the trade agreements concluded thus far. Moreover, the rate will not be altered in the agreement to be negotiated with Argentina. The sanitary embargo imposed on Argentine fresh beef and cattle by the Tariff Act of 1930 is still in force and cannot be changed except by act of Congress or by ratification of the sanitary convention with Argentina by the Senate.

The rate on pickled or cured beef and veal has also escaped altering thus far. This type of beef is, however, included on the list of articles on which the United States will consider granting a concession to Argentina, as it does not come under the sanitary embargo.

The volume of imports of beef and veal, pickled or cured, has been directly tied up with the tariff rate. As will be noted from the table, imports amounted to more than 9,000,000 pounds in 1929. At this time, however, the duty was but 20 percent ad valorem, which amounted to about 2 to 2½ cents a pound. In the Tariff Act of 1930 the duty was raised to 6 cents a pound. The effect on imports was almost immediate. Since 1932 imports have been below 2,000,000 pounds, with the sole exception of 1936.

Volume of imports of beef and veal, pickled or cured

[In pounds]

Year	Total	Argentina	All other countries
1929	9,362,275	3,979,914	5,382,361
1932	813,844	4,314	809,530
1933	657,818	385	657,433
1934	861,866	20,274	841,592
1935	1,466,871	30,683	1,436,188
1936	2,181,185	22,017	2,159,168
1937	1,753,016	74,717	1,678,299
1938	1,559,566	63,866	1,495,700

Source: Foreign Commerce and Navigation of the United States, 1929, 1932-37; office records of the Division of Foreign Trade Statistics, 1938.

Under the authority granted by the Reciprocal Trade Agreement Act, the State Department can reduce a duty 50 percent. In the case of beef and veal, pickled or cured, the duty can be reduced to 3 cents a pound, just a little over what it was in 1929. Another glance at imports in 1929 will indicate what this means to American farmers and workers. Of course, imports may not rise to the 1929 volume, but certainly all indications point to that.

Canned beef, including corned beef, is certain to be the most controversial question discussed in the negotiations. A storm of protest has already been raised against the administration by American livestock producers over this commodity. This was the result of a letter from President Roosevelt to Secretary Hull recommending that the Navy award a contract calling for 48,000 pounds of corned beef to Argentina. In his letter the President said:

"I am impressed with the fact that the price quoted by the Argentine Meat Producers Cooperative is $0.157 per pound, against the lowest bid on an American product of $0.2361. After payment of the duty of $0.06 per pound on Argentine canned beef, the net cost to the Government would be about $0.097 per pound" (New York Times, May 13, 1939).

Argentina, in recent years, has thrived as a result of this wide discrepancy between prices. While imports fell off considerably in 1932, phenomenal increases were made between 1933 and 1937, with only a relatively small decrease in 1938.

Volume of imports of canned beef, including corned beef

[In pounds]

Year	Total	Argentina	Other countries
1929	89,931,947	49,785,434	40,146,513
1932	22,862,125	7,477,481	15,384,644
1933	43,024,989	19,659,546	23,665,443
1934	36,674,372	17,462,280	29,212,092
1935	76,262,515	31,742,847	44,519,668
1936	87,803,509	39,973,136	47,830,373
1937	88,092,351	41,359,582	46,732,769
1938	78,592,092	33,901,697	44,690,395

Source: Foreign Commerce and Navigation of the United States, 1929 and 1932-37; office records of the Division of Foreign Trade Statistics, 1938.

The canning of beef in this country is relatively small compared with other processed beef products. Notwithstanding this, the industry produced 150,000,000 pounds in 1935, with a value of $38,000,000. A reduction of the present duty (6 cents a pound) by the full statutory limit of 50 percent would give Argentina an advantage of 11 cents a pound over American producers. This would mean virtual extinction of the industry in the United States, with the consequent loss to American farmers and workers. It does not seem conceivable that a program dedicated to recovery in the United States should be so warped by its administrators as to include the destruction of an American industry.

EGGS IN THE SHELL AND THE RECIPROCAL-TRADE AGREEMENTS

The production of eggs is one of the most important sources of steady, year-round cash income for the farmer. Nearly every farm produces some eggs. On a large majority of farms they are for home consumption or "pin money," but a considerable number are devoted exclusively to the production of chickens and eggs. This is particularly true in Pennsylvania, New York, Texas, California, and most of the Midwestern States. Whether done on a national scale or a neighborhood one, foreign trade affects every farmer who produces eggs through its influence on price.

In 1929 the United States exported over 12,000,000 dozens of eggs. By 1938, exports had declined to a little over 2,000,000 dozens. Is there any explanation of this? A partial one may be the fact that until the revised Canadian agreement, which did not go into effect until January 1, 1939, the State Department had not obtained one single concession on eggs, although four of the agreement countries are important outlets for American eggs. Apparently the importance of this industry to nearly every farm family was overlooked by the State Department.

Volume of exports of eggs in the shell

	Dozens
1929	12,074,830
1932	2,319,039
1933	1,866,402
1934	1,927,703
1935	1,811,687
1936	2,097,986
1937	2,376,421
1938	2,092,419

Source: Foreign Commerce and Navigation of the United States, 1929 and 1932-37; Monthly Summary of Foreign Commerce, 1938.

The import side of the picture is similar in one respect—that of granting concessions. The United States did not grant a concession until the revised Canadian agreement, and in that agreement the duty was reduced the full statutory limit of 50 percent. Thus, the only course open in the case of Argentina is to bind a rate which Argentina has already received the benefits of under the most-favored-nation policy.

In 1929, imports of eggs amounted to 308,000 dozens. By 1937, imports had increased to 520,000 dozens. In 1938, however, there was a rather sharp decline. The figures thus far available for 1939 are, however, quite revealing. Imports of eggs amounted to 127,000 dozens in the first 7 months of 1938. At 7 months' end in 1939, however, imports had risen to 183,000 dozens, or an increase of 44.2 percent.

Volume of imports of eggs in the shell

	Dozens
1929	307,912
1932	243,784
1933	250,320
1934	196,843
1935	432,076
1936	345,762
1937	520,189
1938	231,784
1938 (7 months)	127,241
1939 (7 months)	183,447

Source: Foreign commerce and navigation of the United States, 1929 and 1932-37; monthly summary of foreign commerce, December 1938 and July 1938 and 1939.

The lowering of the duty on eggs was opposed by farm groups all over the country. The pleas were disregarded by the State Department, however, and the effects will be felt by every farm family in the country.

TURKEYS UNDER THE RECIPROCAL-TRADE AGREEMENTS

Until recent years the production of turkeys had been a small part of regular farm enterprise. Today, however, turkeys have become an important source of cash income for farmers, and are now referred to as a $50,000,000 industry. Rough estimates indicate that there will be an increase of nearly 58,000,000 pounds in dressed turkeys marketed this year as compared with 1938. This increase amounts to approximately 12 percent of last November's dressed beef and veal consumption on a federally inspected basis.

Increased production came as a direct result of experimentation by raisers. The success of commercial hatcheries and raising turkeys in confinement made large-scale production possible. In 1929 production stood at 16,749,000 birds, and by 1936 total production had risen to 20,000,000 birds. With the increase in production came the problem of marketing. As stated in the Agricultural Situation for November 1, 1937: "* * * Production problems have been more or less solved, but much remains to be done to improve marketing methods."

The marketing problem of an industry is no less time consuming than the production problem. To be worked out satisfactorily requires full cooperation on the part of all governmental agencies. Such cooperation has been received from the Department of Agriculture, but the State Department has not only failed to cooperate but has actually hindered the solution of the problem. In the first Canadian agreement the duty on live turkeys was reduced from 8 cents a pound to 4 cents a pound.

The effect of this reduction was almost immediate. From 1935, the last year under the old rate, to 1936, the first year under the new rate, imports from Canada increased more than 4 times. By 1938 Canadian exports of turkeys to the United States were 22 times greater than exports in 1935.

Volume of imports of live turkeys

[In pounds]

Years	Total	Canada	All other
1935	6,234	6,133	101
1936	29,808	25,191	4,617
1937	58,728	44,840	13,888
1938	148,360	135,503	12,857

Source: Foreign Commerce and Navigation, 1935-37; office records of the Division of Foreign Trade Statistics, 1938.

It will be pointed out by many that, in spite of the tremendous increases, imports are still a small percentage of domestic production. Others, however, are more concerned about the trend in imports. Faced with the obvious fact that continuation of the trend indicated by imports in the first 2 years of the agreement would spell severe hardship to turkey raisers in this country, the State Department did nothing to arrest this trend when the Canadian agreement came up for revision. On the contrary, they actually encouraged and sanctioned it by binding the 4-cent rate for the life of the agreement.

A new danger to the producers of turkeys now looms. In the notice of intention to negotiate an agreement with Argentina, dead turkeys, dressed or undressed, were included in the list of products on which the United States will consider granting a concession to Argentina. Such a concession would be extremely valuable to Argentine producers and very harmful to American producers. Since 1931, the first complete year for which statistics are available, Argentina has been the most important source of American imports of dead turkeys, with the sole exception of the year 1937. The volume of imports has varied considerably since 1931. Since 1934, however, the United States has imported between 250,000 and 300,000 pounds every year except 1936, when 554,000 pounds were imported.

Volume of imports of dead turkeys, dressed or undressed

[In pounds]

Year	Total	Argentina	Other countries
1931	5,298,994	4,321,742	977,252
1932	475,358	252,728	222,630
1933	307,147	302,366	4,781
1934	294,212	286,485	7,727
1935	249,994	179,607	70,387
1936	544,448	418,771	125,677
1937	269,393	12,789	256,604
1938	280,004	136,825	143,179

Source: Foreign Commerce and Navigation, 1931–37; office records of the Division of Foreign Trade Statistics, 1938.

The irregularity of imports, as demonstrated by the above table, would indicate that imports were made to take advantage of special price and demand situations. Thus, the rise in imports in 1936 may be attributed to the drought and the consequent small cold-storage holdings in 1936. In 1937, on the other hand, cold-storage holdings were the highest in history, which had a very deflationary effect on prices. It is not surprising, therefore, that imports from Argentina suffered a severe decline and that of the total imports over 162,000 pounds were special imports which entered free of duty. By 1938, cold-storage holdings had been reduced by more than a third, and imports promptly picked up. Imports from Argentina increased from 13,000 pounds to 137,000 pounds, and of the total imports only 88,000 entered free.

The effect of lowering the duty (now 10 cents a pound) on dead turkeys would be to increase the margin in which Argentine producers could operate. As an example, if under the old rate Argentina could enter the market profitably only when the American selling price was above 25 cents a pound, a reduction of the duty to 5 cents a pound would enable her to enter the market if the price should fall to 20 cents a pound. This has a decided deflationary effect on the price received by American farmers for their turkeys. Thus, American producers would be forced to share an increase in American demand with Argentine producers.

The recent growth of the turkey industry in the United States and its new importance as a source of cash income to the farmers would seem to dictate a hands-off policy on tariff matters pending the final solution of the marketing problem. Any additional interference with the natural play of domestic supply and demand would postpone any effective solution indefinitely.

CONCLUSION

A thorough study of the items in the proposed trade-agreement list leads me to the conclusion that reduction or concessions should not be made on direct competitive agricultural commodities with Argentina. Any reduction will be reflected in the farm income and the present income and economic condition of the farmer is already far below parity. The farmers of this Nation are the greatest potential buying power in our country and their market must be protected. I want to vigorously protest the consummation of this trade agreement.

Thank you.

Toward a Federal World

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. SOL BLOOM

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, October 16, 1939

ADDRESS OF DR. NICHOLAS MURRAY BUTLER, PRESIDENT OF COLUMBIA UNIVERSITY, DELIVERED AT THE PARRISH ART MUSEUM, SOUTHAMPTON, LONG ISLAND, N. Y., SEPTEMBER 3, 1939

Mr. BLOOM. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address by Dr. Nicholas Murray Butler at the Parrish Art Museum, Southampton, Long Island, N. Y., September 3, 1939:

This year of grace marks the one hundred and fiftieth anniversary both of the French Revolution and of the organization of the Government of the United States under the Federal Constitution. It is, therefore, an anniversary of commanding importance in the history of man's attempt to arrive at a form of government which shall be both effective and just.

It is not generally realized that the Government of these United States, which came formally into existence a century and a half ago, is now the oldest of all the governments existing in the world. It is the only one which has not been changed in essential principles or revolutionized during the past century and a half. This fact is, of itself, a tribute to the wisdom and the foresight of those whom we so gladly call the founding fathers. On the continent of Europe every government which has not been wholly made over since the World War came into being in its present form only after the Napoleonic wars or, as in the case of France, after the Franco-Prussian War of 1870–71. The Government of Great Britain, responding to the pressure of the steadily growing liberal movement during the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries, was substantially changed, both as to its center of gravity and as to its governmental procedure, following the reform bill of 1832, the Parliamentary Representation Act of 1867, and the Parliament Act of 1911. The last-named act gave the relations between the House of Commons and the House of Lords their present form. Still later, in 1931, the Statute of Westminster, an act of the greatest importance in the history of constitutional government and public law, brought into existence the British Commonwealth of Nations as now constituted. This act applied the federal principle to legislatively independent members of a great empire scattered all around the world. The governments of the Central American and South American peoples are all younger than the Government of the United States. The governments on the continents of Africa and of Asia have been and still are in a constant state of flux, and it remains to be seen what their more permanent form is to be.

When the Federal Constitution had been agreed upon by the Philadelphia Convention on September 17, 1787, and submitted to each of the 13 independent and sovereign States for their consideration and hoped-for ratification, Benjamin Franklin, most far-seeing of men, wrote these words to Monsieur Grand, a friend in France, under date of October 22, 1787, sending him at the same time a copy of the proposed new Federal Constitution for the American States:

"If it succeeds, I do not see why you might not in Europe carry the project of good Henry the Fourth into execution, by forming a federal union and one grand republic of all its different states and kingdoms, by means of a like convention, for we had many interests to reconcile."

It would seem plain, therefore, that those men who planned with so much wisdom and so much foresight the Constitution of the United States felt that they were dealing with forces and ideals which might well be not only American but world-wide. They were the very opposite of isolationists.

Something of the same sort characterized the chief spokesmen of the French Revolution. They, too, believed that they were building not for France alone but for all Europe. The quick outburst of reaction which marked the 20 years of the rule of Napoleon Bonaparte pushed any such hope and ambition far into the background.

As a result of these happenings of 150 years ago and their influence, the civilized world seemed far on the way toward becoming a world in which the principles of democracy ruled and would express themselves either in the form of a democratic monarchy, as in Great Britain, Belgium, the Netherlands and the Scandinavian countries, or in that of a democratic republic, as in the United States, France, and Switzerland. In almost every other country of the world, even in Germany and in Russia, there were clear signs that the principles of liberalism were, in one form or another, finding steadily increasing expression and influence.

When the Great War came a quarter century ago, it was quickly interpreted by the President of the United States as fundamentally a contest between democratic and anti-democratic principles of government. His famous phrase, a war to make the world safe for democracy, was heard in every land, and was almost universally accepted as both the explanation and the justification of that stupendous struggle. The contradictory and unhappy result is now so obvious as to need no comment. The passions and ambitions which were set loose by that great war have been operating and still operate to do the principles of democracy greater damage than has ever heretofore been inflicted on them from any source. The story of that war is now written large in history. Every single cause for which the Allied Nations fought and for which they made such enormous sacrifices, and which on Armistice day, November 11, 1918, they though had been finally gained, is now seen to have been lost. On the other hand, every cause for which their opponents contended and which was thought to be lost is now clearly seen to have been gained. In short, that great war, with all its terrible sacrifice of life, of the comfort and happiness of tens of millions of human beings, and of the world's savings for generations, was absolutely futile.

What is the lesson to be learned from all this? Surely it is now the clear demonstration of more than a thousand years of nation-building that the doctrine of national sovereignty is both unsound and dangerous. That doctrine can only lead, as it has led, to the notion that each and every established government is a law unto itself and not subject to any limitations or control in its dealings with other governments. Put bluntly, this means that when two of these so-called sovereign governments cannot agree upon any matter which affects them both, then recourse shall be had to force, which is war. Constituted as they are, human beings in control of the administration of governments that claim to be sovereign will be constantly at war, regardless of the loss of life or of property which must always accompany war, whether successful or unsuccessful.

From a situation such as this there are but two paths of escape. The one is universal world domination by a single government. On a larger or a smaller scale, this end has been sought time and time again for fully 3,000 years. Oriental peoples sought it; Alexander the Great sought it; Julius Caesar and his successors at the head of the Roman Empire sought it. Charlemagne would have been glad to seek it, as would Napoleon Bonaparte a thousand years later. The German Reichsfuehrer of today has it plainly in mind. Surely after all these illuminating experiences it ought to be obvious to everyone that the world canot be unified under a single social, economic, and political control. This could not be done when the world was relatively a very simple place, but now that invention and modern science have made it so complicated, as well as so interdependent in its every part, world domination by a single power has become more impossible than ever. The search for world domination, or even for domination over a considerable part of the earth's surface, means and must mean constant and almost continuous war. Different backgrounds of national history, of language, of social and political experience, to say nothing of climate and of the conditions of life, have made any such form of world unification as the ancient empire builders sought a purely imaginary aim. It has and can have no relation to reality.

If, then, sovereignty be denied to governments of any kind, what is it that in last resort should rule and guide the action of men and shape the public policies of the governments which the several nations may from time to time set up? Obviously, it is the moral law.

This moral law is not difficult to understand. Everyone, however great, knows when he is telling the truth, when he is acting in unselfish regard for the welfare of his fellow men and when he is subjugating the gain-seeking or the power-seeking motive to higher and more constructive principles. The practical-minded man will see this. The theoretical person who loves to deal only with words and with the impressions of the moment, may take some time, perhaps a long time, to learn it. Unless it be learned, however, there is no escape from that barbarism which is return to the jungle.

The alternative to the hopeless attempt at universal world domination by a single government is that world-wide application of the federal principle which has already played so influential a part in modern political history and which alone has the power to make it possible for modern man to solve in permanent fashion, through the cooperation of nations, his unbelievably difficult and complicated problems, both economic, social, and political.

The federal principle and its application upon an increasingly large scale have been before the minds of men for hundreds of years. One seer after another and one far-sighted statesman after another have proclaimed and interpreted the federal principle as essential to the peaceful, orderly maintenance and development of civilization. Few declarations of this principle are more significant or more definite than this prophecy written in autograph by Victor Hugo on the wall of the room in the Place des Vosges, Paris, where he died:

"I represent a party which does not yet exist; the party of revolution, civilization. This party will make the twentieth century. There will issue from it first the United States of Europe, then the United States of the World."

This federal principle must not be confused with group or regional alliances between governments for their own aggrandizement, no matter what may happen to the rest of the world. The federal principle, as supremely manifested in the Federal Constitution of the United States and in the Statute of Westminster which created the British Commonwealth of Nations, makes it not only possible but natural for a Vermont, a South Dakota, an Idaho, and a Utah, or for a Newfoundland, a Union of South Africa, and a New Zealand to enter a political partnership upon equal terms with a New York, an Illinois, and a Texas in the one case or with a Canada and an Australia in the other. Under a properly organized federal system the population or the wealth of a political partner gives no advantage in all that is essential to citizenship and to political liberty. The influence of the more populous and the richer peoples will always be dominant or nearly so but that dominance will be exercised under the limitations of the articles of federation. This will involve no injustice and no discrimination against the less populous and the less wealthy members of the federation.

The practical question is, How can this tremendous and crucial problem be lifted from the region of discussion to that of early and definite action? It is plain that the world cannot wait.

One of the lessons which experience teaches is that in large matters of this kind too much must not be attempted at once. The overwhelming majority of men have to be taught, and it takes a long time to teach them. The Federal Government of the United States stands before the whole world as instructor in what the federal principle may accomplish over an enormous area with a huge and varied population. Nevertheless, if the attempt were made to organize the entire world in a satisfactory federation at once, it would probably fail, either wholly or in large part. The differences of background, of inheritance, of experience, and of language might be found too great to permit an effective world-wide federal union at one stroke. The path of progress obviously is to promote the early organization of a world federation which would include, if not all European and Asiatic peoples, then those which are sufficiently self-controlled and like-minded to make a beginning possible. In due time, and after the value of the federal principle had received new illustration, it would become practicable to go a step farther and begin to bring more of the national governments into a still larger union. There is no reason why those states which are called totalitarian should not be included in such a federal union, provided they will cease striving to extend their areas and their control by force and will accept, honestly and completely, the principles upon which such a federal union is built. We need have no concern with the form of government which any independent people adopts for itself if only it keeps its word and respects its international and federal obligations.

There is nothing new about this proposal to extend the federal principle. If mankind had shown itself capable of learning by experience, great progress would have been made centuries ago in developing a world system of federal unions which might easily have become a single world-wide union long before this twentieth century. The story of these attempts and of the measure of success which they severally achieved will be found in very succinct form in the little volume entitled "Federations: A Study in Comparative Politics," written by D. G. Karve, professor of history and economics at Fergusson College, Poona, India, and published 7 years ago. It will surprise many readers of the present day to learn how clearly this idea of federation was in the minds of men almost from the very beginning of political organization. The Dutch Union between the Provinces of the Lowlands, which lasted for more than two centuries, and the Swiss Federation, which is the oldest of all the existing federal states, are particularly rich in opportunity for study. In fact, the Swiss Federation and the United States of America may be regarded as the two most productive research laboratories in which the student and the builder of new federations may best carry on his work.

The history of Switzerland offers abundant material for guidance in dealing with this problem today. That country has many small towns and cities of only moderate size. Its physical formation, with high mountains, deep valleys, and many streams, provides almost compelling invitation to the development of many small communities, living largely in isolation and in independent social and political life. Some two-thirds of the population speak German and most of the remaining one-third speak French, although there is a very considerable number of those whose language is Italian. The population is divided almost equally between Protestants and Catholics, with a greater number of Protestants. These people, so placed and with such diverse backgrounds, have been successful, it would appear, in working out a plan for national unity which is wholly consonant with civil liberty and with local self-government. If the people of Switzerland have been able to achieve this great end, why should not others be able to follow their example and go and do likewise? Switzerland, of course, has passed through its difficult periods. These were in part due to religious strife and in part to the rivalry between urban and rural cantons. But, taken as a whole and looking back over more than 500 years, it is clear that Switzerland has a most important lesson to teach this modern world.

Had the Republic of Czechoslovakia, at the time of its organization in 1919, been based upon the cantonal system, its history during the past 20 years might have been very different and far happier. A Czechoslovakia composed of, say, five Czech cantons, two Slovak cantons, two German cantons, one Polish canton, and one Hungarian canton, following the example of Switzerland, might well have been able to weather the storms which have marked the attempt to give to this splendid people the independent, economic, and political organization which they desire and should have.

In relation to this vitally important matter we have reached a point where the responsibility of the people of the United States is outstanding and imperative. As economic and political theories have developed and found expression in various governments, whether in Europe or in Asia, it has become impossible, at least for some time to come, for any other government than that of the United States to give the leadership for which the world is waiting. Had our American political acts during the past generation been true to our professions, and had the elected representatives of the two great political parties, when in office at Washington, kept the pledges which those parties had made to the American people in one political campaign after another, this world would today have been far on the way toward successful organization to promote prosperity and to preserve peace.

With the exception of the 8 years of Woodrow Wilson's administration, the Republican Party was in power at Washington from 1896 to 1932. Beginning with President McKinley's notable statement, "The period of exclusiveness is past," made at Buffalo, September 5, 1901, the Republican Party made one declaration after another in favor of definite and progressive policies of international cooperation to prevent war. It would be difficult to find a more definite pledge to the people than this which was contained in the Republican national platform of 1920:

"The Republican Party stands for agreement among the nations to preserve the peace of the world. We believe that such an international association must be based upon international justice, and must provide methods which shall maintain the rule of public right by the development of law and the decision of impartial courts, and which shall secure instant and general international conference whenever peace shall be threatened by political action, so that the nations pledged to do and insist upon what is just and fair may exercise their influence and power for the prevention of war.

"We believe that all this can be done without the compromise of national independence, without depriving the people of the United States in advance of the right to determine for themselves what is just and fair when the occasion arises, and without involving them as participants, and not as peacemakers in a multitude of quarrels, the merits of which they are unable to judge."

Even more striking is this extract from a speech delivered by Senator Warren G. Harding at Marion, Ohio, on August 28, 1920, when a candidate for the Presidency. It is probable that it was this speech which insured his election. Here are his words:

"The other type is a society of free nations, or an association of free nations, or a league of free nations, animated by considerations of right and justice instead of might and self-interest, and not merely proclaimed an agency in pursuit of peace, but so organized and so participated in as to make the actual attainment of peace a reasonable possibility. Such an association I favor with all my heart, and I would make no fine distinction as to whom credit is due. One need not care what it is called. Let it be an association, a society, or a league, or what not, our concern is solely with the substance, not the form thereof."

The Republican national platforms of 1924, 1928, and 1932 contained like declarations, varying somewhat in language, but essentially one and the same. What was done by the Republican Senators and Representatives to keep those solemn pledges to the American people in reference to all which concerned their highest interests?

The record of the Democratic Party is similar. Quite apart from the vision and the influence of Woodrow Wilson, here is the language used by Gov. James M. Cox at Dayton, Ohio, on August 7, 1920, when candidate for the Presidency in opposition to Senator Harding:

"Organized government has a definite duty all over the world. The house of civilization is to be put in order. The supreme issue of the century is before us, and the nation that halts and delays is playing with fire. The finest impulses of humanity, rising above national lines, merely seek to make another horrible war impossible."

Four years later, on August 11, 1924, the Democratic candidate for the Presidency, John W. Davis, spoke these words at Clarksburg, W. Va.:

"We favor the World Court in sincerity. * * * We wish to see America as a nation play her part in that reconstruction of the economic life of Europe which has proven itself so indispensable to our well-being and prosperity."

The Democratic national platforms of 1928 and of 1932 reflected the same point of view and recorded the same purpose.

Why is it, then, that nothing has been done? What has become of responsible government in a democracy if those great ends which the people have been asked to support, and which they have so earnestly supported, are left to die by parliamentary ineptitude and parliamentary cowardice? What wonder is it that the dictators point with scorn to what they describe as the inefficiency and the uselessness of democracy? It must be evident that democracy is only playing into the hands of the dictators when it writes for itself a record such as this. Surely every public interest of the American people, whether moral, economic, or political, calls for their quick leadership in organizing what in President Harding's words may be an association, a society, a league, or what not, of nations, to take over the solution of the world's grave and most disturbing problems.

Let me once again call attention to the amazing resolution which passed both Houses of Congress in June 1910, without a single dissenting vote, and which must remain a high-water mark in the record of the professions, at least of the American people:

"Resolved, That a commission of five members be appointed by the President of the United States to consider the expediency of utilizing existing international agencies for the purpose of limiting the armaments of the nations of the world by international agreement, and of constituting the combined navies of the world an international force for the preservation of universal peace, and to consider and report upon any other means to diminish the expenditures of government for military purposes and to lessen the probabilities of war."

What I am pointing out is that nothing remains to be said on behalf of the United States in respect to this greatest of all problems. What remains is to do something. It is for public opinion to compel Members of the legislative branch of the Federal Government to keep the pledges which their several parties have made to the American people.

One has only to lift his eyes from the ground to see that the path which our Government should quickly follow lies open before it. The Permanent Court of International Justice, at The Hague, originally brought into being by the leadership of the American Government, will naturally be the judicial branch and organ of a newly organized or reorganized family or society of nations. The League of Nations at Geneva is the natural point of beginning for that reorganization and readjustment which the past 20 years have shown to be essential in order that it may become the consultative and legislative center of that form of federal union or grouping of nations which has simply got to come into being. The reorganization of the League of Nations must be such as to separate it completely from the Treaty of Versailles and from any unqualified defense of the status quo in Europe.

The lesson taught by the League of Nations since its history began is that it was without the power to provide an effective police force to preserve order in the world out upon which it looked. Even the most law-abiding of peoples require a trained and ready police to meet those emergencies which no one can foresee and which, if not met, become invitations to new disorder and new crime. The resolution of the Congress of the United States passed in June 1910 clearly grasped this fact and presented it to our country and to the world. That fact remains as fundamental and as incontrovertible today as it was then.

If the Government of the United States has the good faith and the courage to go forward with this leadership, it will find that the very first problems to be solved are monetary and economic. Peace of mind and prosperity cannot be restored to the world until the uncertainties and perplexities which now attach to monetary matters and to trade relations are constructively dealt with. The world does not thrive through international speculation in money. It will thrive if there be established an international monetary standard as definite as the meter and the kilogram. The constant shipment of gold from one country to another and the present accumulation of some 60 percent of the world's gold in solitary confinement in the United States are simply a joke. They mark complete incapacity to deal with one of the most pressing problems which the world offers—failure to solve which is a steady temptation to international friction and international ill will.

Much light will be thrown upon the whole problem of building an international stabilized monetary system by study of the history of the Latin Monetary Union, established in 1865 through the cooperation of France, Belgium, Switzerland, Italy, and Greece. This union lasted for some 60 years. The causes of its discontinuance are as illuminating as are those which led to its organization.

Together with the establishment of a fixed international monetary standard, international trade relationships must be dealt with, and promptly. The spread of violent and predatory economic nationalism is certainly the chief cause of the economic depression which holds the whole world in its grip. Indeed, this has come down from economic nationalism to economic localism to such an extent that one would suppose it to be wrong to buy anything whatever not produced by the community in which one lives. Even the States of the American Union are, in flat violation of the provisions of the Federal Constitution, finding ways to levy taxes which are, in effect, taxes on imports from other States. The fact that these are taxes on imports is concealed by their form, but they are nonetheless the forbidden import taxes. They are as harmful and as dangerous as they are anticonstitutional. Unless this practice be promptly stopped by court action or legislative discontinuance, the Federal system in the United States will receive a severe and wholly unexpected blow.

On the other hand, compacts between the States, which are permitted by the Federal Constitution provided they have the approval of the Congress, are increasing in number and are exceedingly helpful. These compacts prove once more the elasticity of a properly organized federal system. Since 1935, 36 States, beginning with New Jersey, have set up permanent commissions for interstate cooperation. Some of the more important compacts now in effective operation are those which established the Port of New York Authority, Colorado River control, jurisdiction over Oregon-Washington fisheries, the Palisades Park agreement, and the New York-Vermont bridge agreement. It may well be that in the United States this movement within the framework of the Federal Constitution will grow steadily in significance and usefulness.

For 5 years past, Secretary Hull and his associates in the Department of State have been patiently and persuasively at work reducing the trade barriers which so grievously affect American industry, transportation, and commerce. While much has been done, much more yet remains to be done, and through an organized society of nations, established in conformity with those sound federal principles which would be applicable to a world-wide situation, genuine and rapid progress might well be made. The gain to the people of the United States would be very great.

In addition to the monetary problem and the problem of trade relationships, there are a thousand and one questions of world-wide importance to be constructively dealt with through a federal organization of nations. These affect education and philanthropy, standards of living, social security and protection against dependent old age, the conditions and rewards of manual labor, the public health, and many other like topics which call for and must have, not isolated and contradictory, but centralized and uniform treatment. Strong appeal will be made to public opinion everywhere by all that concerns improvement in the standard of living of the mass of any of the world's populations. This improvement is essential to the steady and forward-facing development of international trade relations. It must never be forgotten, however, that it is very misleading to judge the standard of living in terms merely of monetary wage or salary. A wage or salary of $50 a day is very inadequate if the daily cost of living be $49.50. On the other hand, a salary of $5 a day might be very comfortable if the cost of living were $2.50 a day. Monetary wages or salary alone have no significance. They must always be judged in terms of and in comparison with the cost of living. Quite as important as the monetary compensation of the worker are his housing and his physical comfort and health. Literally enormous progress has been making in respect to these questions all over the world. In the large cities of the United States, in Great Britain, in Berlin, in Vienna, and in Italy, the housing problem has been advanced toward solution by leaps and bounds. No doubt a great deal remains to be done, but men have learned now how to do it.

In approaching all the pressing international problems which deal with money and with trade, the world of today could have no better guidance than that given by Alexander Hamilton in his epoch marking Papers on Public Credit, Commerce, and Finance, written while Secretary of the Treasury of the United States in 1790, 1791, and 1795. Hamilton saw clearly the ways in which public credit and manufactures might be most wisely and most helpfully built up, as well as the ways in which they might be harmed by undue Government interference and control. The wisdom of those great public papers is as pronounced today as when they were written. Nothing could be more contrary to fact than to cite Hamilton as the creator or, indeed, as even a defender of the present system of excessively high protective tariffs, which are one of the chief manifestations of that economic nationalism which is wrecking the prosperity of the world and day by day endangering its peace. Why the United States should become a manufacturing Nation and how it might become so were plainly demonstrated by Hamilton, but in terms of the freest possible trade for the various obvious reasons which he was careful to set out in detail. It is no exaggeration to say that if the world could produce another Alexander Hamilton, with the vision, the knowledge, and the persuasive eloquence to do for it what Hamilton did for the American people a century and a half ago, some, at least, of the world's troubles would be at an end.

When one observes those troubles and reflects upon them and their obvious causes, he is tempted to ask whether perhaps modern man has not grown tired of civilization and become bored by it. There are not a few happenings which would lead one to think so. We are surrounded in every land by clamorous and vigorous radicals who have no knowledge of the past and whose only concern for the future is that it shall be as different as possible from the present. All radicals are reactionaries. Their aim is to tear up everything by the roots; to destroy all that has been done and to begin everything all over again. Such a program is as unintelligent and as unpractical as it is dangerous.

A liberal is just the opposite of a radical. A liberal is one who builds upon the foundation of what has been accomplished through the centuries in a growing and widening and deepening civilization, and who goes forward in an open-minded, constructive spirit to guide the development of all this so that it will serve man's highest and finest needs and ideals, and be kept in conformity with changing facts and new needs.

There is every sign that if the world is to be turned over to the radicals it will for an indefinite period be a regimented and government-controlled world, ruled by force, either economic or military, or both. If the liberal is to rule, then the world will be one of steady progress toward carrying economic, social, and political liberty forward to a still higher plane of excellence and practical human service. Man's highest and finest needs and ideals would then be recognized and, so far as human power goes, met. The choice of today, which will determine the character of the world of tomorrow, is between the radical and the liberal.

An evidence that even a wise man does not always see the end of things is found in the title of a volume by the distinguished English historian, Edward A. Freeman. The full title of that work reads: History of Federal Government From the Foundation of the Achaian League to the Disruption of the United States, Volume I. Needless to say, this work was published in 1863, when the American Civil War was at its height. Volume II never appeared.

May it not perhaps be that the failure which now seems to have attended all the recent noble projects for a federal world is not as complete as radical observers would have us believe, and that volume II of their history of that failure will never be written?

A Protest Against Looters of Polish Assets

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EMANUEL CELLER

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, October 16, 1939

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include a release I recently issued pointing out the responsibility of Germany and Russia for Poland's debts to the United States and to American investors.

The rape of Poland by the combined Nazi-Soviet forces and the division of the loot between the two aggressors raises the question as to what is to become of the funds which many Americans have invested in the bonds of the Polish Government and the Polish political subdivisions. Exclusive of the amount which Poland is understood to have repatriated, there are outstanding close to $100,000,000 par value of bonds of the Polish Government, the Province of Silesia, and the city of Warsaw. It would seem that, in accordance with the provisions of international law, these obligations should be assumed by the invaders. However, unfortunately, both Germany and Russia are notorious defaulters, having repudiated virtually all contractual commitments.

It will be recalled that following the invasion and seizure of Austria by the armed forces of the Reich, our State Department called the attention of Germany to the responsibility which she would be expected to assume for the debts contracted on behalf of and by the Republic of Austria. Needless to say, the protests proved of no avail. Nevertheless, I believe that we should, merely for the sake of the record, remind both Germany and Russia of their duties toward Poland's American creditors, at least for the period during which they remain in possession of the assets of Poland which originally served as security for the obligations contracted by that country.

In addition, there is owing to the United States Government by the Republic of Poland some $180,000,000, exclusive of accrued interest, in connection with purchases made by Poland in the early days of her existence as an independent nation from the War and Navy Departments, the American Relief Administration, the United States Grain Corporation, and for services rendered by the United States Shipping Board.

Although we are fairly sure of what Germany's reply is going to be because of experiences that we have had with that country on previous occasions in matters of a similar character, it would be of interest to learn of Stalin's attitude.

I presume the State Department will do everything to protect the rights of our Government and our nationals.

America's Neutrality

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOSH LEE

OF OKLAHOMA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, October 18 (legislative day of Wednesday, October 4), 1939

RADIO ADDRESS BY HON. JOSH LEE, OF OKLAHOMA

Mr. LEE. Mr. President, as I do not plan to debate the question of neutrality on the floor of the Senate, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a radio address which I delivered on October 17, in order that my position may be a matter of record.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Ladies and gentlemen of the air, the question before the United States Senate today is not a question of whether or not we shall have war. The question is not war or peace. If it were, we would all be arguing on the same side—for peace. There would be no division. The question is one of judgment as to how we can best safeguard the peace and security of the United States.

Perhaps no President in the history of our country has steered a straighter course toward peace than Franklin D. Roosevelt. Perhaps no man living today has a better grasp of world affairs than he.

During the last session of Congress he warned us of the eminence of war and asked for repeal of the embargo so that the economic forces of America would be thrown into the balance against war. But his recommendation in that regard was not followed.

Time, however, has certainly vindicated his judgment as against the judgment of those who only last summer pooh-hooed the idea of war and assured the American people there was not going to be any war.

HISTORY OF NEUTRALITY LEGISLATION

The first neutrality bill was passed in 1935. As is true with almost every new law, it has been necessary to make certain changes in it. Consequently, we revised it in 1936. We revised it again in 1937; and now the development of circumstances makes it necessary to revise it again.

STRENGTHENS NEUTRALITY

I favor this revised neutrality bill because it has more safeguards for keeping America out of war than the present law. The revised neutrality bill, or the Pittman bill, which it might well be called, does not repeal our neutrality legislation. On the contrary, by mandatory provisions it vitally strengthens it.

For example, under the present law our ships may carry all of the most dangerous kinds of war materials except arms, ammunition, and implements of war. At present our ships are permitted to carry to belligerents scrap iron, steel, oil, gasoline, cotton, and many other raw materials which have been described by Germany as contraband of war.

This means that every time an American ship loaded with any of these materials leaves the port it is jeopardizing American peace.

It means that every time any ship leaves any port carrying any of these materials belonging to American citizens it is jeopardizing American peace. But under the Pittman neutrality bill this danger to American peace is removed by the title-and-carry provision.

The revised neutrality bill strengthens our neutrality law in almost every particular. Therefore, I maintain that it will more effectively safeguard American peace.

THE EMBARGO PROVISION

The only remaining issue is whether or not we should repeal the embargo on arms, ammunition, and implements of war. The original purpose for placing an embargo on these materials was to prevent our being drawn into war because of the submarining of our ships carrying these materials. But let me call your attention to the fact that belligerents today would just as quickly submarine a ship carrying gasoline or any other of a long list of war materials as it would one carrying rifles. Therefore, to limit our embargo simply to arms, ammunition, and implements of war will not carry out the purpose for which the law was originally passed.

But by removing the embargo and substituting for it the title-and-carry provisions of the revised neutrality bill we will much more effectively carry out the original purpose of the law.

EMBARGO FAVORS AGGRESSORS

I favor the repeal of the embargo because it works a distinct disadvantage to peaceful nations by preventing them from securing weapons to defend themselves against aggression.

Under the law as it now stands, aggressor nations may purchase in times of peace all of the war materials they wish and store them up ready for the day when they wish to strike an unsuspecting, peaceful nation. But the day those aggressor nations start a war against the peaceful nations, the law goes into effect and prohibits those peaceful nations from securing weapons to defend themselves against that aggression.

In the case of the present war, Germany has been preparing for this war for years. She has been purchasing such materials as she needed for a war of aggression. She has purchased materials from the United States and forged them into one of the greatest war machines of modern times. Today her arsenals are stacked full of rifles, cannons, tanks, warplanes, and all manner of war paraphernalia.

But in the meantime her neighbors who have been swept with a peace wave have not prepared themselves for war. For example, during the administration of Ramsay MacDonald, under his policy of "hands across the sea," England allowed her national defense to go down to perhaps the lowest point in English history. While France kept up her army, yet she allowed her air defense to fall to a low ebb.

Then one day, Germany feeling that she had sufficient war materials on hand to accomplish her diabolical scheme, started the war machine moving. England and France were pledged to help Poland maintain her independence, and thus Germany by an act of aggression forced France and England into a war for which they were not prepared. And, mark you, the guns that opened war on Poland closed at the same time to France, England, and Poland the munition plants of the United States and thus shut off that source of supply for weapons of defense.

Therefore, I maintain that this embargo which was passed in good faith works oppositely to what was intended. We intended to throw the weight of America against wars of aggression. I do not believe the people of the United States want the economic forces of this country used to give advantage to aggressor nations. I believe our people are so opposed to war that it is not our intention or our purpose to favor by our economic policy those nations who deliberately plan and perpetrate war upon peaceful nations. We hate war, and we do not propose to aid and abet those who make war. This embargo law was passed with the hope of promoting peace, but it is actually working today to the advantage of those who promote war. Therefore I believe it should be immediately repealed.

STRENGTHENS OUR NATIONAL DEFENSE

Then, again, I favor repeal of the arms embargo because its repeal would strengthen our national defense. It would place our factories on a mass-production basis and thereby make available war materials for our own use in case we should need them.

When we entered the World War our program called for 25,000 American-made planes. Twenty thousand were to be on the front by January 1918. But General Pershing attests the record that not one American-made plane ever reached the front. Although we were in the war for a year and a half, we were not able in that time to adjust our factories to the manufacture of war planes. The result was we had to beg, borrow, and buy such planes as we could get from the Allies. Naturally they used the best for themselves, and the ones we were able to secure were the less efficient, more out-of-date ones. The result was that the casualties among the American fliers were three times as great as those among the Allies. When an American pilot took off, death rode in the cockpit with him in those "flaming coffins," as Colonel Mitchell called them. I believe we should profit by that mistake and repeal the arms embargo in order that our factories might increase their production capacity.

If France and England together had been able to produce as many planes as Germany in September of 1938, there never would have been a Munich. If England's plant capacity for turning out war planes had been equal to that of Germany, Hitler never would have crossed the Polish border, and there would be peace in Europe today.

Therefore, in our consideration of methods of safeguarding the peace and security of America, it is just as important that we look to our national defense as it is that we preserve a strict neutrality. Just here, let me quote in part from a speech I made on the floor of the Senate last February in support of a bill to increase America's defense in the air. I quote:

"Now we come asking for the barest possible increase in our aviation, one that would not put us on a parity with other nations. We are taking full recognition of the natural protection the two seas give us; we are making full allowance for the natural protection that America has by virtue of our location between two oceans. * * *

"* * * The War Department has recommended the smallest possible number of planes necessary for our defense. They will be ample only with one provision, and that is that our factories shall be allowed to sell enough planes to foreign countries so that the factories may be placed on a mass-production basis, so that the mistake of 1918 will not be repeated. Obviously we shall need fewer planes actually in the air if we can get more when we need them, and get them in a hurry."

I am convinced that that is even truer today than it was last February.

The isolationists base their entire argument on the presumption that if we attend to our own business we will never have war. But I submit to you that weakness invites attack and results in war without provocation.

For example, did Ethiopia bring war on herself by meddling into the affairs of other nations? Certainly not. China's only crime was that she did not have adequate national defense. Poland's only crime was that she and her allies were not prepared to repel the German attack.

When dictators decide to make war, their decision is based upon only one question, and that is whether or not they are able to destroy the other nation. The arguments which prevailed at Munich were the comparative number of war planes of the contending nations. The only language dictators understand is spoken from the mouths of cannons with tongues of fire. Therefore, I favor enlarging the capacity of our factories and thereby strengthening our guaranty of peace.

Colonel Lindbergh in his last speech made a statement with which I am in hearty accord. I quote: "This Western Hemisphere," he said, "is our domain. It is our right to trade freely within it. From Alaska to Labrador, from the Hawaiian Islands to Bermuda, from Canada to South America we must allow no invading army to set foot. These are the outposts of the United States. They form the essential outline of our geographical defense. We must be ready to wage war with all the resources of our Nation if they are ever seriously threatened."

But I would like to ask Colonel Lindbergh, How are we going to be ready to wage war with all the resources of our Nation if our factories are closed down by an embargo on arms? In this day of swift-moving mechanized armies, I do not wish to have America left at the mercy of the war machines of dictators during the long months it would take for our factories to gear themselves to mass production.

The Monroe Doctrine is no stronger than the military forces that support it. Therefore, I believe we should follow a policy which, as George Washington said, will place the United States in a respectable posture of defense, and by following such a policy I firmly believe that we shall be able to keep the United States out of war.

I thank you.

Mobilization for Peace

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ALEXANDER WILEY
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, October 18 (legislative day of Wednesday, October 4), 1939

RADIO ADDRESS BY HON. ALEXANDER WILEY, OF WISCONSIN

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an address delivered by me over the Columbia Broadcasting System on the evening of October 17, on the subject Mobilization for Peace.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The debate in the Senate of the United States in relation to the so-called neutrality issue is nearly over. Tonight I want to briefly review the main contentions on both sides of this question. When the debate started it was evident that a large number of the people in this country had reached the conclusion that the present law should not be changed. Let me remind you that the present law provides for an embargo on munitions and the implements of war, but permits the sale of all other merchandise to belligerents and permits such merchandise to be sold on credit and transported in American bottoms through the war zone.

I believe now practically everyone in America agrees that certain features at least of the new bill are wise and should be passed. I refer to the following:

1. The requirement that all goods sold to the belligerents must be sold for cash.

2. The belligerents must take title to the same in this country and transport the same in their own ships.

3. No American ships shall traverse the so-called war zones and no American citizen shall travel on belligerent ships.

The features of the new bill which are most in debate are: (1) The repeal of the embargo; (2) the too stringent restriction on American shipping. A third debatable point, the 90-day credit clause, will be taken out of the bill.

The most discussed subject, of course, is the retention or the repeal of the Embargo Act.

It is contended by one side that the retention of the embargo will be conducive to peace, but the same contention for repeal is made by the other side.

Those who do not desire the repeal say it will be the first step in a direction which will lead to expanded credit, opening the doors of this country for Government loans to England and France, resulting in a boom, which will be especially detrimental to American economy after the European war ceases.

The other side who favor the repeal say there is no validity to this contention, since only 13 percent—if we take the same average that obtained in the World War—of the total sales to England and France will be for munitions and implements of war and 87 percent will be for other merchandise. They say that if you do not repeal the embargo you will have the same demand for credit and for placement of bonds and the same conditions which will produce the wartime boom. They claim that the 87 percent will grow to a probable 100 percent for materials, much of which go into the manufacture of munitions and implements of war.

I claim that the answer to wartime boom and profits may be found in limiting overexpansion of plants and in building up our domestic trade and in building up our trade with neutrals.

It is admitted by all contenders that the present act, as it now operates, benefits Germany and, if repealed, the act would operate to benefit England and France. It is contened on one side that it is against international law to change the partial embargo act after the war has started. The other side states that there is nothing to this contention; that America has the right to change its own laws, especially as all the nations of the earth were put on notice by the President and by the pending bill in Congress. One side contends that it is immoral to manufacture and sell arms and implements of war to be used to kill people. The other side replies that if it is immoral to sell arms now, then it is immoral to sell them before war starts, and that to fail to repeal the embargo now puts a premium on aggression, "sharpening the fangs of the wolf and fleecing the wool from the sheep." "Morality is determined by purpose of sale," they say.

In the discussion the word "isolationist" has been applied to those opposing the pending bill. The fact is the administration's bill is more of an isolationist measure than the present law. Every argument for the maintenance of this present law is built upon the assumption that we got into the last war through the sale of arms and granting credit to the Allies. The exponents for the pending bill move on the theory that we got into the World War because American lives were lost and our ships were sunk contrary to the rights of neutrals and contrary to the express promise of the German Government. The German Minister, von Bernstorff, in his book admits that Germany's breach of her agreement with this country and her ruthless sinking of our ships were the immediate cause of our entrance into the war.

On the other hand, anyone who has given study to the situation knows that there were other factors. There was public opinion inflamed over the sinking of the Lusitania. There were almost 3 years of stress. There was the rape of Belgium, and there were the blood ties and religious ties. There were the sympathies of folks whose moral sensibilities were shocked and torn.

I know that for years there has been propaganda to the effect that profits and munitions got us into the war, and that line of thinking had considerable to do with the passing of the present Embargo Act, its main purpose being to stop profits. Yet, as we have said before, it affects only 13 percent of the war trade; 87 percent will be in other materials. If the 13 percent is stopped, it is contended that the 87 percent will have profits and probably will grow to 100 percent.

Again, one side contends that American shipping should not be swept from the seas because a German raider might fire on the Stars and Stripes. They say such a policy is likely to encourage aggression and inspire contempt for the United States. They believe that abandonment of the fundamentally American doctrine of freedom of the seas is tolerable only when accompanied by a repeal of the arms embargo to show that this country has not been terrorized to a point where it will abandon all rights at anyone's dictation. They contend that to put our merchant marine in cold storage while simultaneously refusing to sell arms is not good policy but a sign of weakness.

But now let us look at some of the points on which both sides agree:

Both parties agree that we have nothing to gain and everything to lose by getting involved in Europe's war.

Both parties agree that it is not our job to mix in European disputes or get to meddling in European affairs. Both parties agree that we have enough problems in America to look after, and that if we would put our attention toward the solution of these problems we would be much better off than in trying to solve those of Europe. Both parties agree that alliances financial and economic may be as dangerous to our peace as alliances political, and that Washington's advice has special application at this time. Both parties agree if the European war continues for any length of time we will have to prepare ourselves for the shocks and problems which will arise when Europe's war ceases. Both parties agree that there is grave danger that when the war ceases in Europe democracy there will have been blotted out. Both parties agree that there is a great need for sane and deliberate thinking in America; a great need for taking the scare headlines out of newspapers and taking the emotional defeatist off the radio. Both sides agree that the rest of the world offers an opportunity for the placement of American goods, American concept of fair dealing, and an opportunity for the greatest democracy in the world to demonstrate that it has the power and the ability and the common sense to keep out of war.

The debate has developed a lot of "tangents." One side claims the war in Europe is a war over the balance of power. The other side states that there is more than that involved—that Hitler stands for breach of treaties; that his ideology and the ideology of Stalin run counter to the ideology of democracy found in America, England, and France; that it would be safer and better for the Atlantic to remain an English, French, and American pond than for it to become a Russian and a German pond.

Both sides seem to favor the continuance of a policy of building up our Navy, air force, and Army.

Both sides claim that if their contention is followed, it will shorten the war, and both sides say that if their contention is not followed war will be prolonged. Thus it is contended that if England and France can get munitions and implements of war from us there will not only be a beneficial psychological effect felt throughout the world restraining other nations from joining Stalin and Hitler but that the Allies will then be in a position to defend themselves. The opposition contends that failure to sell munitions and implements of war to the Allies will cause them to be more willing to agree to peace.

One side says a "Hitler peace" now would be only an armistice until all the conquered territory had been organized and fitted into a bigger and better war machine by Hitler and Stalin for the conquering of the rest of Europe. Neither side seems to approve the marriage of Nazi socialism with bolshevism, recognizing the potential bad effect upon America.

I want to state emphatically that there is no need for telling the people that a law passed by Congress will insure America against war. Many partisans in this debate have gone beyond reason in their statement or conclusion, indicating that only if Congress follows their course can we avoid war; only by following what they say can America be secure. We had an embargo in 1812, and we got into the war. We didn't have one in 1917, and we got into the war. In fact, from 1812 to 1935 we didn't have an embargo, and we kept out of all the European conflicts with the exception of the World War. In my opinion, the repeal or the failure to repeal the embargo is not of primary importance as far as war or peace is concerned. After all, what is our great objective? We all agree it is the maintenance of peace in America. A night or so ago over another radio network, I talked on peacetime patriotism; tonight I am asking you to mobilize not for war but for peace.

Tonight let me make a declaration of war—a war on war. Tonight let me advocate not preparations for war but preparations for peace.

As we study the welter of confused and jumbled war reports, one salient fact is inescapable. All Europe has drawn the tattered shreds of its economy together in a mobilization for war. Defunct industries have been brought to life, dying industries have been put on their feet, and frozen funds, congealed by economic disorders, have been warmed by an intense nationalism and shot back into the economic blood stream.

In short, the world has again witnessed the phenomenon of an entombed economy, led from its sepulchre to respond lustily, but not wisely to the bugle call.

If these miracles can be accomplished by war, what can we not accomplish by peace? If every human energy can be mobilized arbitrarily for war, why cannot every human energy be mobilized against war?

Do not misunderstand me. I am not advocating war as a cure-all for economic disorders. In fact, I am strongly opposed to any economic stimulant caused by war, because it leaves the patient infinitely worse than he was before the treatment began.

What I am advocating is a voluntary peacetime mobilization against war. If other countries can make these tremendous sacrifices for war, what sacrifices can America make to keep at peace? Our tremendous mail proves that America is eager to make any sacrifice to keep out of war.

Let us then mobilize against war—wage a relentless war on war itself.

We will find that while we are warring on war we will accomplish other constructive purposes, rebuilding the morale and spirit of our people.

First of all, let me repeat that the importance of the outcome of the embargo debate must not be overemphasized. Let us realize that regardless of what happens in this debate, America will not go to war. One side of the debate must lose. I do not want that side to believe that America must then prepare for war. I want all America fiercely determined that whatever happens to this debate, we will still be at peace. If America is so determined, she will be at peace.

Second, let us, instead of a war college, create a peace college to plan ahead—to plan on keeping American economy on an even keel—to coordinate Federal relief and other Government agencies so that they can meet the challenge which will come when the war boom dies down and normal economy takes over.

Third, let us give some intelligent direction—not regimentation—toward guiding and curtailing the unbridled expansion in wheat raising, in sheep raising, and in any other abnormally expanded market, that cannot be reconciled with peacetime needs.

Fourth, let us not be unduly swayed by incidents. We didn't go to war when the Japanese sunk the Panay. England didn't go to war when her ambassador was machine-gunned from a Japanese plane. When the Spanish Loyalists bombed a German battleship, Germany didn't go to war. For once and for all let us realize that incidents are unimportant in themselves; that they become important only when they are used as a pretext for war—only when they are used to inflame public opinion.

Fifth, let us realize for once and for all that America has a unique destiny of its own—a destiny apart from the European cauldron.

Let us then begin to quit worrying about Europe's war and begin thinking of America and where it will be when the red haze of war clears. When the smoke clears over there there will still be visible in America a democracy intact, a people dedicated to peacetime pursuits, in possession of two-thirds of the gold in the world, the world's most efficient industrial machinery, and the world's only untarnished credit. Let us concentrate now on using that tremendous power to outlaw war and to preserve peace.

Sixth, let us turn a deaf ear to any proposals that America step in, as referee, for the European battle. Let us not be jockeyed into a position that will make us cosigners on a demand note to guarantee a patched-up European truce.

Seventh, let us in a peacetime America learn one lesson from war-torn Europe. If they can tighten their belts for war * * * then let us tighten our belts for peace. Let us seize this opportunity to readjust our scale of living, to fit our national economy. Let me repeat: Instead of mobilizing for war let us mobilize for peace.

Neutrality

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GERALD P. NYE

OF NORTH DAKOTA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, October 18 (legislative day of Wednesday, October 4), 1939

EDITORIAL FROM THE SATURDAY EVENING POST

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD what I consider to be the most worthy editorial which has yet been written on the issue which is pending before the Senate at the present time. It is the editorial published on October 14, 1939, in the Saturday Evening Post headed "Phantasy of a Bloodless Sword."

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Saturday Evening Post of October 14, 1939]

PHANTASY OF A BLOODLESS SWORD

People were never so stupid as to imagine they could make themselves neutral by passing a law. All the confusion in our minds about neutrality legislation has been owing, in the first place, to the fact that neutrality was not the subject, and, secondly, to bewildering equivocations on the tongue of government. In the dimness of this confusion there has taken place, almost unawares to the people, a perilous change in this Nation's foreign policy. That is the key to any understanding of what has happened. For the record, and while we may, let us tell ourselves truthfully how we arrived at a grave crisis of thought and feeling on this one question: Shall the export of arms and munitions to nations at war be forbidden?

The first act of Congress to be called a neutrality law, imperfectly enacted in 1935, directly proceeded from an idea of the innocents, namely, the idea that munitions makers, international bankers, and profiteers were the war bringers; it was believed that if this three-headed monster could be chained down, the peace of the world would be promoted, and we should be less likely ourselves to be drawn into another European war. It was a law, therefore, to limit the rights of American citizens as neutrals. Their right to sell arms and munitions to nations at war—a right of all neutrals under international law—was absolutely annulled. The right to export raw materials and foodstuffs to nations at war was restricted in three ways: First, even such goods as these could not be carried to a belligerent in American ships; second, title to the cargo had to be transferred to the foreign buyer before it could leave an American port; third, American bankers were forbidden to buy or sell the bonds and I O U's of nations at war, which would be to provide them with credit and perhaps cause in this country another war boom, such as occurred during the first World War. This was called the cash-and-carry or the come-and-get-it-and-pay-for-it policy, to govern the export of materials and foodstuffs. The sale of arms and munitions was forbidden on any terms.

The law was strengthened by amendment in 1936 and again in 1937, with no change of idea. Everybody knew what its demerits were. It was inflexible and might sometime work as we had not wished it to work; it would work always to the advantage of the great maritime nations controlling the seas, which is to say, Great Britain and France on the Atlantic side, and Japan on the Pacific side; furthermore, it surrendered what we had always before been willing to fight for, namely, freedom of the seas for neutrals; and it was a drastic limitation upon all the rights of neutrals in time of war for which the American Government had contended throughout our history. Nevertheless, in the form in which it was finally enacted in 1937 the vote for it in Congress was almost unanimous, public sentiment heartily supported it, and the President signed it.

Now, the first point is that the administration did not begin to attack the law until after its foreign policy had changed.

The change was sudden. In his 1936 Chautauqua speech, the President had been saying, "I hate war"; and, "If war should break out again on another continent, let us not blink the fact that we should find in this country thousands of Americans who, seeking immediate riches—fool's gold—would attempt to break down or to evade our neutrality. * * * To resist the clamor of that greed * * * would require the unswerving support of all Americans who love peace."

How far from that to the quarantine speech in Chicago, in October 1937, when he said there was no escape for us through mere "isolation and neutrality" and proposed that the peace-loving nations of the world combine and make a concerted effort to quarantine and stop the aggressors.

Never since that speech has the administration been neutral in thought, word, or deed. Continuously thereafter high members of the administration, certainly not without Mr. Roosevelt's approval, seized every occasion to incite hatred and fear of the aggressors, who were called by name, and to implant the thought that if Great Britain and France were attacked, we should have to exert our power to save them, in order to preserve the democratic principle in the world. Then the President himself, in his message to Congress last January, made the famous utterance that whereas words were futile, still there were many methods "short of war, but more effective than mere words" whereby aggressor nations could be brought to account.

Shortly after this it became known that the administration was demanding a revision of what it referred to as the so-called neutrality law. There was a White House conference with Members of Congress, at which the President was understood to have made their blood run cold by telling them America's first line of defense was in France. When this had leaked out and had produced a profound and premature political sensation in the world, he denied having said it. Whether he said it explicitly in that way, at that time, does not matter at all. The idea was implicit in the quarantine speech, in his message to Congress, and in many other sayings.

Then there was his farewell to the people of Warm Springs, Ga., "I'll be back in the fall, if we don't have a war," and his endorsement of an editorial that followed in the Washington Post, saying that in using the collective word "we," the President meant to aline this country with the democracies of Europe, and was telling Hitler and Mussolini "that the tremendous force of the United States must be a factor in their current thinking." This endorsement of the Washington Post's interpretation of what he meant was made at a press conference, April 11, which the New York Times reported in the following words: "President Roosevelt strongly implied today that he believed the involvement of the United States in any general European war was inevitable, and that this Nation should stand shoulder to shoulder with Great Britain and France against Nazi-Fascist machinations."

And how far that was from the positive statement that he had made on February 3. "We are against entangling alliances, obviously," he said. "The foreign policy has not changed and is not going to change."

If he meant there had been no change in foreign policy since his quarantine speech, that was probably true. But this was a policy the American people did not yet comprehend and knew very little about.

Nothing was aimless. All this was leading to a certain thing. The President was resolved to get rid of the law that made it unlawful to sell arms and munitions to nations at war. In June he sent to the Capitol his own so-called neutrality law, asking that it be substituted for the one on the books. The law he proposed was amazing. It would have invested the President with almost unlimited discretion to employ the economic power and resources of this country in a foreign war, such resources not only as materials and foodstuffs, but arms, munitions, and all implements of war; also credit and shipping, and then very large control of the private activities of American citizens.

The administration very well knew that the opposition, calling itself "the peace bloc" and derisively called "the isolationist bloc," would make its hardest fight against the repeal of the 4-year-old embargo on the export of arms and munitions to nations at war. Therefore, it put forward Secretary Hull, and after him others, to argue that there was really no logical difference between, on one hand, guns, bombing planes, and explosives, and, on the other hand, the materials out of which the belligerents could manufacture their own war implements, or the food they ate while doing it. The humanitarian might shudder at the thought of selling the lethal instruments for profit, and that could be understood, but the difference was in logic unreal.

This argument was evasive. Consider it. To manufacture guns, planes, and explosives requires time and equipment. In war, time is vital; and every nation at war may be supposed to be running its full equipment in high gear. If we embargo arms and munitions, the nations that control the sea still have access to our raw materials, our fuel, and our surplus foodstuffs, and that is tremendous advantage; but if we lift the embargo, they have access, besides, to our industrial power. Obviously, the purpose of repealing the embargo on arms and munitions would be to sharpen and lengthen our weapon against Hitler. Logic had nothing to do with it. Policy was acting.

Wanting to know why the President's neutrality law did not continue the embargo on arms and munitions, the Foreign Affairs Committee of the House consulted the State Department. The words that follow are from the minority report of that committee: "When representatives of the State Department were asked whether there was any change in the international situation which should cause Congress to repeal the provision for an arms embargo at this time, our committee was told that Hitler's taking over of 27 munition plants in Austria and the Skoda works and 11 other plants in Czechoslovakia justified the change."

That was to say, because Germany had acquired additional munition plants, therefore it was necessary to give England and France access to American munition plants. The idea is clear. The motive is comprehensible. But when did it come to be the foreign policy of the United States to mind the balance of military power in Europe? Certainly, on February 3, when the President said that there was no change in our foreign policy and that there was not going to be any change, the people did not know that that was our foreign policy. The minority report of the Foreign Affairs Committee of the House added: "We are opposed to the President's policy of using the threat of our power to preserve a balance of power in Europe."

Much to the President's chagrin, his so-called neutrality law was defeated. Meanwhile, the come-and-get-it feature of the old law expired in May, leaving the rest of it as it was; the export of arms and munitions to nations at war absolutely forbidden.

That was in July. The struggle between the President and Congress was dramatic. At the very end he called a conference at the White House of both those who supported him and those who opposed him; that was the conference which the Vice President is supposed to have terminated by saying, "It's no use, Cap'n. You haven't got the votes."

And what was the crucial point of that struggle? Not the embargo, really. Not whether or not the sale of arms and munitions to nations at war should be forbidden by law. That was only the fighting point. It is now a curiously twisted pattern. The idea of the so-called neutrality law completed in 1937 was to limit the rights of neutral citizens, for fear they should create circumstances and conditions tending to involve the country in war. But the passionate idea of those who last July defended that same law, against the law the President was trying to put in place of it, was to limit the power of an unneutral government to involve the country in another European conflict.

After his defeat, the President retired to Hyde Park, where he held a press conference, which was reported in the New York Times, July 22, as follows: "Mr. Roosevelt confirmed one of the many utterances attributed to him by those who participated in the White House conference Tuesday night. He said he told the group that he had already fired two shots for peace and wanted a chance to fire a third, should the occasion arise. Reporters were left to infer that he could not fire the third shot unless this Nation were free to ship arms and munitions to belligerents."

He wanted a bigger gun. An economic gun; a shot to be fired for peace. And yet a gun to intimidate Hitler.

Continuing the report of that Hyde Park press conference, the New York Times correspondent wrote: "Because the United States had been eliminated, for the present at least, as a factor to be reckoned with by aggressor nations, who might have hesitated in the face of potential American aid to nonaggressors, the chances of an outbreak of war had been increased, the President explained."

So said Winston Churchill, now First Lord of the British Admiralty, in the New York Herald-Tribune, July 14. "It is of capital importance," he wrote, "that Hitler should not be misled into believing that the recent vote on President Roosevelt's neutrality bill represents the last word which the United States has to speak upon the fundamental issues now at stake. * * * This controversy may be a potential factor in bringing about what all American citizens most desire to prevent"—namely, a European war.

So you see how it may be—and we say it sardonically—that the war which did come was our fault, on the testimony of both the President of the United States and the First Lord of the British Admiralty, because Congress at a certain moment did not give Mr. Roosevelt the economic weapon with which he would have undertaken to redress the balance of power that Hitler had upset in Europe.

When the war came the President did these things, seriatim: He proclaimed an absolute embargo on the sale of arms and munitions, as he was obliged to do under the law he had been unable to get rid of; he proclaimed a limited emergency in order to have a freer hand all around; through the Federal Lending Administrator he announced that the Johnson Act, forbidding American credit to be loaned to America's defaulting war debtors, does not bind the lending agencies of the Federal Government, and that the Government's own Export-Import Bank and its Reconstruction Finance Corporation have plenty of unused credit to finance both the production and the sale of American commodities in benefit of those European belligerents who happily control the sea and can, therefore, come and get them. And then saying he believed public feeling had changed to his view, he called Congress in special session to reconsider repealing the embargo on the sale of arms and munitions.

Historically, the policy of the American Government had been to assert and defend the right of neutrals to sell arms and munitions to other nations freely in peace and war, and there was much to be said for that policy. There is much to be said for it still. Nevertheless, deliberately, in time of peace, we departed from it. Now, with Europe in a state of war, to change our peacetime law forbidding traffic in arms and munitions, and to change it in a way to benefit one side only, is an unneutral act. Let no one be deceived to the contrary. Such an act on the part of a nation that holds the decisive economic power is one the consequences of which cannot be foreseen.

During 2 years of unneutral propaganda the Roosevelt administration, evolving a foreign policy of its own so dangerous that the revelation of it had to be graduated to the Gallup polls, at the same time imposed the hypnotic thought that we can exert the power without ourselves becoming involved in actual war. This we believe to be a phantasy, in contempt of both experience and common sense. There is no such magic weapon, all powerful and yet bloodless.

People cannot be neutral in feeling. That is impossible. We suppose that American sympathies now lie more one way than toward any other foreign war since our history began. All the more on that account should the Government be the image of our reason. No government should know what its own sympathies are. Would that we had at this time a government steadfast in the American tradition of jealous neutrality, and willing, if necessary, to fight for that, instead of one hotly demanding the sword of this Nation's economic power to wield in Europe's war.

Payment by Great Britain and France for Purchases in United States

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN A. DANAHER

OF CONNECTICUT

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, October 17 (legislative day of Wednesday, October 4), 1939

Mr. DANAHER. Mr. President, during the course of my remarks, I asked and obtained unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an article from the Baltimore Sun by Mr. J. Fred Essary relating to orders placed in the United States by the British and French Governments for the purchase and payment of goods and materials. I did not have the article at hand at the time. I now ask unanimous consent that it may be printed in today's RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Baltimore Sun of October 12, 1939]

STATE DEPARTMENT INSISTS ALL ARMS BOUGHT IN UNITED STATES HAVE BEEN PAID FOR—ASSERTS ALLIES HAVE NOT LET BIG CONTRACTS—TELLS PITTMAN NO DEBT HAS BEEN NEGOTIATED OR HAS ACCUMULATED—PARTS OF ORDERS WERE EXECUTED, BUT ALL OTHERS WERE HELD UP

(By J. Fred Essary)

WASHINGTON, October 11.—The State Department is authority for the statement today that the Allied governments have not awarded contracts for huge quantities of arms in this country thereby creating a great potential debt if not an actual one.

Assurance to this effect was given to Senator KEY PITTMAN, chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee. The facts were assembled by Joseph C. Green, head of the National Munitions Control Board of the State Department.

It is true that many large orders, chiefly for aircraft, have been awarded to American manufacturers and that a part of these orders have been executed. It is also true that some of the goods have been delivered.

EVERYTHING PAID FOR

But the department insists that every airplane or engine or shell that had been turned over to an Allied government up to the time of the President's neutrality proclamation had been paid for on the barrel head. No debt has been negotiated or has accumulated.

In the memorandum prepared for Senator PITTMAN it was pointed out that at the time of the proclamation Great Britain had let contracts for arms, ammunition, and other instruments of war to the value of $44,800,000.

Of this amount goods to the value of $27,000,000 had been shipped on the date of the proclamation, when deliveries abruptly ended. The Department says the goods were paid for in full.

LICENSES, NOT ORDERS, CANCELED

Licenses for the remainder of the British purchases also were issued, but they were automatically canceled the day the proclamation became effective. The orders, however, were not canceled.

Also, it was announced that France had let contracts amounting to $104,500,000 by the time neutrality was proclaimed. Of that amount, deliveries had been made and shipments were authorized to the value of $20,900,000.

As in the case of the British contracts, the export licenses for the undelivered French purchases were revoked.

PAYMENT ON DELIVERY

"It may be stated categorically," Mr. Green said, "that every contract which the British and French Governments have made with American companies for the purchase of arms, ammunition, and implements of war has provided for payment in advance of delivery and full payment on delivery."

The fact that contracts are outstanding for additional supplies does not create a debt in the judgment of State Department officials. It is known that deliveries in this instance do not mean actual shipment. They merely mean handing over the goods to representatives of the foreign government involved.

As rapidly as the commodities are finished, they are paid for under all contracts known to the Government. The problem of getting the finished products out of the country is no responsibility of the manufacturers, it is said.

So far as can be learned, no contracts with American manufacturers have been canceled. The purchasers expect to get their arms and ammunition if and when the embargo is lifted.

Senator PITTMAN had been angered by statements by Senator JOHN A. DANAHER (Republican, Connecticut) that the proposed neutrality revision program would open the door to sweeping credits to belligerent powers.

The committee chairman said this afternoon that the State Department's figures showed "very clearly that not only have no debts been incurred prior to the President's proclamation but that munitions manufacturers of this country never did have and have no intention now of selling to belligerents except on a cash basis."

"So the whole fear," he continued, "of the accumulation of a great debt by the purchase of munitions has no foundation whatsoever."

There was further discussion today of the War Department's program for increasing the land forces of the country to full peacetime strength.

To do this, the Regular Army must recruit up to 280,000 men, or 53,000 more than is now authorized. The Army's total strength now is about 185,000, and it is recruiting new members to expand its forces to the 227,000 total authorized recently by the President.

The National Guard, if these forces are to attain full peacetime strength, must expand to a much greater degree, officials pointed out.

The authorized strength of the Guard is 450,000. To reach that goal it is necessary to recruit approximately 215,000 more men.

Work of Mixed Claims Commission

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ELBERT D. THOMAS

OF UTAH

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, October 18 (legislative day of Wednesday, October 4), 1939

ARTICLE BY JOSEPH C. FEHR, ESQ.

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the Appendix of the RECORD an article by Mr. Joseph Conrad Fehr, a distinguished member of the District of Columbia Bar, published in the October issue of the American Bar Association Journal, relating to the work of the Mixed Claims Commission.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the American Bar Association Journal, October 1939]

WORK OF THE MIXED CLAIMS COMMISSION

(By Joseph Conrad Fehr, member of the District of Columbia bar)

With the decision of Mr. Justice Owen J. Roberts, of the Supreme Court of the United States, as umpire of the Mixed Claims Commission, United States and Germany, in holding Germany responsible for the conflagrations and explosions which took place on the "Black Tom" pier of the Lehigh Valley Railroad in Jersey City, N. J., on July 30, 1916, and nearly 6 months later, on January 11, 1917, in the Canadian Car & Foundry munitions plant at Kingsland, N. J., the work of that 17-year-old international tribunal comes to a dramatic close. And having disposed of more than 20,000 claims, large and small, it now goes down into history as the greatest international arbitration ever convened for the purpose of adjudicating the pecuniary claims of one country and its citizens against another.

* * * * * * *

When it is recalled that during the 125 years prior to the World War the United States was a party to 71 different arbitrations, involving 24 other nations, and all manner of pecuniary demands, this arbitration of war claims between the United States and Germany is particularly noteworthy. These 71 prior arbitrations resulted in total awards of less than $93,000,000, including the Geneva award of $15,500,000, a single proceeding known as the Alabama arbitration, in favor of the United States. The Alabama arbitration alone lasted 5 years, the Commission filing a lump-sum award in order to settle 1,701 claims, including 448 for the expenditure of war-risk insurance premiums which were summarily disregarded. As compared with this record the Mixed Claims Commission, United States and Germany, aside from the above-mentioned sabotage claims, required less than 11 years to dispose of 20,425 claims, resulting in total awards aggregating $260,000,000 (including interest).

The United States and Germany began their momentous arbitration on October 9, 1922. Its work can best be appraised through the following figures: Aside from the so-called sabotage cases, there are 6,837 awards to private claimants, carrying the total amount of $193,892,287.92. With the four awards to the Government of the United States in the amount of $84,961,534.18, the entire number of awards is 6,841, aggregating $278,853,822.10. These figures include interest only through September 30, 1935, interest running on at 5 percent per annum on all amounts unpaid. Of these awards, 6,498 have already been paid in full and 304 have been paid approximately the principal amount. Stated in another way, there has been paid the sum of $135,379,216.93 in payment of nearly 7,000 awards to private claimants in whole or in part. Payments are made by the Treasury Department of the United States, under the Settlement of War Claims Act of 1928, out of a special trust fund therein created, the Federal Government having no obligation in respect of payment except to administer the account.

The payments made on account of these awards were made possible by the Settlement of War Claims Act of 1928. Later, on November 7, 1930, Germany, under the debt agreement with the United States of June 23, 1930, deposited in the Treasury of the United States her bonds running to the United States amounting to RM3,169,700,000 (approximately $755,000,000) in order to satisfy her obligations. Of this amount, RM2,121,600,000 ($505,000,000) was to satisfy the awards of the Commission, and the remainder, RM1,048,100,000 ($250,000,000), to meet the costs of the American Army of Occupation in Germany following the armistice. The debt agreement was authorized by an American statute of June 5, 1930, and a German statute of similar tenor.

The late Chandler P. Anderson, of New York and Washington, an outstanding international lawyer, was for many years the American commissioner. Dr. Wilhelm Kiesselbach, of Hamburg, Germany, chief justice of the Hanseatic Supreme Court, was for many years the German commissioner. Since 1934 the German commissioner has been Dr. Victor L. F. H. Huecking. Prior to Mr. Justice Roberts there were three umpires, each of whom died. The late William R. Day, after retiring from the Supreme Court of the United States in 1922, was soon after appointed the commission's first umpire by President Harding. The German Government had requested President Harding to designate an outstanding American jurist. Mr. Justice Day resigned as umpire shortly before his death in 1923 and at the request of the German Government he was succeeded by the late Judge Edwin B. Parker, until then the American commissioner. Mr. Anderson then became the American member on the commission. Following the death of Judge Parker on October 30, 1929, Hon. Roland W. Boyden, of Boston, for several years unofficial observer for the United States at the Reparation Commission in Paris, became umpire on January 9, 1930. Mr. Boyden died on October 25, 1931, leaving the position of umpire again vacant. Upon the invitation of both Governments, Mr. Justice Roberts, of the United States Supreme Court, agreed to serve as umpire in the winding up of the Commission's work. When Mr. Anderson died several years ago he was succeeded as American commissioner by Christopher B. Garnett.

During the past 16 years the United States has been represented before the Commission by the late Robert W. Bonynge, of New York, who succeeded the late Robert C. Morris, also of New York in June 1923. He has since prosecuted before the Commission claims of the United States and American nationals, assisted by a legal staff, of which Mr. Harold H. Martin, of Washington, has been chief counsel. Since practically the beginning of the arbitration, Germany's first agent before the Commission was Dr. Karl von Lewinski, an official high in the councils of the German Foreign Office, who was succeeded in 1930 by Dr. Wilhelm Tannenberg, also an official of the German Foreign Office; and Dr. Tannenberg was in 1933 succeeded by Dr. Johann Lohman, who, in turn, was in 1934 succeeded by Dr. Richard Paulig.

The agreement constituting the Commission required that Germany be notified on or before April 9, 1923, as to the nature and number of claims the United States intended to present. At that time there were only 12,416 claims filed for arbitration. These demands, comprising many claims since determined to have been unfounded or exaggerated, amounted in terms of claimants' demands to the amazing figure of $1,479,064,313.92, including the Government's claim for the cost of maintaining the American Army of Occupation along the Rhine, estimated as of January 31, 1923, at $255,544,810, subject to adjustments. This particular claim was later withdrawn by reason of the separate arrangement between the United States and Germany known as the Young plan of 1929 (which superseded the Dawes Plan of 1924 and the financial agreement adopted by the Paris Conference January 14, 1925), calling for payment of this item by Germany directly to the United States. Under the subsequent agreement of December 31, 1928 (contemplated by the Settlement of War Claims Act of 1928) about 8,000 so-called late claims were allowed to come within the jurisdiction of the Commission, which have all since been disposed of.

Of the 6,837 awards in private claims, the principal amounts definitely ascertained prior to the awards recently made with reference to the so-called sabotage claims are $2,409,431.31 in awards in the Lusitania group, $35,342,105.62 in the marine underwriters' group, and some $30,000,000 in other claims involving deaths and personal injuries (other than through the sinking of the Lusitania group), American hull and cargo losses, damage to property in territory occupied by Germany, damages sustained through application in Germany of exceptional war measures, American interests in estates, debts, bank deposits, and bonds. In this connection it should be noted that the reparation demands of the principal Allied and Associated Powers totaled about $32,000,000,000.

The claims put forward by the Government of the United States as such were solely on account of destruction of or damage to ships and cargoes. An award resulted in each case asserted. Totaling $42,034,794.41, exclusive of interest, which runs at 5 percent simple interest per annum, from November 11, 1918, these awards are as follows:

U. S. Shipping Board	$16,500,000.00
U. S. Veterans' Bureau	24,319,095.41
U. S. Railroad Administration	1,215,000.00
U. S. Government Despatch Agency	699.00

The grand total of the principal of all awards is approximately $240,000,000. By adding interest due at the rate of 5 percent from the numerous dates specified in the awards, America's total bill against Germany on account of both private and Government claims is well over $300,000,000. Of this amount there has already been paid to private claimants about $134,000,000, payments on account of the Government awards being deferred, under the aforesaid act, until the private claimants have been fully recompensed.

The war-risk insurance premium claims, aggregating in amount claimed $345,000,000, were, after elaborate arguments and thorough consideration, dismissed by the Commission as ill-founded. Duplications amounting to approximately $100,000,000, including also arbitrary exaggerations in claims, scaled down the amounts demanded even more. As already pointed out, it was not necessary for the Commission to adjudicate the Government's claim for the cost of the army of occupation.

As compared with those entered by the late Judge Parker as the sole Commissioner of the Tripartite Claims Commission, these awards were, indeed, tremendous. That Commission rendered awards against Austria totaling $370,032.14, including interest, which have already been paid. The awards against Hungary totaled some $200,000, including interest.

The United States had also seized certain German vessels which were valued by the Navy Board of Appraisal in 1917 at some $34,000,000. In the suits filed in the United States Court of Claims after the war (dismissed for lack of jurisdiction) the former owners of these ships valued them in excess of $230,000,000. However, the late Judge James W. Remick, of Concord, N. H., the War Claims Arbiter named pursuant to the War Claims Act of 1928, applying the particular rule of fair compensation prescribed by the act, judicially determined in 1930, after very thorough argument and consideration, that the value of the vessels within his jurisdiction was $74,243,000 including interest to January 1, 1929.

Judge Remick concluded his work as War Claims Arbiter on December 15, 1931. The amounts claimed in some 1,200 cases filed with him by claimants probably aggregated some $500,000,000. They were based on 105 ships, about 6,200 patents, and the Sayville radio station. No American had ever before been given sole power of decision without appeal in cases involving such vast sums. The 288 awards entered by the Arbiter in favor of German nationals in the patent cases and the radio-station claim amount, with interest through 1928, to $12,485,387.83. With the ship cases, the awards to Germans aggregate $86,728,320.83, including simple interest at 5 percent per annum from July 2, 1921, through December 31, 1928, as provided by the statute.

The act fixed a maximum limitation of $100,000,000 on the awards. German nationals have already been paid substantial amounts of the awards, and payments on account of the remainder, with interest, will be spread over a long period of years. The Arbiter also made 136 awards in favor of Austrian nationals, aggregating with interest $912,687.94. Eleven Hungarian nationals also got awards, aggregating $53,800.

In the light of the work thus accomplished, the return by the United States of the property seized during the war from then alien enemies presented for a time a difficult problem. This property was seized in retaliation under the original Trading With the Enemy Act enacted October 6, 1917, and as since from time to time amended. The property was specifically set aside under the Knox-Porter peace resolution which declared that in terminating the state of war as of June 2, 1921, the date of its passage, the property was set aside as a sort of pledge or security to insure the payment of America's war claims once their amounts were finally determined.

* * * * * * *

Eighteen years have now elapsed since the signing and ratification of America's treaties of peace with Germany, with Austria, and with Hungary. The Alien Property Custodian of the United States still has in his possession some property belonging to former enemy aliens which is being released as rapidly as ownership can be established. Although much of this property was seized during the World War, some of it was sequestered after the signing of the armistice, even up to the time of the Knox-Porter peace resolution of June 2, 1921.

The property thus taken over by the Alien Property Custodian was, however not confiscated, as many persons believe. The Custodian sequestered the property of enemy aliens in accordance with the Trading With the Enemy Act which authorized outright confiscation only of such property as could be used in the prosecution of the war and even then provided for remuneration, as in the case of patents. So, strictly speaking, the United States never confiscated any property.

The practice of confiscating private enemy property, even though sanctioned by the law of nations for centuries, being contrary not only to the enlightened thought of the world but also repugnant to the long-established policy of the United States, statesmen and economists in and out of Congress for years endeavored to formulate a plan looking to the disposal of the property in the Custodian's hands—at one time valued in excess of $600,000,000—in a manner fair and equitable to the nonresident aliens (formerly enemies) from whom it had been taken, at the same time safeguarding the interests of American nationals whose claims (likewise totaling hundreds of millions of dollars) were in the meantime being adjudicated by the Mixed Claims Commission, United States and Germany.

It was urged by some that the United States make an unconditional return of all enemy property. Others argued that the United States should hold this sequestered property as collateral security, or as a pledge, to insure the ultimate payment by Germany of the yet undetermined American claims. Many insisted that the United States exercise its right to confiscate this property, the courts having held that there is an absolute right of confiscation. It was also suggested that this property be held as a set-off against the American claims that were yet to be adjudicated.

The delay in winding up the affairs of the office of the Alien Property Custodian (now a Bureau of the Department of Justice) has undoubtedly been due to the many proposals offered as to how this property should be returned. Without undertaking to definitely define its post-war policy in the matter, Congress governed itself to a large extent by the nonconfiscatory policy adhered to by the American Government in the past, in the meantime keeping an eye on the American claims against the former enemy nations as they were being adjudicated.

It was of paramount importance that the awards as determined by the Mixed Claims Commission be protected. With this understanding the arbitration proceeded in conformity with the never-failing desire of the United States amicably to adjust all such differences between this Nation and others by justiciary instead of arbitrary methods. This attitude explains why the Alien Property Custodian was never authorized to immediately return property held by him following the reestablishment of peacetime relations with the former enemy countries. The way was paved, however, through various enactments of Congress, amending the Trading With the Enemy Act of October 6, 1917, for the gradual return of the property to its erstwhile owners in a manner that was not confiscatory but at the same time vouchsafed ample time to both Germany and her wartime allies to provide ways and means of ultimately reimbursing the Government of the United States and American nationals on account of all just claims growing out of the World War. Hence, without officially admitting such to have been the case, the events leading up to the winding-up of the work of both the Mixed Claims Commission and the Alien Property Custodian enabled the United States and her wartime enemies agreeably to adopt a policy which in effect made it possible for the United States to always hold enough former enemy property in the hands of the Custodian as security or pledge to insure the ultimate payment of all just American claims against Germany and her wartime allies and nationals.

Time has shown that these necessary delays gave rise to a procedure that has harmonized with the policy of this country as expounded since the days of Washington and as expressly provided for in America's separate treaty of peace with Germany.

The property seized from former enemy aliens has thus from time to time been released in the following manner:

(1) To American citizens (i. e., Americans residing abroad in enemy alien countries and occupied zones at the time the United States entered the World War).

(2) To citizens of allied countries.

(3) To American women married to enemy aliens prior to America's declaration of war.

(4) To citizens of countries newly created by the Treaty of Versailles and the Treaty of St. Germain.

(5) To citizens of central European powers (80 percent to German nationals and 100 percent to the Austrians and Hungarians conditioned on the payment of American claims against those countries).

Turkish and Bulgarian property had also been seized, although war was never actually declared against Turkey and Bulgaria, because these countries were allies of Germany and the former Austro-Hungarian Empire. However, this property was returned to its former owners as quickly as it was possible to do so.

Under the terms of the Settlement of War Claims Act of 1928, which also amended the Trading With the Enemy Act, practically all the property in the hands of the Custodian has rapidly been returned to the former owners or their successors in interest. Out of the $545,228,160.84 worth of cash assets and other property seized by the Custodian from alien enemies, $235,370,096.92 was returned to the former enemy owners prior to January 1, 1924. At that time the Custodian had in his possession cash assets and other property amounting to $309,858,063.92. There were also the German ships seized under the congressional joint resolution of May 12, 1917, and the radio station and patents taken over from German nationals and also those belonging to former Austrian and Hungarian nationals.

During 1928, the first year of the operation of the War Settlements Act passed that year, the Custodian and the Department of Justice paid out cash and securities aggregating in value $31,500,600.67.

Following the passage of the Settlement of War Claims Act of 1928, there were filed with the Alien Property Custodian 3,224 "war claims" pursuant thereto, of which 2,259 have been paid and 687 disallowed, with the exception of 329 claims involving trusts of less than $2,000, which have been paid in full.

Practically all of the Austrian claims were paid before Austria was incorporated into Germany last year.

By means of the tremendous post-war undertakings above described, the Government of the United States and American nationals have the satisfaction of knowing that both private and governmental claims against Germany and her war Allies have, with the exception of the sabotage claims, been settled and adjusted amicably without deviating from the traditional American policies respecting the property of aliens. While our wartime European Allies have ever since the ratification of the Treaty of Versailles insisted upon the recognition of statements of accounts compiled by themselves ex parte in the handling of the reparations and other treaty obligations, the United States has consistently adhered to its practice of arbitrating the claims of her nationals as well as those of the Government through the machinery of a commission on which both Governments are represented, applying principles of international law whenever the express terms of the treaty gave rise to doubt.

It is not unlikely that the United States and Soviet Russia will agree to the appointment of a commission for the purpose of arbitrating the claims of the Government of the United States and numerous American nationals based on losses and damages incurred during the Russian Revolution under Russia's various regimes during and after the World War.

The claims arbitration with Germany as well as the gradual return of the former enemy property sequestered during the war have thus materially enhanced the prestige and authority of international law. Indeed, they furnish, perhaps, the most concrete example to date for the friendly settlement of international controversies to which the seventeenth century Grotius, the father of international law, devoted his life in order to convince a doubting world, beset with many international disputes which had theretofore been causes of war, that arbitration is war's only practical substitute.

Even though war clouds hover about the world as never before, the United States is still in complete agreement with Dante, who, more than 600 years ago, declared: "Peace, universal peace, is the first blessing of mankind."

The Arms Embargo Is in Line With the Customs and Laws of the Other Nations

---

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FREDERICK C. SMITH

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, October 18, 1939

EXCERPTS FROM ARMS-EMBARGO LAWS AND DECREES OF OTHER NATIONS

Mr. SMITH of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include excerpts from arms-embargo laws and decrees by other nations.

There is widespread opinion in our country that our present arms embargo is a departure from the customs and laws of other nations. This is a false notion, as will be revealed by a reading of the following excerpts from acts, decrees, and so forth, with regard to this question. Indeed, it will be seen, the other nations have long since had arms-embargo laws and have increasingly pursued the policy of prohibiting the sale of war materials to belligerents.

An instance of proof of this is reported in the Washington (D. C.) Star of September 28, 1939, which reads:

> Under pressure from all sides and anxious not to tread on the toes of their powerful neighbors, the Scandinavian and Baltic countries have already stopped shipping to belligerents anything that might possibly be regarded as war material.

The following are excerpts of some of the more important neutrality laws, decrees, and so forth, of various countries relating to the prohibiting of sale of war materials by neutral nations to belligerents, edited and annotated by Francis Deak and Philip C. Jessup, published in the form of an advance copy by the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace:

AUSTRIA

(No. 5, p. 37): Imperial decree concerning the observance of neutrality, August 7, 1803:

"* * * we are determined to observe the strictest neutrality in the war between France and England * * *."

(No. 5a): "* * * we forbid all our subjects who are navigators and merchants to transport, for the powers now at war, any of the goods or munitions of war: Cannons, mortars, arquebuses, pistols, bombs, grenades, bullets, guns, gun flints, fuzes, powder, saltpeter, sulfur, pikes, swords, sword belts, cartridge boxes, saddles, and bridles."

(No. 6, p. 42): Circular of the imperial royal central maritime authority to all offices and agencies, April 12, 1854:

"* * * captains of Austrian merchantmen are to be instructed to abstain from the carriage of any kind of contraband for territories of the belligerent powers."

(No. 7a, p. 45): Order of the Ministry of Commerce and Finance regarding the prohibition of export and transit of arms and ammunition, May 31, 1854:

"* * * export of arms and ammunitions over the Austrian frontier to the Russian and Ottoman states is prohibited."

(No. 8a, p. 46): Order of the Ministry of Finance, July 21, 1870:

"* * * the export and transit of arms, parts of arms, ammunition, and articles of ammunition of every kind is prohibited over all frontiers of the Austro-Hungarian customs territory."

(No. 8b, p. 46): Order of the ministries during the war which has broken out between the North German Confederation and the states of southern Germany, on the one hand, and France, on the other, July 29, 1870:

"1. It is forbidden to supply those powers with articles which, according to the general law of nations or to particular regulations made public by the foreign governments concerned, are deemed to be contraband of war."

(No. 8c, p. 48): Supra, No. 8a.

BELGIUM

(No. 14, p. 60): Act regarding restrictions on export and transit of arms and implements of war, September 7, 1870:

"ARTICLE 1. The Government is authorized, up to the end of the year 1870, to prohibit the exportation and transit of the following goods:

"1. Weapons of war of all kinds;

"2. Munitions of war of all kinds;

"3. Military clothing, camp supplies, equipment, and harness;

"5. Sailing and steam ships, machines and parts of machines for use in navigation, ships' tackle and equipment, and all other military and naval articles.

"ART. 4. Approval is hereby given to—

"2. The royal decree of August 5 last, which provisionally prohibits the exportation and transit of arms and munitions of war of all kinds."

BRAZIL

(No. 6, p. 85): Decree No. 11037, general rules of neutrality, August 4, 1914:

"ART 4. The exportation of arms and ammunitions of war from Brazil to any port of the belligerent nations, under the Brazilian flag or that of any other nation, is absolutely forbidden."

(No. 8, p. 94): Decree ordering the observance of complete neutrality in the war between Bolivia and Paraguay, May 23, 1933:

"ART. 3. The agents of the Federal Government or of the Brazilian States are forbidden, directly or indirectly, to export war material or aid its shipment to either of the belligerents."

(No. 10, p. 99): Circular concerning neutrality in the war between the Argentine Confederation and Buenos Aires, July 30, 1859:

"* * * exportation of articles of war from the ports of the Empire to those of Buenos Aires is absolutely prohibited, under the Brazilian flag or that of any other nation. Brazilian vessels must be prohibited from the same traffic in contraband of war * * *."

(No. 12a, p. 106): Circular concerning neutrality in the Spanish-Chilean War, March 10, 1866:

"The exportation of war materials to ports belonging to the belligerents is prohibited."

(No. 15, p. 111): Circular relative to the observance of neutrality during the war between the United States and Spain, April 29, 1898:

"4. The export of warlike articles from the ports of Brazil to those of either of the two belligerent powers, whether under the Brazilian flag or that of any other nation, is absolutely forbidden."

GREAT BRITAIN AND IRELAND

(No. 2, p. 145): The Customs and Consolidations Act, 1854, provided:

"The following goods may, by proclamation or order in council, be prohibited either to be exported or carried coastwise: Arms, ammunition and gunpowder, military and naval stores, and any articles which Her Majesty shall judge capable of being converted into or made useful in increasing the quantity of military or naval stores, provisions, or any sort of victual which may be used as food by man."

(No. 2, p. 145): Proclamation of November 29, 1861:

"* * * and by this our royal proclamation do order and direct that, from and after the date hereof, all gunpowder, saltpetre, nitrate of soda, and brimstone shall be, and the same are, hereby prohibited either to be exported from the United Kingdom or carried coastwise."

(No. 3, p. 146): December 4, 1861, under the Customs Consolidation Act, 1853:

"* * * And by this our royal proclamation do order and direct that, from and after the date hereof, all arms, ammunition, and military stores (including percussion caps and tubes), and also lead, shall be, and the same are hereby, prohibited either to be exported from the United Kingdom or carried coastwise."

(No. 6, p. 153): The arms export prohibition order, 1931, May 19, 1931:

"Whereas by section 8 of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1879, it is provided that the following goods may, by proclamation or order in council, be prohibited either to be exported or carried coastwise: Arms, ammunition and gunpowder, military and naval stores, and any articles which His Majesty shall judge capable of being converted into or made useful in increasing the quantity of military or naval stores, provisions, or any sort of victual which may be used as food for man;

"And whereas by section 17 of the Finance Act, 1921, it is enacted that section 8 of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1879, shall extend to weapons and munitions of war of every description, and firearms not being weapons of war, and ammunition for such firearms, as it applies to the goods therein mentioned, * * *.

"(1) As from the 1st of June 1931, the following articles shall be, and the same are hereby, prohibited to be exported from the United Kingdom, or to be shipped as ship's stores on vessels proceeding to foreign ports, that is to say:"

Then follows a long list of every conceivable weapon of war, including: "Tanks and armored cars and component parts thereof; * * * aircraft, assembled or dismantled, and aircraft engines. Ship's stores by license only exempted."

(No. 6a, p. 155): June 8, 1937, mustard gas and some 20 other chemicals were added to the prohibitory list.

(No. 12, p. 166): Order in Council prohibiting the exportation of gunpowder, arms, ammunition, etc., to Africa, to the West Indies, or to certain parts of America, February 12, 1816.

Order in Council February 12, 1816, prohibiting:

"* * * prohibit, and command, that no person or persons do, at any time during the space of 6 months, transport any gunpowder or saltpeter, or any sort of arms or ammunition, to any port or place on the coast of Africa, or in the West Indies, or on any part of the continent of America, or ship or lade any gunpowder or saltpeter, or any sort of arms or ammunition, on board any ship or vessel, in order to transport the same into any such ports or places on the coast of Africa, or in the West Indies, or on the continent of America without leave or permission in that behalf first obtained from His Majesty, or his Privy Council.

(No. 12b, p. 169): Order in Council extending the prohibition against exportation from Great Britain to certain foreign places, of gunpowder, arms, and ammunition, to the dominions of the King of Spain, July 12, 1819.

(No. 13, p. 170): Order in Council prohibiting the exportation of cannon and other arms, September 30, 1825:

"Whereas an act of Parliament was passed in the twenty-ninth year of the reign of His Late Majesty King George II, 'An act to empower His Majesty to prohibit the exportation of saltpeter,' etc. * * *

"* * * that no person or persons during the space of 6 months from date of this order, transport in any parts out of this Kingdom, any cannon, mortars, howitzers, carronades, etc., or ship or lade any cannon, mortars, etc., on board any ship or vessel, without leave or permission * * *."

(No. 19, p. 187): Act prohibiting the carriage of munitions to Spain by British merchant ships, December 3, 1936.

CANADA

(No. 51, p. 241): An act to amend the Customs Act, April 10, 1937:

"290. (1) The Governor in council may, from time to time, * * *.

"(b) * * * prohibit, restrict, or control the exportation of arms, ammunition, implements or munitions of war, military, naval, or air stores, or any articles deemed capable of being converted thereinto or made useful in the production thereof, or provisions of any sort of victual which may be used as food by man or beast.

"(c) * * * prohibit, restrict, or control the importation of arms, ammunition, etc."

(No. 55a, p. 259): Order in council (P. C. 1839), applying section 290 of the Customs Act in the Spanish civil war, July 30, 1937:

"* * * to prohibit the export from Canada, directly or indirectly, to any party in the conflict, of arms, war materials, aircraft, aircraft engines, separate parts thereof, and munitions."

BRITISH HONDURAS

(No. 76, p. 300): Proclamation prohibiting the exportation of arms from British Honduras, August 12, 1873:

"* * * whereas a state of hostilities exists in the Republics of Honduras and Guatemala, and we are desirous of observing a strict neutrality therein:

"We do, therefore, hereby prohibit to be exported or carried coastwise, arms, ammunition, gunpowder, and military and naval stores without a license."

GIBRALTAR

(No. 82, p. 317): Ordinance to enable the Governor of Gibraltar to prohibit the exportation of arms and other materials of war, April 30, 1878."

HONG KONG

(No. 89, p. 328): Proclamation prohibiting the exportation of arms and ammunition from Hong Kong, October 1, 1891:

"* * * prohibit either to be exported from the colony of Hong Kong, or to be carried coastwise within the said colony, arms, ammunition, gunpowder, and naval and military stores."

CHILE

(No. 13, p. 365): Circular from the Minister of Foreign Relations to the Provincial Governors, September 26, 1870:

"* * * Sale of articles reputed contraband of war is absolutely prohibited."

(No. 15b, p. 372): Note from the Minister, August 14, 1914:

"No belligerent vessel can load, in Chilean waters, anything except provisions and the objects necessary for the subsistence of its crew."

CHINA

(No. 4b, p. 387): Neutrality regulations February 15, 1904:

"6. It is not allowed to buy up contraband of war for the belligerents nor to manufacture contraband of war within the boundaries (of the neutral territory) to be forwarded for sale to the armies or navies of the belligerents."

(No. 5, p. 393): Presidential mandate on the observance of neutrality during the European war, August 6, 1914:

"* * * No person is allowed to arm and equip for a belligerent or furnish ships or stores and military supplies. * * * Nor are they allowed to supply any of the belligerents with funds."

DENMARK

(No. 1, p. 468): Royal order regulating the conduct and defining the obligations of merchants and mariners in time of war between other maritime powers, May 4, 1803:

"Since according to the generally established principles the subjects of a neutral power cannot be permitted to transport in their vessels goods that would be considered contraband of war, if they were destined for the ports of a belligerent power or if they belonged to its subjects, we have deemed it advisable to define expressly what shall be included under the head of contraband: Cannons, mortars, arms of all kinds. * * *"

(No. 12, p. 491): Proclamation of neutrality rules to be observed in the Russo-Turkish War, May 18, 1877:

"Besides the articles coming under the category of contraband of war, enumerated in the ordinance of the 4th of May 1803, are to be included all such manufactured articles as could be directly used in warfare."

(No. 13, p. 493): Proclamation of the rules which will be applicable to Danish trade and shipping during the Sino-Japanese War, August 24, 1894:

"Prohibited articles named as contraband in article 13 of the ordinance of May 4, 1803—that is, cannons, mortars, fuzes, powder, all types of arms * * *."

(No. 15, p. 496): Proclamation of neutrality in the Russo-Japanese War, April 27, 1904:

"It is forbidden to clear from Danish harbors cargoes of coal directly destined for the fleets of the belligerents.

"* * * * to aid either of the belligerents in their warlike enterprises; as, for instance, by supplying their ships with articles that are considered contraband, * * *."

(No. 17, p. 500): Notice of the Government relative to the renewed application of the ordinance of May 4, 1803, April 20, 1854:

"SEC. 2. In addition to the articles specified in the ordinance of May 4, 1803, all manufactured articles which may be directly converted into articles of warfare, are now deemed contraband of war."

(No. 19, p. 502): Provisional law prohibiting the exportation of horses from Denmark during the Franco-Prussian War, July 27, 1870.

(No. 20, p. 503): Provisional Law No. 72, forbidding Danish subjects to assist belligerent powers, April 29, 1898:

"To assist either on or from Danish territory any of the belligerent powers in their warlike operations, as well as to supply their ships with objects which can be classed as contraband of war, * * *.

"To transport contraband of war for any of the belligerent powers, * * *."

(No. 21, p. 503): Law No. 22, prohibiting the export of weapons and ammunition to China, March 6, 1901:

"* * * the export of arms and parts of the same, of ammunition and of all other war materials from this Kingdom or the Danish colonies is forbidden so long as these are destined for China."

(No. 22, p. 505): Decree of the Minister of Foreign Affairs relative to Danish trade and shipping during the Russo-Japanese War, February 10, 1904:

"No owner or master is allowed to employ his ship for the transporting of contraband of war to any of the belligerent powers or to let or charter ships which are known or supposed to be destined for such purpose.

"As contraband of war—which (it) is forbidden to convey to belligerent powers or to their subjects—are considered: Arms, ammunition, etc."

(No. 27, p. 510): Provisional Law No. 11, prohibiting the exportation from Iceland of goods imported from Great Britain during the World War, June 19, 1915:

"SEC. 1. It shall be forbidden to export from Iceland goods of any kind whatever which are imported thereinto from Great Britain."

(No. 33a, p. 519): Law No. 104, concerning the establishment of a system of observation of ships on account of the civil war in Spain, April 16, 1937:

"* * * that no Danish ship must carry arms or other war material to, or land such material in, Spain, and * * *."

FINLAND

(No. 3, p. 578): Law regarding the prohibition of the export of war supplies to Bolivia and Paraguay, November 24, 1934:

"Export of all kinds of war supplies to Bolivia and Paraguay shall be prohibited."

FRANCE

(No. 3, p. 583): Statute on the manufacture of and the commerce in arms, July 14, 1860:

"ART. 9. The exportation of munitions or parts of munitions of war is allowed, subject to conditions determined by law or by rules of public administration.

"Nevertheless, an imperial decree may prohibit this exportation across a frontier for a particular destination and for a particular period."

(No. 3a, p. 584): Statute modifying the conditions under which the minister of war may prohibit the exportation of arms and ammunition, April 13, 1895:

"ART. 2. Decrees issued * * * may prohibit the exportation of munitions, parts of munitions, and ammunition of all kinds."

(No. 11, p. 594): Decree prohibiting the export of arms, ammunition, and implements of war to Spain in the Carlist Rebellion, March 18, 1873:

"ARTICLE 1. The exportation, reexportation from warehouses, and the transit of the goods (as specified in the schedule annexed to the present decree) across the frontier and destined for Spain are prohibited."

Schedule of objects the exportation, reexportation, and transit of which across the frontier to Spain are prohibited, March 18, 1873:

"First. Munitions of war of all sorts."

(No. 12, p. 595): Decree prohibiting the exportations of arms to Cuba, January 9, 1896:

"The President of the French Republic, considering the law of August 14, 1885, considering the law of April 13, 1895, considering the article IV, title III, of the law of August 6–22, 1791:

"ARTICLE 1. The exportation from France, Algeria, the French colonies and protectorates of all munitions of war, parts of manufactured ammunition destined directly for Cuba is hereby prohibited * * *."

GERMANY

(No. 6, p. 636): Proclamation of the Senate prohibiting the exportation of contraband of war and concerning blockade, April 10, 1854:

"Ammunition, guns, gunpowder, saltpeter, sulfur, balls, caps, all kinds of arms, and, generally speaking, all objects which may be used in warfare, is hereby prohibited to belligerent powers * * *."

(No. 6b, p. 637): Proclamation of the Senate regarding the procedure in shipment of contraband to neutral ports, May 22, 1854:

"* * * The Senate, with respect to the export of articles contraband of war to neutral ports, the prohibition of such articles to the countries of the belligerent powers remaining in force * * *."

Supra, No. 6.

(No. 8, p. 639): Act concerning the maintenance of neutrality in the present war, May 5, 1854:

"The transport to and from the belligerent states of their troops, arms, or munitions, as well as other articles serving for hostile purposes, and regarded by the general law of nations as contraband of war, is prohibited in Hanoverian ships.

"The exportation of the materials mentioned to any one of the belligerent states is forbidden, no matter under what flag it may be intended to take place."

(No. 10, p. 643): Proclamation warning against trade and traffic with Norway, May 25, 1814:

"* * * Honorable council is confident that none of the citizens of Lubeck will, out of greediness, share in war trade * * *."

(No. 13, p. 644): Ordinance of the Senate concerning the export of contraband of war, April 11, 1854:

"The exportation of articles contraband of war for the belligerent powers or their subjects is prohibited."

(No. 14, p. 645): Ordinance of the Grand Duke prohibiting the export of contraband of war, April 15, 1854:

"The export of contraband of war from our states to the states of the belligerent powers is prohibited.

"The following are deemed to be contraband * * *."

(No. 16, p. 649): Royal declaration and ordinance concerning navigation and maritime commerce, April 30, 1781:

"ARTICLE 1. That they shall not take part in the present war under any pretext nor, under the Prussian flag, supply the belligerent powers with any merchandise which is generally regarded as contraband and forbidden, * * *."

(No. 17d, p. 657): Notice issued by the Ministers of Interior and of Finance concerning the prohibition of export of horses, December 18, 1854:

"* * * the export of horses is hereby prohibited * * *."

(No. 24, p. 663): Ordinance prohibiting the export and transit of arms, ammunition, gun powder, explosives, and implements of war, to the territories of the Polish Republic and the Russian Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, July 25, 1920.

(No. 24a, p. 664): Ordinance supplementing the ordinance of July 25, 1920, prohibiting the export and transit of arms, ammunition, gun powder, explosives, and implements of war, to the territories of the Polish Republic and the Russian Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, July 30, 1920.

HAITI

(No. 5, p. 638): Proclamation of neutrality in the World War, August 7, 1914:

"It is especially forbidden to make * * * or to furnish * * * any means of war to any of the belligerents, under penalty of the laws."

(No. 3, p. 682): Declaration of neutrality in the Crimean War, November 18, 1854:

"His Majesty the Emperor, desiring to preserve neutrality in the war which is being waged in Europe between the Allied Powers and Russia, is pleased to decree as follows: * * *

"Subjects of the Empire are forbidden * * * to transport, on ships under the Haitian flag, contraband goods in behalf of any of the belligerent powers."

ITALY

(No. 1, p. 711): Notification prohibiting the carriage of contraband of war, April 7, 1819:

"We forbid, captains, owners of our merchant marine, and merchants to employ ships flying our royal flag, for the transportation of contraband of war, to any port or coast of a nation at war, toward which we maintain strict neutrality, and. * * *

(No. 15a, p. 725): Law of neutrality, July 8, 1938:

"ART. 9. Private commerce. By royal decree, there may be prohibited in whole or in part:

"1. Commerce in arms and in war material by private parties in favor of the belligerent states.

"2. The transportation of the above-mentioned articles across the territory of the state."

JAPAN

(No. 1, p. 737): Neutrality proclamations—revised proclamation of neutrality in the Franco-Prussian war, August 29, 1870:

"ART. V. Japanese vessels are prohibited from carrying troops, arms, or munitions of war for the service of either of the hostile parties."

LIBERIA

(No. 3, p. 749): Proclamation of neutrality in the Spanish-American War, June 20, 1898:

"(2) The supplying or aiding to furnish any guns, ammunitions, or other munitions of war," forbidden. * * *

(No. 5, p. 753): Proclamation prohibiting trade with belligerent powers, June 20, 1916:

"It is prohibited to import or export any article or articles of commerce for and in behalf of any citizen or subject of either of the belligerent states * * *."

(No. 1, p. 783): Act concerning the power to prohibit the exportation of horses and other articles, July 24, 1870.

NOTE.—By two decrees issued in pursuance of the above act on July 24, 1870, exportation of horses and of munitions and gunpowder were prohibited for the duration of the Franco-Prussian War.

Similar decrees prohibiting export of ammunitions to belligerent countries were issued on May 31, 1898, during the Spanish-American War, and on August 30, 1900, during the rebellion in China.

(No. 1a, p. 784): Act regarding the power to prohibit the exportation and transportation of certain articles, August 3, 1914:

"ART. 1. In case of war or threat of war, we shall have power to prohibit altogether or to restrict the exportation of necessary commodities throughout the territories of the Kingdom or in any part thereof."

NOTE.—The above act was modified and amplified by the acts of December 31, 1915, of September 1, 1917, and of June 3, 1918.

In pursuance of the above act, a great number of decrees were issued during the World War prohibiting the exportation and transit of arms, ammunition, and implements of war, raw material, semimanufactured and manufactured goods.

(No. 8, p. 796): Proclamation of neutrality in the war between various South American states, March 17, 1866:

"ART. 6. It is prohibited to deliver arms or ammunition to war vessels of the belligerent parties, as also to assist them in any way in adding to their crew, arms, or equipment * * *."

(No. 9, p. 796): Proclamation of neutrality in the Russo-Turkish War, May 15, 1877:

"* * * And they are not permitted * * * to provide for or convey to them * * * contraband of war * * * or to trade in spoil."

(No. 19, p. 812): Notice by the Ministry for Foreign Affairs warning against carriage of contraband in Dutch ships in the Crimean War, April 14, 1854:

"* * *, in contravention to the obligations imposed on neutral powers by international law, to export ammunition by sea * * *."

(No. 21a, p. 817): Notice of the Government concerning the observance of neutrality in the Spanish-American War, May 3, 1898:

"Furthermore are prohibited:

"(b) The exportation of arms, ammunition, or other war material to the belligerents."

NICARAGUA

(No. 4, p. 826): Laws regarding customs and ports, maritime commerce and vessels of the Republic of Nicaragua, 1928:

"ART. 604. The transit of war materials is prohibited."

NORWAY

(No. 3, p. 832): Declaration of principles of neutrality in case of war between European states, December 15, 1853.

Text: Supra, Denmark, No. 3.

NOTE.—The principles agreed upon between Sweden and Norway on the one hand and Denmark on the other hand.

(No. 4, p. 833): Royal ordinance, May 4, 1803, March 15, 1854:

"ART. 13. As according to the principles generally agreed upon, the subjects of neutral governments are not permitted to have goods on board which are considered as contraband of war destined for, or belonging to, the belligerent powers. * * *

"ART. 16. * * * Nor shall it be lawful for the owner or master of any vessel to let the same be used for the transport of military or naval forces, arms, or ammunition of any description whatsoever."

(No. 5, p. 836): General Penal Code, May 22, 1902:

"ART. 85. Any person who, by acting toward a foreign state in a way contrary to the law of nations, or by abetting such conduct, exposes Norway to war or hostile measures, shall be liable to detention for a period not exceeding 2 years, but if war breaks out, 4 years.

"Under extremely aggravating circumstances imprisonment may be inflicted for similar periods."

(No. 6, p. 836): Ordinance of the Crown Prince Regent respecting the admission of foreign warships to Norwegian ports, April 23, 1904.

Supra, No. 4a.

(No. 7, p. 837): Royal proclamation relative to the regulation of Norwegian trade and shipping in time of war, April 30, 1904:

"All kinds of goods, including those belonging to the subjects of belligerents, may be carried in Norwegian vessels, as neutral, with the exception of so-called contraband of war."

Supra, No. 4a.

Supra, No. 4b.

(No. 14, p. 844): Ordinance prescribing certain regulations regarding shipping during the war between Spain and Peru, March 7, 1864.

Supra, No. 4.

Supra, No. 4a.

Supra, No. 4b.

NOTE.—The above ordinance was put into effect: July 25, 1870, in the Franco-Prussian War; May 5, 1877; February 10, 1904, in the Russo-Japanese War.

(No. 26a, p. 854): Royal resolution concerning the prohibition of aid in the Spanish civil war, April 16, 1937:

"The foreign ministry is empowered to prohibit Norwegian ships from transporting men, arms, ammunition, airplanes, or parts thereof, to Spain * * *."

(No. 29, p. 856): Circular regarding shipping in time of war, February 10, 1904:

"* * * Royal ordinance of March 7, 1864, prescribing * * *."

(Supra, No. 14.)

PERU

(No. 5, p. 872): Proclamation of neutrality in the Franco-Prussian War October 24, 1870:

"The sale of every article reputed as contraband of war is prohibited."

PORTUGAL

(No. 7, p. 905): Royal decree regarding Portuguese neutrality in the war between Austria, etc., and Prussia and Italy, July 2, 1866:

"It is lawful to carry under the Portuguese flag any articles of merchandise of legitimate trade belonging to the subjects of either of the belligerent powers. * * *

"1. * * * except contraband * * *."

SPAIN

(No. 7, p. 933): Royal decree concerning neutrality in the American Civil War, June 17, 1861:

"The transportation of effects of war is forbidden, * * *."

(No. 8, p. 935): Decree concerning neutrality in the Franco-Prussian War, July 26, 1870:

"The transport of warlike effects, * * * for the belligerents is prohibited."

SWEDEN

(No. 1, p. 950): Decree establishing marine regulation, December 23, 1800:

"Swedish ships destined for the ports of a belligerent power must, with the utmost care and under the severest penalties, avoid carrying any contraband. * * *

"A Swedish ship cannot be employed by a belligerent power to transport troops, arms, or any warlike implements."

(No. 2, p. 953): Regulations regarding commerce and navigation with foreign maritime powers in time of war, January 21, 1804:

"It is furthermore forbidden any Swedish captain to allow himself or the vessel he commands to be employed to transport, for either of the belligerent parties, troops or munitions of war as above specified, * * *."

(No. 3, p. 955): Notification of principle of neutrality to be followed by Sweden in case of war, January 28, 1854.

Text: Supra, Denmark, No. 3.

See also supra, Norway, No. 3, editors' note.

(No. 4, p. 955): Decree setting forth regulations to be observed for the security of Swedish commerce and navigation during war between foreign maritime powers, April 8, 1854:

"SEC. 5. All kinds of goods * * * may be carried in Swedish ships as neutral, except contraband of war; * * *.

"SEC. 6. Swedish sea captains are forbidden * * * to carry articles contraband of war for any belligerent power.

"SEC. 7. Vessels belonging to belligerents may bring into or take away from Swedish harbors any and every kind of goods, * * * always excepting contraband of war."

(No. 4a, p. 958): Ordinance determining "lead" to be regarded as contraband of war, September 13, 1855.

(No. 4b, p. 958): Ordinance interpreting paragraph 5 of the ordinance of April 8, 1854, concerning contraband of war, July 29, 1870:

"* * * We have therefore judged it proper and useful to declare that the restriction imposed by the said section upon the right of transporting contraband goods in Swedish bottoms does not apply to cases where goods of this category which do not belong or are not destined to belligerent powers or their subjects are transported in Swedish bottoms between the ports of neutral powers."

(No. 7, p. 961): Royal ordinance relative to Swedish commerce and navigation in time of war between foreign powers, April 30, 1904:

"All kinds of goods, * * * may be carried in neutral Swedish ships, except contraband of war." (Supra, No. 4, 7.)

"The direct transport of coal cargoes from Swedish ports to the ports of belligerent powers is forbidden."

(No. 12, p. 967): Royal decree prohibiting the export of arms and ammunition, December 19, 1930 (as amended by the royal decrees of March 3, 1933, and October 18, 1935):

"ART. 1. It is prohibited to export to foreign countries * * *."

(Here follows a list of some 40 chemical compounds that have uses in war, and some 60 different kinds of war weapons and supplies.)

(No 14, p. 971): Proclamation regarding the application of the ordinance of April 8, 1854, in the Sardinian War, May 13, 1859. (Supra, No. 4.)

(No. 15, p. 972): Proclamation of neutrality in the Austro-Prussian War, July 4, 1866:

"* * * we wish hereby to caution all persons concerned to strictly observe our proclamation of April 8, 1854 * * *." (Supra 4 and supra 4a.)

(No. 16, p. 972): Proclamation of neutrality in the Sino-Japanese War, August 10, 1894:

"* * * desire * * * to direct attention * * * to the strict observance of the royal ordinances * * *." (Supra, No. 4a; supra, No. 4; supra, No. 4b.)

(No. 17, p. 973): Proclamation of neutrality in the war between Austria-Hungary and Serbia, July 31, 1914:

"* * * all concerned that they are enjoined to strict obedience to the proclamation of April 30, 1904, * * *." (Supra, No. 7.)

SWITZERLAND

(No. 11a, p. 1002): Ordinance of the Federal Council concerning the maintenance of Swiss neutrality, May 20, 1859:

"The Swiss Federal Council, desiring to assure in every event the maintenance of good order upon the boundaries of the theater of war, and to prevent all acts incompatible with the neutral position of Switzerland;

"And in consideration of article 90, section 9, of the Federal Constitution and of the decree of the Federal Assembly of May 5, 1859;

"ART. 1. The exportation of munitions, of powder, and of ammunition of war in general across the Swiss-Italian frontier is forbidden, as is likewise all concentration of goods of that nature in proximity to the said frontier."

(No. 12, p. 1003): Ordinance of the Federal Council concerning the maintenance of Swiss neutrality, June 16, 1866:

"ART. 2. The exportation of munitions and materials of war in general to the neighboring belligerent states is forbidden, * * *."

(No. 30a, p. 1041): Communication from the Federal Council to the Federal commissioners in the canton of Tessin, January 6, 1849.

(P. 1042): "The decree of the Federal Assembly will therefore fail in its purpose if arms, ammunition, * * * are introduced from the canton of Tessin; * * * if anything occurs which is contrary to neutrality or which exposes Switzerland to international embarrassment * * *."

(No. 38, p. 1057): Circular of the Federal department of justice and police to the chief police authorities of the cantons, September 20, 1870:

"* * * concerning the maintenance of Swiss neutrality, by the terms of which the exportation of arms and war materials in general to neighboring belligerent states is forbidden * * *."

(No. 39, p. 1058): Order of the administration of the Swiss postal service concerning neutrality, August 8, 1914:

"The exportation of arms, ammunition, and all other materials of war to the adjacent belligerent states is prohibited * * *."

(No. 15a, p. 1008): Ordinance of the Federal Council concerning the maintenance of neutrality, August 4, 1914:

"There is forbidden and ought to be stopped:

"(a) The exportation of arms and munitions and of all military material into the adjacent belligerent states * * *."

RUSSIA—UNION OF SOVIET SOCIALIST REPUBLICS

(No. 5, p. 1072): Declaration of neutrality in the Spanish-American War, April 18–30, 1898:

"The neutral flag covers the enemy's goods, except contraband of war."

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA

(No. 7, p. 1088): Joint resolution to prohibit the export of coal or other material used in war from any seaport of the United States, April 22, 1898:

"* * * the President is hereby authorized, in his discretion, to prohibit the export of coal or other material used in war from any seaport of the United States until otherwise ordered by the President or by Congress."

NOTE.—Amended March 14, 1912, infra, No. 9, and repealed by joint resolution of January 31, 1922, infra, No. 13.

See infra, No. 63.

(No. 9, p. 1089): Amending joint resolution of April 22, 1898, March 14, 1912:

"* * * whenever the President shall find that in any American country conditions of domestic violence exist which are promoted by the use of arms or munitions of war procured from the United States, and shall make proclamation thereof, it shall be unlawful to export, except under such limitations and exceptions as the President shall prescribe, any arms or munitions of war from any place in the United States to such country until * * *."

(No. 13, p. 1095): Joint resolution to prohibit the exportation of arms or munitions of war from the United States to certain countries, and for other purposes, January 31, 1922:

"* * * whenever the President finds that in any American country, or in any country in which the United States exercises extraterritorial jurisdiction, conditions of domestic violence exist which are or may be promoted by the use of arms or munitions of war procured from the United States, and makes proclamation thereof, it shall be unlawful to export, except under such limitations and exceptions as the President prescribes, any arms or munitions of war from any place in the United States to such country until * * *."

(No. 15, p. 1100): Joint resolution providing for the prohibition of the export of arms, ammunition, and implements of war to belligerent countries; the prohibition of the transportation of arms, ammunition, and implements of war by vessels of the United States for the use of belligerent states; for the registration and licensing of persons engaged in the business of manufacturing, exporting, or importing arms, ammunition, or implements of war; and restricting travel by American citizens on belligerent ships during war, August 31, 1935.

(No. 15a, p. 1104): Joint resolution extending and amending the joint resolution approved August 31, 1935, February 29, 1936.

(No. 15b, p. 1106): Joint resolution to amend the joint resolution entitled "Joint resolution providing for the prohibition of the export of arms, ammunition, and implements of war to belligerent countries:

"* * * Approved August 31, 1935, as amended, May 1, 1937."

(No. 17, p. 1117): An act prohibiting for a limited time the exportation of arms and ammunition, and encouraging the importation of the same, May 22, 1794:

"* * * cannon, muskets, pistols, bayonets, swords, cutlasses, musket balls, lead, bombs, grenades, gunpowder, sulfur, or saltpeter, but the exportation of all the aforesaid articles are hereby prohibited for and during the term of 1 year."

(No. 17, p. 1118): An act prohibiting for a limited time the exportation of arms and ammunition, and encouraging the importation of the same, May 22, 1794:

"* * * cannon, muskets, pistols, bayonets, swords, cutlasses, musket balls, lead, bombs, grenades, gunpowder, sulfur, or saltpeter, but the exportation of all the aforesaid articles are hereby prohibited for and during the term of 1 year."

EDITORS' NOTE.—Substantially the same provisions are contained in sections 1–5 of the act of June 14, 1797, "prohibiting, for a limited time, the exportation of arms and ammunition and for encouraging the importation thereof."

By the act of April 7, 1798 (ibid., p. 549), sections 1–4 of the act of June 14, 1797, were continued in force "for 1 year from and after the present session of Congress and from thence to the end of the next session of Congress * * *."

(No. 24, p. 1140): An act supplementary to an act, * * * March 10, 1838:

"* * * required to seize and detain any vessel or any arms or munitions of war which may be provided or prepared for any military expedition or enterprise against the territory or dominions of any foreign prince or state, or any colony, district, or people coterminous with the United States, and with whom they are at peace, * * *."

(No. 25, p. 1143): Joint resolution to prohibit sale of arms or munitions * * * May 28, 1934:

"* * * if President finds prohibition sale of arms and munitions in the United States to those countries now engaged in armed conflict in the Chaco may contribute to the reestablishment of peace between those countries, * * * makes proclamation * * * it shall be unlawful to sell, except under such limitations and exceptions as the President prescribes, any arms or munitions of war in any place in the United States to the countries now engaged in that armed conflict, or to any person, company, or association acting in the interest of either country * * *."

(No. 26, p. 1143): Joint resolution to prohibit the exportation of arms, ammunition, * * * to Spain, January 8, 1937:

"* * * during * * * civil strife now in Spain it shall, * * * be unlawful to export arms, ammunition, or implements of war from any place in the United States, or possession, to Spain or to any other foreign country for transshipment to Spain or for use of either of the opposing forces in Spain."

(No. 28, p. 1149): Act to suspend commercial intercourse between United States and France, * * * June 13, 1798.

(No. 32, p. 1161): Act to interdict commercial intercourse between United States and Great Britain and France, * * * March 1, 1809.

(No. 32a, p. 1168): Act to amend and continue in force certain parts of the act entitled "An act to interdict the commercial intercourse between the United States and Great Britain and France * * *." June 28, 1809.

(No. 32b, p. 1171): Act concerning the commercial intercourse between the United States and Great Britain and France, * * * May 1, 1810.

(No. 32c, p. 1171): Act supplementary to the act entitled "An act concerning the commercial intercourse between the United States and Great Britain and France * * *." March 2, 1811.

(No. 33, p. 1172): Proclamation of neutrality in the French Revolutionary Wars, April 22, 1793:

"* * * whosoever of the citizens of the United States shall render himself liable to punishment or forfeiture under the law of nations by committing, aiding, or abetting hostilities against any of the said powers, or by carrying to any of them those articles which are deemed contraband by the modern usage of nations, will not receive the protection of the United States against such punishment or forfeiture; and, further, that I have given instructions to those officers, to whom it belongs, to cause prosecutions to be instituted against all persons who shall, within the cognizance of the courts of the United States, violate the law of nations with respect to the powers at war, or any of them.

"GEORGE WASHINGTON."

(No. 49, p. 1189): Proclamation of neutrality in the Franco-Prussian War, August 22, 1870:

"* * * and that while all persons may lawfully, and without restriction by reason of the aforesaid state of war, manufacture and sell within the United States arms and munitions of war and other articles ordinarily known as contraband of war, yet they cannot carry such articles upon the high seas for the use or service of either belligerent. * * *

"U. S. GRANT."

(No. 55, p. 1204): Proclamation of neutrality in the World War, August 4, 1914:

"* * * all persons may lawfully and without restriction by reason of the aforesaid state of war manufacture and sell within the United States arms and munitions of war and other articles ordinarily known as contraband of war, yet they cannot carry such articles upon the high seas for the use or service of a belligerent, * * *.

"WOODROW WILSON."

(No. 63, p. 1214): Proclamation prohibiting exportation of arms and munitions to the Dominican Republic, October 14, 1905:

"* * * joint resolution, April 22, 1898, * * *

"* * * and by virtue of joint resolution, April 22, 1898, * * * export of arms, ammunition, and munitions of war of every kind, from any port in the United States or in Porto Rico to any port in the Dominican Republic, is prohibited, * * *."

(No 64, p. 1215): Proclamation prohibiting exportation of arms and ammunition to Mexico, March 14, 1912:

"* * * it shall be unlawful to export except * * * any arms or munitions of war from any place in the United States to such country * * *."

(No. 66, p. 1217): Proclamation prohibiting exportation of arms and ammunition to Mexico, July 12, 1919:

"* * * it shall be unlawful to export except * * * any arms or munitions of war from any place in the United States to such country * * *."

(No. 67, p. 1219): Proclamation prohibiting exportation of arms and ammunition to China, March 4, 1922.

No. 67a, p. 1220): Proclamation prohibiting exportation of arms and ammunition to Cuba, May 2, 1924.

(No. 68, p. 1222): Proclamation prohibiting sale of arms and munitions of war to Bolivia and Paraguay, May 28, 1934.

(No. 69, p. 1223): Proclamation defining arms, ammunition, and implements of war for the purposes of the Neutrality Act, 1935, September 25, 1935.

(No. 70, p. 1227): Proclamation prohibiting American citizens from traveling on belligerent ships during the Italo-Ethiopian War, October 5, 1935:

"I do hereby give notice that any citizen of the United States who may travel on such a vessel, contrary to the provisions of the said joint resolution, will do so at his own risk.

"FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT."

(No. 71, p. 1228): Proclamation prohibiting the exportation of arms, ammunition, and implements of war to Italy and Ethiopia, October 5, 1935.

(No. 72, p. 1231): Proclamation prohibiting the exportation of arms, ammunition, and implements of war to Spain, May 1, 1937.

URUGUAY

(No. 1, p. 1265): Decree establishing rules of neutrality to be observed in the ports, roadsteads, and territorial waters of Uruguay, August 7, 1914:

"ART. 14. The following articles are declared to be contraband of war according * * *: All classes of arms, military apparatus, cannon, etc.

"ART. 15. The maritime authorities will see that the merchant vessels load no contraband of war * * *."

A Forum for Views on Neutrality

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. MARTIN J. KENNEDY

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, October 18, 1939

LETTER FROM HON. MARTIN J. KENNEDY TO SPEAKER BANKHEAD AND HIS REPLY TO MR. KENNEDY

Mr. MARTIN J. KENNEDY. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following letters.

I believe it would be of great value to the membership of the House to have a forum, as I suggested in my letter of October 4, 1939. The forum would establish a precedent in House procedure, but a precedent which might contribute much to the solution of the problem of unlimited debate which confronts the House when an important issue like neutrality is before the Congress.

OCTOBER 4, 1939.

Speaker WILLIAM B. BANKHEAD,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. SPEAKER: In my opinion, the existing arrangement between the Democratic leader and the Republican leader in the House of Representatives concerning the nature and character of legislative business which the House may transact during this special session denies to the membership an opportunity to contribute to the solution of the neutrality problem. It was because of neutrality that President Roosevelt convened this extraordinary session.

From press reports it would appear that the Senate will not be ready to vote on their neutrality bill for several weeks. Until such time as the Senate has had a vote on this bill the House program permits us to do nothing but mark time.

In a closed session the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations considered the neutrality bill passed by the House of Representatives in July. The public and Members of the Senate and House were barred from attending these meetings and expressing their views. The present bill, which has been reported by the Senate committee, is practically an entirely new bill. Under these circumstances the silence imposed upon the House should no longer be enforced.

We have been told by President Roosevelt that the international situation is most acute and requires prompt and positive action by the Congress. Therefore, let the Committee on Foreign Affairs of the House meet at least every other day during this emergency. At these meetings all Representatives should have an opportunity to offer suggestions concerning neutrality. The debate in the Senate will not reveal all that is to be known on the subject, nor do the Members of that body possess a monopoly on patriotism and wisdom.

Should my suggestion be adopted, it would not be necessary to have any formal legislation before the House Committee on Foreign Affairs. The committee meetings would serve as a forum for House Members who might have valuable information. At these forum meetings each Representative will have an opportunity to give full, public, and official expression to his views on neutrality. Unless the Members are afforded this opportunity now for an expression of their opinion, there will be prolonged, unnecessary delay in the session.

The House of Representatives is a true cross section of the American people. Let the Members of this House give voice to the hopes which all Americans have in their minds and hearts during these difficult days. In this hour, when the United States is the center of political gravity of the world, we must not allow the House of Representatives to become a mere audience in this critical juncture in the Nation's history.

The man on the street looks to the Congress for guidance, the people of the Nation rely upon our judgment, and the countries of the world wait upon our decision. Our solemn duty demands that we work ceaselessly in the cause of peace for our citizens, our Nation, and the world.

Sincerely yours,

MARTIN J. KENNEDY.

OCTOBER 11, 1939.

Hon. MARTIN J. KENNEDY,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MARTIN: I have received and considered your thoughtful letter of October 4, suggesting the desirability of having the Committee on Foreign Affairs of the House to meet occasionally during the discussion of the neutrality bill in the Senate in order to have Members offer suggestions and arguments with reference to that bill when it shall return to the House for further consideration.

I am not now prepared to make any suggestions to the Foreign Affairs Committee on this matter. It is my opinion, however, that while Congress is not transacting any other official business it is an excellent idea to afford all Members of the House an opportunity to express their views on this most important question, and I will be glad to recognize any Member who desires to secure time for that purpose. I really believe that this course would be more effective in carrying out your views than to have statements made before the Committee on Foreign Affairs acting as a forum as suggested in your letter.

With best wishes, I am,

Yours very sincerely,

W. B. BANKHEAD, Speaker.

The Proposed Trade Agreement With the Argentine

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FRANCIS H. CASE

OF SOUTH DAKOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, October 18, 1939

STATEMENT BY HON. FRANCIS H. CASE OF SOUTH DAKOTA BEFORE THE COMMITTEE ON RECIPROCITY INFORMATION

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include my statement before the Committee on Reciprocity Information at the hearing on the proposed trade agreement with the Argentine, Monday, October 16, 1939, as follows:

Chairman Grady and gentlemen of the committee, again I am here to say that trade is a two-way street at home, also. The list of items proposed for consideration in a trade agreement with the Argentine would make one think that the western farmer had been singled out for sacrifice: Livestock, hides, wool, turkeys, flaxseed, and linseed oil, cheese, dairy and meat products.

Are these not the very items which the western farmer has been told to produce to get away from grain farming?

Are they not, in fact, the items on which the western farmer has had to rely for any material income during the past 7 hard, dry years? How, then, will American prosperity be helped by attacking these markets?

Certainly the members of this committee need no argument for the proposition that the domestic farm market is the best market in the world for our manufactured goods, for automobiles and clothing, for machinery, and for shoes. The statement that our national prosperity bottoms on the prosperity of our farmers has been made by every important leader in the country. Why single it out for sacrifice at this time?

Many people are scheduled for appearance. Details of the several items will be discussed by many. Permit me to use one illustration for my general proposition.

In late August a party of about 50 representatives of the various branches of the Department of Agriculture visited my district. They were making a field tour and went from one ranch to another to see what the several Federal programs were doing.

We visited one man who was the star exhibit. He had been down and out; had lost his farm and lost his livestock. The Federal land bank and the Land Bank Commissioner had helped him refinance his farm. The Farm Credit Administration made a crop loan. The Farm Security Administration had provided him with a rehabilitation loan to buy some young cows.

He was running his stock on a pasture aided by the soil-conservation program.

He was taken as the star exhibit of cooperation among the Federal agencies. He told how he had bought the heifers, the increase they had made in weight, and the number of calves they had this year. He had made a good buy on the cattle—they were now worth almost double what he had paid.

He was asked this question: "What is your second line of defense? If the market breaks for cattle, what would you live on?" The rancher thought a minute and said, "I don't know. Guess I haven't got any unless it's ma's turkeys."

His wife had 250 turkeys. Needless to say, the Government has a double interest in the maintenance of fair prices for both cattle and turkeys—the well-being of the citizen and the investment in the farmer's welfare.

Now, the proposals for this trade agreement strike at both of those lines of defense—cattle and turkeys—and in so doing they work at cross purposes with the efforts of the Government to restore self-support to western farmers.

The Argentine farmer does not worry about meeting living costs based on a wage-and-hour law, nor social-security taxes. He ships by water to New York for 2 cents a pound. He sells his turkeys for from 9 to 12 cents a pound. The present tariff on dressed turkeys is 10 cents per pound.

If the tariff is lowered, it will reduce the returns on domestic turkeys and destroy the industry. A nickel cut may mean 50 cents on a bird.

I make this protest on the request of the alarmed growers in my State who this year have 870,000 turkeys to market, and remember that I have used this item only for illustration. Go down the list—livestock, hides, wool, flax, dairy products—and you will find that the items largely proposed for consideration at this time are items that strike at the western farmer, and, striking at him, they strike at the domestic market which supplies the greatest and best market for the domestic manufacturer and worker in factories and mills.

In about 6 months the power granted by Congress for the negotiation of reciprocal-trade agreements expires. Presumably an attempt will be made to get a further extension of time for this program. The record will come up for full review. Be careful what you do. It is undoubtedly true that the people of the United States want friendly relations with the people of the Argentine, but neither Argentina nor the United States will profit by a destruction of the domestic economy of either nation.

I earnestly urge that the committee reconsider the items for consideration and not lay the burden of sacrifice on the western farmer by reducing protection on the items which are the backbone of his buying power.

Raise the Embargo on Legislation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM LEMKE

OF NORTH DAKOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, October 17, 1939

Mr. LEMKE. Mr. Speaker, Members of Congress are receiving hundreds of letters calling attention to a real emergency from farmers and laboring people, stating that they have no money with which to buy food, fuel, or clothing for themselves and their families during the coming winter. These letters come from the drought-stricken grasshopper-infested areas. They come from areas where they have had little or no crop for the last 5 years—where the little grain and livestock the farmer produced, he was compelled to sell below the cost of production.

In the meantime, the bureaucracy—not the democracy—which runs the United States exacted a promise from the chairmen of the committees to consider no legislation except the repeal of the embargo. Some Members are attempting to raise the embargo on legislation. These Members are more interested in helping the destitute farmers and laboring men than in making millions for Morgan and the Du Ponts out of credits and munitions.

Meanwhile, the Departments of State and Agriculture are again busy selling the farmer down the river. This through trade-agreement negotiations with Argentina. They intend to lower the tariff in this agreement on flax, livestock, turkeys, dairy, and other farm products.

I believe that I represent the overwhelming majority of farmers of this Nation when I state that we are opposed to any reduction of the tariff on any agricultural product that we can produce. Why always make agriculture the goat? Are not our own farmers to be preferred to the "landed barons" of South America?

We are especially opposed to any reduction of the tariff in the proposed trade agreement with Argentina on flax or any other grain or grain product. We are equally opposed to any reduction of the tariff on livestock and poultry or on any product of these, such as meat, poultry, or dairy products. We are also unalterably opposed to lowering the tariff on any substitute for these products. These products the American farmer can produce in sufficient amount to satisfy our wants. Why import them?

On these products we do not only favor the present tariffs but feel that they ought to be raised, in place of reduced, until our farmer gets cost of production, plus 10-percent advantage over foreign products or substitutes. Why enslave our own farmers and make them compete with peon labor—with slavery in Latin America?

Ninety-four percent of our trade is with ourselves. Our boundary line to this 94 percent domestic trade is the Atlantic on the east, the Pacific on the west, the Canadian boundary on the north, and the Gulf of Mexico and Mexico on the south. Out of the 6 percent of our foreign trade between 2 or 3 percent consists of trading in international money and credit—stocks and bonds.

Why should our farmer again be made the shock absorber for the international manufacturer and the international banker? Why should we give part of our domestic agricultural market to Argentina so that the international banker can collect on stocks and bonds, and the international manufacturer sell his wares to Argentina at the expense of the American farmer?

Why not develop our own markets—the 94 percent domestic trade? There are still millions among us in want and without purchasing power. It has been foolishly suggested that we loan the Latin American republics more money so as to enable them to buy our manufactured products. Such a policy is unsound and irrational. If we want to loan any money let us loan it to our own people. Then we will at least be dealing with ourselves. Our people will make better use of the loans and consume more of our products than Latin Americans. The money we loan them will continue to do business in the United States, not in Argentina.

Because of mechanical inventions and chemical discoveries all nations have become more and more self-sufficient. This is especially true of the United States. Foreign trade is no longer essential to our welfare. There are still a few things that we cannot successfully produce, but we can always buy them in the world's open market, as long as we have the cash.

Why sell our farmer's market and our laborer's energy to foreign nations who are unable or unwilling to pay unless we give them credit or part of our domestic agricultural market? Is not that policy just as insane as the policy of destroying agricultural wealth in order to bring about the abundant life? Let us forget it. That policy should be a policy of the past, not of the future.

I am not opposed to trading with foreign nations. But rather as a matter of friendship than as a matter of diplomacy. We are the poorest diplomats in the world. We generally trade two or three good horses for an old nag. Let us buy the few things we need from other nations in the open markets of the world without trade agreements.

Likewise, let other nations buy what they need from us in the open markets. Let them buy what they need on the same terms and conditions that our own people buy. Let them pay with their own money. We ought to be through with financing other nations. The more than $14,500,000,000 of broken promises in the United States Treasury should be sufficient education for us.

When the law authorizing these reciprocal-trade agreements was up in Congress, I opposed it on the ground that it was in the interest of the international banker and the international manufacturer at the expense of American agriculture and American labor. I opposed it on the ground that it was unconstitutional, and I still feel that it is unconstitutional. A trade agreement is a treaty, and a treaty must be confirmed by two-thirds of the Senators present and voting.

The American National Livestock Association and the National Cooperative Milk Producers' Federation, together with other agricultural representatives, have filed splendid arguments against the proposed trade agreement with Argentina. These arguments have been presented in their briefs to the Tariff Commission. I shall not attempt to enlarge on them, but I wish to enter an additional protest in behalf of the farmers' wives, part of whose domestic turkey and poultry market is about to be given to Argentina. It seems to me that we ought to at least protect the labor of the farm women and children in our reciprocal-trade agreements.

Therefore I respectfully suggest that the tariff be not lowered on any agricultural product and especially not on flax or any grain or grain product, nor on any livestock or poultry or any livestock or poultry product, such as meat, dairy, or other products. Let us raise the "embargo on legislation" and keep the embargo on arms, munitions, and implements of war.

The argument by the Departments of State and Agriculture that we must sell our domestic markets in order to live in peace with our neighbors is ridiculous. Friendship which has to be bought is not friendship. It is not worth having. It is worse because it breeds contempt and hatred for our Nation. Let us extend the glad hand of good fellowship to all nations in the open market places. Let us deal fairly and honorably with all.

Let us take care of our own people. Other nations will take care of themselves somehow. Let us not be the instigators or the profiteers of their quarrels or wars. Let us not sell arms, munitions, and implements of war—of death and destruction—to any nation at any time or in any place. To do so makes us an accomplice of assassination both before and after the fact. It will in the end bring upon us the just and earned contempt of the world.

The American Way

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN C. KUNKEL

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, October 16, 1939

Mr. KUNKEL. Mr. Speaker, when two opposing groups of American citizens engage in an argument over a debatable and controversial question, the most important point for each group to keep in mind is that both groups desire the ultimate good of the United States of America. We must debate strenuously and intensively. We must try to show errors in our opponents' arguments. We must attempt in every honorable way to convince our opponents. We must not, however, impugn their motives without cause. If we are defeated and if the other view prevails, then we must always remember that that other view represents the American view and we must support it wholeheartedly and without reservation.

Only one set of circumstances could possibly prevent such a result. That would be if the House were not permitted to vote specifically on the one vital question of whether or not the arms embargo should be repealed. If this issue is confused with other issues so that an accurate result on that particular issue cannot be obtained, there doubtless will be many who will deny that the final legislation enacted does represent the true American viewpoint.

The longer the debate over the repeal of the arms embargo continues, the more apparent it becomes that the two opposing views are held because of the fact the holders of them start from different premises. It becomes increasingly clear that those who wish to have the arms embargo repealed desire this result because they feel that the Allies must be helped to win in order to preserve the democracies and democracy as a form of government on the face of the earth. They feel it is essential that the democratic forms of government which prevailed in France and Great Britain prior to the outbreak of the present war must be continued. They feel that democratic forms of government must be spread over the rest of Europe. They feel this is necessary in order that our democracy here may continue. Consequently, they feel that the United States must take steps to insure the victory of her Allies in the last World War. Hence, President Roosevelt's statement in his message to Congress, January 4, 1939, that—

> God-fearing democracies of the world which observe the sanctity of treaties in their dealings with other nations cannot safely be indifferent to international lawlessness anywhere.

On the other hand, those who desire to keep the embargo on arms invariably base their argument on the major premise that this embargo is essential in order to keep us out of war; and on the further premise that unless we do keep out of war the United States will lose its own democracy and democracy will vanish from the face of the earth. They believe that war is not the cure of the various "isms," but, rather, that it is the cause and breeder of them.

Now, the important inference which I draw from the above statements is that practically everyone—no matter which side they take—is actuated by the ambition and desire to attain the same high-minded objectives. Both sides wish to preserve the integrity and institutions of this country. Both sides wish to preserve those ideals which we all love and which we consider essential to our welfare both as individuals and as a nation. Both sides wish to extend those ideals and those institutions which we reverence for the benefit of others in other countries.

So during this debate let us all realize that our opponents have the same purposes and objectives that we have. Let us respect their ideals and motives. Let us honor their judgment and objectives. And when the final result is decided, let us all join together and say, "This is the American view. This is our way, and we all support it."

Equipment

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CLARE E. HOFFMAN

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, October 18, 1939

EDITORIAL FROM THE SOMERSET DAILY AMERICAN

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, the President, confronted by the failure of practically all of his domestic experiments, none of which has been completely successful, all of which have been extravagantly wasteful, has very skillfully, as any shrewd politician might do, by calling a special session, made an effort to divert the attention of the American people from his own failure to the foreign situation. Like a willful child, beaten at his own game, he turns to another game, that of power politics.

Having demonstrated his total inability, his utter lack of capacity to handle our domestic problems, he now wants to sit in with ambitious power-mad rulers across the seas and play their game. No one would object to this were it not that he wants to use as his stake the destiny of our people. Some of his admirers still cling to the thought that he is a superman possessed of a master mind, and have attempted to set forth his qualifications to meet, on equal terms, the wily, unscrupulous players in this age-old gamble with the happiness and the lives of the common people.

For some reason best known to themselves, Washington publishers, editors, and columnists, all too frequently permit the sunshine of official favor to dazzle their eyes, becloud their judgment. Back in the country, editors who, unblinded, not overawed by the false glamour which emanates from the White House, are able to think clearly and portray truthfully some of the human characteristics of the President. Among the hundreds of thousands of such editors is Henry Baker Reiley, and from his Somerset Daily American, I insert the following editorial:

EQUIPMENT

Harlan Miller has written several articles which have appeared in the Washington Post to show the qualifications of Franklin Roosevelt for handling the foreign affairs of the United States Government.

The writer recounts that as a small boy Mr. Roosevelt was taken to Europe by his parents 13 times. The visits averaged about 10 weeks each. In all, Mr. Roosevelt has spent 32½ months on the mother continent. The Roosevelts and the Delanos were engaged in shipping and traveled all over the world. Their letters were read at the James Roosevelt family table and the discussions of them provided the boy Franklin with opportunities for acquiring knowledge of the problems of the lands that are embroiled in the present war.

The Post's writer proceeds to tell of the 29 lands which Franklin Roosevelt has visited; recounts that he has talked with Lloyd George, Clemenceau, Poincaré, Nitti, Balfour, King Albert, and a score of other great men, as the world reckons greatness.

The long list of opportunities the President has had to see and hear about foreign affairs might, were knowledge and wisdom contagious, provide him with an abundance of material on which to work out solutions for the problems that confront him as Chief Executive of the United States.

We have been under the impression, though the writer does not mention it, that the portion of the life of Franklin Roosevelt which has not been spent abroad has been spent in the United States, and he has doubtless had even greater opportunities for the study of the problems of America than he has had for familiarizing himself with our foreign relations.

If the mind of Franklin Roosevelt is as muddled as to foreign affairs as evidence indicates it to be as to domestic affairs, probably it would have been just as well for Mr. Roosevelt, even more so for the Republic, if he had never set foot on Europe, Asia, or wherever abroad he may have been.

It may be unfortunate but it is a fact that people judge men by what they do with their knowledge rather than by the time they have spent in its acquisition.

The late Dr. John A. Brashear never went to college as a student, but he went repeatedly to colleges and universities to receive degrees when there wasn't the remotest chance that a favorable appropriation for the educational institution might be the fruit of the bestowal. Plenty of the university officials who voted honors to Dr. Brashear knew more than he about a number of subjects. It was not the proximity of Dr. Brashear to wisdom and knowledge that made him great but the application which he made of that which he mastered.

So it is with President Roosevelt.

If the colleges and contacts were sufficient to qualify for service, the President would rank high.

But the flare for governmental economy, which appeared to him to be the key to national prosperity while he was a candidate for President, evaporated quickly when a servile Congress assumed that his election endowed him with omniscience and omnipotence.

The squandermania that has distinguished the Roosevelt administration shows to what little purpose the President's study of that phase of government has been.

But Mr. Miller is flattering the President's desire to solve foreign problems.

A little more than 3 years ago the President told an audience at Chautauqua, N. Y., what wonderful security against war was afforded by the then new Neutrality Act.

Now Mr. Roosevelt proclaims his regrets that he ever signed that act.

Whether the superficiality in evidence was greater 3 years ago than now may be a proper subject for debate, but who can tell from what he has said and done how the President will view any situation, domestic or foreign, a year, a month, a day hence?

As Mr. Roosevelt, doubtless summoning to his adjudication of the case all the knowledge he has acquired during the 13 voyages to 29 lands, framed his opinion 3 years ago, he declared with enthusiasm, "Industrial and agricultural production for a war market * * * produces disaster."

If the many years Mr. Roosevelt has lived in America have been unable to provide him with settled opinions on the major domestic problems, such as public debt, Treasury deficits, abatement of unemployment, and taxation, isn't it a waste of time to recount his foreign contacts as evidence of his qualifications for handling foreign relations?

Address of the Postmaster General

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM B. BARRY

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, October 18, 1939

ADDRESS BY HON. JAMES A. FARLEY

Mr. BARRY. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address of Hon. James A. Farley, Postmaster General of the United States, at the dedication of the North Beach Airport, New York City, Sunday, October 15, 1939:

I am happy to participate, as a representative of the Federal Government, in the dedication of this airport to the transportation needs of New York City and the Nation.

This fine civic enterprise owes its existence to Mayor LaGuardia and those associated with him who had the bold foresight and the energy to conceive and carry it through. I feel sure, Mr. Mayor, that the people of New York are proud of your accomplishment and proud of this airport, which will soon take its place among the best known transportation terminals in the country.

The history of North Beach Airport is just beginning. Today its name is well known only to those people who live in this vicinity. But before many years have passed, with the constant development and expansion of aviation, the name of North Beach Airport will be on the lips of air-minded travelers not only in this country but throughout the civilized world.

The growth of New York City from a tiny seaport to a metropolis of several millions has been closely bound up with the development of its facilities for communication and transportation. New York has one of the busiest and best harbors in the world—a water gateway through which pours the trade and commerce of countless nations. New York has magnificent railroad terminals to accommodate the heavy flow of its overland traffic. It has an excellent suburban train service and a subway system without peer. From the earliest times New York has always been quick to provide for the comfort and convenience of those who travel through its portals.

It is only natural, therefore, that the city should have desired air facilities in keeping with its other forms of transportation. This ambition is now realized in the completion of this airport. The runways, the administration building, and the other facilities constructed here are designed to take care of modern air-traffic needs in splendid fashion. Those in charge of planning had the wisdom and the vision to make provision not only for the large seaplanes of today but for those larger planes which will be flying the airways a few years hence.

The rapid development of aviation constitutes a stirring and romantic chapter in the age-long struggle of mankind to overcome the elements. Many of those assembled here remember the time, only a few decades ago, when the sight of a plane in the sky brought forth both wonder and amazement. For centuries men dreamed of flying through space, and bold spirits in every land worked and planned for its accomplishment. It remained for an American to be the first to achieve this miracle of the twentieth century. Those early planes awaken only curiosity and a faint sense of amusement now. The birdmen of today call them "crates" and wonder how the intrepid pioneers who flew such frail craft ever got them off the ground or held them together in the air.

The huge air liners which span the continents and the oceans tell better than words the story of the remarkable progress that has taken place since the Wright brothers first launched a plane from the sand dunes of the Carolinas. The speed, comfort, and, above all, the safety of these air liners bear ample testimony to the skill and ingenuity of the men and women who are helping to build this great industry in America.

Although we marvel at the progress already made in aviation, it is safe to say that hardly anyone can foresee accurately the period of expansion that lies ahead. There is no element of speculation in the labor and money invested here. The history of transportation, which, in the past, has played such an impressive role in the development of greater New York, justifies your faith in this project. Air transportation and communication are still in the early years of their growth. The day will dawn when the facilities of this expansive airport will be hard pressed to accommodate the mighty air fleets of the future.

It is only 21 years since the Federal Government first established the Air Mail Service, an experimental route covering the 218 miles which separate New York from Washington. This pioneer service swiftly justified the faith and courage of those who had a hand in its inception. From the start the American public gave its sympathy and full cooperation to the infant industry. After a few years the Federal Government gave up the direct ownership and operation of the planes and turned over the mail transport to private carriers. The service was constantly improved and new routes added. From this small pioneering venture the system has developed into the world's greatest air transport service.

The system now embraces a network of more than 37,000 route-miles and last year alone the planes in this service flew a total of 52,000,000 miles. The growth of the foreign air-mail transport system has been just as spectacular. The first line covered a distance of 246 miles from Key West, Fla., to Havana, Cuba. This service now covers more than 36,000 thousand route-miles, with the mail going to many foreign lands as a part of the regular service in this far-reaching international system of communication.

A span of 21 years is a comparatively short time in human history. Yet, as we look back to the inception of the Air Mail Service, it is difficult to realize the trials and handicaps which the early mail pilots were compelled to face. They carried your messages of friendship and business in small planes over uncharted airways, with few safety devices to protect them against the hazards of wind and weather. There were no lighted airways in those days and few intermediate landing fields for use in case of emergency. The radiobeacon was unknown, and very often the pilots were forced to rely on blind flying to feel their way through the dark pockets of the night. The Nation owes a debt of everlasting gratitude to these courageous wingmen, the "pony express riders of the air," who brought the mails through and thus helped to lay the groundwork for the mighty air transport system of today.

The air pilots who guide the air liners of the present are worthy successors to the hardy pioneers of 20 years ago. The safety of pilots and passengers has been vastly increased by technical improvements in the construction of planes. But in the final analysis the safety of flying depends upon the cool head and steady nerves of the man at the controls and the excellent safety record compiled by the American air-transport service is due in large measure to the skill and efficiency of its pilots.

A few figures serve to illustrate in striking fashion the growing confidence of the traveling public in air transportation. Someone has pointed out that a fair-sized auditorium could have accommodated the total number of passengers who rode the airways during the year 1926. To be more specific, the whole number that year was under 6,000. Twelve years later, in 1938, there were 1,300,000 passengers, and the total for this year will be even greater. Stated in another way, the number of air passengers carried annually is now equal to or greater than the entire population of a large city such as Detroit or Los Angeles.

There are more than 2,000 prepared air fields in the United States which are being used constantly by 11,000 planes. There are 26,000 licensed pilots to fly these planes. This year witnessed the beginning of regular transport service across the Atlantic. Service across the Pacific has been in operation for some time, and plans are under way for the establishment of regular service to New Zealand and Australia.

The air liners being built in this country seem destined to win the kind of world supremacy which the Yankee-built clipper ships enjoyed for so long a period during the last century. America now leads the world in the development of civil aviation, and under the able leadership of the men who direct the industry, I feel certain that this proud position will be maintained for many years.

The construction of North Beach Airport was made possible by the financial assistance of the Federal Government. This aid was extended through the W. P. A. program, one of the many constructive measures adopted by the administration to provide employment for idle workers. This program has played a vital part in helping to stabilize the national economy, while at the same time rebuilding the Nation's physical plant. I congratulate every official and every individual who contributed in any way to the construction of this great enterprise. It is a lasting monument to all those who gave their skill and labor in its completion.

It is fortunate for us here in the United States that we can gather together to dedicate an airport of this character to the pursuits of peace, without thought of war or conquest or the dread possibility of armed conflict against another power. Mankind has forged a mighty weapon in the airplane—a weapon that may be used for good or for evil, depending upon the will and purpose of those who use it.

We have chosen the way of peace, and, with God's help, America shall continue to employ her vast system of airplanes and airports for the promotion of friendship, understanding, and good will among nations. We are truly grateful for the fact that our country has escaped the destructive curse of war, and the sympathy of the American people goes out to the people of those other countries less fortunate than our own. At the same time we can assure the world that the impressive air fleet which we are now building will never be used for aggressive purposes against any nation, either large or small. America wants peace, not alone for herself but for all mankind.

It is my honest belief that the splendid army of pilots who man the commercial air lines of this country will never be called upon for military service against another power. Yet I should like to point out that the very existence of these air lines, with their excellent equipment and personnel, is a strong guaranty of the Nation's peace and safety. One of the lessons to be learned from recent events abroad is the fact that a nation strong in air power is well fortified to prevent aggression from any source. Let us continue, then, to encourage the construction of these air forces, so that when we extend the hand of fellowship to other nations the world will understand that it is the hand of strength and not the hand of weakness.

This airport stands here as a symbol of man's conquest of the air. In fact, it has brought the entire world closer to your doors. You are but 4 hours from Chicago by air, and the distance in time to other large cities of the country has been reduced proportionately. The mail can leave here today, or a passenger can leave, and be in Europe tomorrow. By the use of the air mail the door of opportunity has been widened for businessmen and those engaged in trade and commerce. You have at your command here outstanding facilities for peaceful communication with other peoples that will become more important as the years go on.

I am happy to have had the opportunity of participating in these exercises. The creation of this great enterprise is a welcome sign that the pioneering spirit of progress is still alive in America. It is the spirit also of the aviation industry. Those who help to foster and sustain it should be happy in the knowledge that they are doing their part to advance the contentment and well-being of the people of this country and of their fellow men.

The Poll Tax

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LEE E. GEYER

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, October 18, 1939

ARTICLE BY WAYNE GARD

Mr. GEYER of California. Mr. Speaker, as is known by the Members of this body, I am the author of a bill that has as its purpose the doing away of the poll tax as a prerequisite for voting. It is my desire that this bill be heard by the proper committee as soon as the session opens in January. I hope that it will be possible for me to have printed in the RECORD from time to time material bearing on this subject.

Below is reproduced an article from the Christian Century. It is entitled "Disfranchised Dixie." The article was written by Wayne Gard.

[From the Christian Century of September 20, 1939]

DISFRANCHISED DIXIE

(By Wayne Gard)

In eight Southern States, where half the otherwise eligible voters are denied the ballot because of their poverty, a revolt is under way. From the green hills along the Shenandoah to the dusty sagebrush on the banks of the Rio Grande, disfranchised citizens are calling for abolition of the poll tax as a prerequisite to voting. Recent victories in Louisiana and Florida have encouraged them to hope for a clean sweep. If they win in time their victory may have a big influence in control of the 1940 Democratic convention.

Thousands of men and women who live in weatherbeaten cabins and dine on sowbelly and turnip greens never have voted because they could not afford the luxury of poll-tax receipts. This tax, which ranges from one to two dollars a year, still exists in Alabama, Arkansas, Georgia, Mississippi, South Carolina, Tennessee, Texas, and Virginia. Four of these States exempt those voters past 60 years of age, and two exempt all past 45; others require poll-tax receipts of all voters. Some States require receipts for the preceding 3 years, or even proof that all back poll taxes have been paid since the voter was 21. Usually the last day for payment is January 31, months ahead of the election.

KEEPING THE POOR FROM THE POLLS

Denounced by President Roosevelt and by liberal and labor leaders in the South, this archaic tax keeps the poor from the polls and allows cliques of economic royalists to dominate the South and head off progressive legislation. Effects of the tax can be seen by analyzing the vote by States in any national election. In the 1936 Presidential election the poll-tax States—then 9—sent only 24 percent of their voters to the polls, while in the other States 72 percent voted. The vote varied from 13 percent in South Carolina, a poll-tax State, to 88 percent in West Virginia, which does not require tax receipts at the voting booths. In 1928 Herbert Hoover carried Texas by gaining a mere 12 percent of the potential electorate.

Defenders of disfranchisement answer these figures by saying that in the South the election amounts to little, that only the Democratic primary counts. But this argument comes to little when comparison is made between southern and border States that retain the poll-tax requirements and those that have abolished it. Virginia, with 1,300,000 residents of voting age, cast 334,590 ballots in 1936, while Maryland, Kentucky, North Carolina, and West Virginia—comparable in total and Negro population—cast 624,896, 926,199, 839,462, and 829,945 votes, respectively.

Adopted as a measure to keep the Negro from voting, the poll tax is defended on this ground today. Yet its main effect is to disfranchise the poor white, since the Negro would still be kept from the ballot box by other devices. In Virginia, in spite of its poll tax, Negro votes form a larger proportion of the total than in North Carolina, which abolished its poll-tax requirement many years ago. Yet in the 1936 election, as already noted, North Carolina cast more than two and a half times as many votes as Virginia.

BELOVED BY DEMAGOGUES

Opponents of full suffrage contend also that dropping of the poll-tax requirement would encourage the election of demagogues. As if the poll-tax States did not now put more demagogues in public office than any comparable group. Only voters who paid their poll tax sent to Washington or to the State capitols such rabble-rousers as Cole Blease, Theodore G. Bilbo, W. Lee O'Daniel, and the late Huey Long, whose election took place before Louisiana dropped her poll tax.

The standpatters disclose their real purpose when they defend the poll tax as a bulwark against social and economic reform. They know that, in general, the 8 poll-tax States are the least progressive in the country, the most laggard in labor and health legislation, the lowest in literacy, and the most indifferent to the plight of the impoverished tenant farmer and his rickety children. They know, too, that if the poor whites are allowed to vote some of these conditions may gradually be improved—at the taxpayers' expense.

In many southern counties, the poll tax is a convenient device to keep control of the vote in the hands of a courthouse ring or a handful of industrial employers. With only 20 to 50 percent of the adults given the ballot, the voters are kept in hand much more easily. Despite bans in the statute books, political bosses often pay the poll tax for their ragged retainers, while employers see that the tax is paid for those of their workers who can be counted on to vote as they are told.

AGENCY OF CORRUPTION

Ever since the Romans levied it on subject peoples, the head tax has been an instrument of oppression and injustice. Aristotle described it as a "most ignominious imposition" which "none but slaves paid to their tyrants"; and in 1381 Wat Tyler led English peasants in an armed rebellion against the decree of this inequitable tax. In the American Colonies the British slapped on a poll tax in 1663. Opposition to this levy was a factor in leading North Carolinians a century later to issue the Mecklenburg Declaration of 1775, a forerunner of the Declaration of Independence. Abolished by the Revolution, the poll tax as a prerequisite to voting did not reappear until late in the last century, when 11 Southern States adopted it as a means of evading the fifteenth amendment to the Constitution, which gave Negroes the right to vote. A quarter of a century ago 14 States required voters to show poll-tax receipts.

In addition to seeking individual and social justice, the present movement for repeal of the poll tax seeks to remedy two special conditions that have arisen during the last few years. One is that six of the eight poll-tax States by exempting the aged from the tax give this group an abnormally large representation at the polls. Thus the special interests of the elderly are likely to get more attention than they deserve and legislatures are pressed to enact visionary pension schemes. Texas had an example of this in 1938 when thousands whose last Presidential vote went to Bryan swamped the polls to cast their ballots for W. Lee O'Daniel, who promised that if made Governor he would give big pensions to all the old folks, whether they needed money or not.

LOSS OF PARTY POWER

The other new argument against the poll tax is that it prevents the South from having proportionate representation in the Democratic National Convention. Formerly, with the two-thirds rule for nominations and with the number of seats for each State based on total population figures, the South enjoyed perhaps more power than it deserved at party conventions. But with the 1936 abolition of the two-thirds rule and a change in the basis of representation, this advantage is lost. Since, beginning with 1940, representation will be on a basis of the number of Democratic votes cast in the previous Presidential election, the poll-tax States will find their delegations seriously curtailed.

Despite its name, the poll tax is in reality a voluntary payment for the privilege of voting. Little attempt is made to collect it from all adults. In most of the States affected, the only persons who receive any written notice of the poll tax are those who pay taxes on real estate. Propertyless citizens must mark their calendars or depend on newspaper reminders to pay this levy ahead of the deadline. Those who fail to pay the tax incur no penalty except loss of their right to vote. Essentially the poll tax is a membership fee in a political club that runs the government in eight States.

Repeal of the poll-tax requirement for voters has resulted uniformly in a large increase in the vote cast. Recent Louisiana elections have recorded from 25 to 30 percent more ballots than those held before repeal of the poll tax a few years ago. In 1938 the Democratic primary in Florida—the first held there since repeal of that State's poll tax—brought out the largest vote in the history of the State. Compared with a previous record of slightly more than 300,000, the 1938 primary brought about 415,000 voters to the polls.

In 1938 Texans elected as Governor a dimpled flour salesman who could not vote because he had not paid any poll tax for years. One of O'Daniel's few campaign planks was repeal of the poll tax. But soon after his election he made a truce with the State Democratic machine, which wants the tax retained, and as Governor he has taken no action toward carrying out his campaign promise to abolish this price on votes.

FIGHT COVERS THE SOUTH

Elsewhere the fight against the poll tax has more able leadership. In Virginia, where the levy is defended by machine bosses like Senator CARTER GLASS and Senator HARRY F. BYRD, strong opposition comes from able newspapermen, including Virginius Dabney, editor of the Richmond Times-Dispatch, and from labor unions and organizations of consumers, women, and war veterans. In other States the fight for repeal gains support from Senator LESTER HILL, of Alabama; Barry Bingham, publisher of the Louisville Courier-Journal and the Louisville Times; and John Temple Graves, 2d, who writes a column that appears in a number of southern newspapers.

The slow progress made thus far by the repeal movement has not discouraged its backers. In Tennessee 15 legislatures have turned down bills to do away with the poll tax, but the demand for universal suffrage comes back stronger after every rebuff. The repeal drive has gained fresh momentum from President Roosevelt's outspoken condemnation of the poll tax as a prerequisite to voting and from a similar expression voted unanimously by 29 southern leaders who met recently at Atlanta under sponsorship of the Southern Policy Committee.

Until the eight backward States repeal their poll taxes they cannot fairly call their elections democratic. As long as the ballot is given to the planter and the banker but is denied to the hillbilly and the cotton-cropper, because they do not choose to let their children go hungry for the sake of voting, elections cannot express the popular will. But the new Jacksonian crusade promises to break through the poll-tax barrier against democracy. When it does, the South may have less occasion to be sensitive about shocking health conditions, inferior schools, child marriages, and notoriously lax labor legislation.

Senator M. M. Logan

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. BEVERLY M. VINCENT

OF KENTUCKY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, October 18, 1939

EDITORIAL FROM THE EDMONSON COUNTY NEWS OF OCTOBER 5, 1939

Mr. VINCENT of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I insert the following editorial from the Edmonson County News, of Brownsville, Ky., October 5, 1939:

While the death of United States Senator MARVEL MILLS LOGAN is a distinct loss to the State and Nation he has served so ably, it is here at his old home that his passing becomes a personal loss to every resident, for here he was born, spent his boyhood days, and fought his own way from obscurity to renown unconfined even to the United States. As Grand Sire of the International Order of Odd Fellows he became an international figure, while at the time of his death he was an outstanding member of the greatest lawmaking body in the universe. Had he but lived longer he would have attained even greater honors. A seat on the Supreme Bench had been forecast for the future.

Yet the real bigness of the man was best exemplified by his steadfast love for and loyalty to the place of his birth and his "homefolks." Though MILLS LOGAN had climbed to heights of human achievement, his great heart was always with the common people from whom he sprang. Always he was proud to proclaim the place of his birth and to praise the people of his home town and county.

Early in life he set his goal in this expression:

"I am of the great common people; what benefits them will benefit me; I pray to God that some day I will be able to do something for them."

That prayer was answered—answered because the promise to his Maker was faithfully performed.

MILLS LOGAN earned vast sums of money, yet he amassed no estate. Money to him was but a commodity to be exchanged for the well-being and happiness of others. The extent of his benevolences will never be known to man, yet there are those here, there, and everywhere who have been beneficiaries of his largess. Scores of young men aspiring to the Baptist ministry were enabled to attend a great theological seminary on the funds he supplied. His other charities were innumerable and unpublicized. To him charity extended beyond the realm of dollars and cents. He was charitable to the faults of all men and was charitable to those with whom he may have disagreed or may have "despitefully used him."

He was a devout Christian. His great delight was to teach the Word of God.

As a jurist he was the peer of the world's best talent. Law reports are filled with classics from his pen.

As a statesman he took top rank. In ability, appearance, and address he was perhaps the last of the type of men often described as the "Founding Fathers."

This is but a feeble attempt at a brief résumé of a life that words, though written by an adept biographer, could not adequately portray. Much more than herein written is contained in a sentence suggested to this writer by Mr. H. St. G. T. Carmichael, to whom Senator LOGAN had long been friend and counselor:

"He lived above reproach and died without an enemy."

The Neutrality Issue

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CARL A. HATCH

OF NEW MEXICO

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, October 18 (legislative day of Wednesday, October 4), 1939

ADDRESS OF HON. SAM G. BRATTON

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, recently at Albuquerque, in the State of New Mexico, before the Kiwanis convention a former distinguished Member of this body delivered an address which covers, in part, the pending issue being discussed in the Senate. I ask unanimous consent that the address delivered by former Senator Sam G. Bratton be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Clovis (N. Mex.) News-Journal of October 15, 1939]

"THE UNITED STATES CAN AND MUST KEEP OUT OF WAR," SAID S. G. BRATTON BEFORE KIWANIANS IN DUKE CITY

(EDITOR'S NOTE.—At the Southwest Kiwanis Convention held this past week in Albuquerque the Honorable Sam G. Bratton, judge of the United States Court of Appeals, delivered one of the most outstanding addresses of the convention. Because Judge Bratton is one of the leading citizens of New Mexico, and because he holds an influential position, it is believed that persons of this territory will read with keen interest the message he brought to the Kiwanians. For this reason, Judge Bratton's address is being printed here in its entirety. The address follows:)

World conditions are engaging the thoughtful attention of the American people more than they have during the past 20 years. The European situation is the almost universal subject of discussion in Congress, in the press, over the radio, on the platform, in conventions, and wherever a group is brought together. Accordingly it may not be inappropriate to canvass briefly and sketchily some features of these conditions, particularly the course we should pursue during the difficulties which beset civilization on every hand.

Our participation in the World War was not for the purpose of gaining territory or recovering reparations in dollars and dimes. We did not seek then, and we have not desired since, either to disrupt the territorial autonomy of other nations whether great or small, or to disturb their governmental status for our own gain, and we did not covet their wealth. We joined in that struggle in order to make the world safe for democracy. That was the sublime thought uppermost in our minds, and the high dominant motive which caused us to join with others in an effort to overthrow autocracy. But the events which have occurred during the intervening span of 20 years have bewildered us; and the kaleidoscopic panorama of events in different parts of the world during the past 4 or 5 years causes some to stand in confusion. There is basis for the belief that instead of resting upon a safe and enduring foundation, democracy is endangered and its path is blocked by ignorance and selfish abandonment of moral standards in international relations, and in covetous thirst for territorial expansion and enlargement of power. Wars are being waged on two continents, Europe and Asia. At no time in the past decade has the world been so racked with dissension, conflicts, and economic chaos. One factor in the equation which stands forth with disturbing clarity is that a titanic struggle of world-wide proportions is under way between two wholly different philosophies of government. That struggle is between democracy on one hand and totalitarianism on the other; and the two are so diametrically in opposition that never the twain shall be merged into one.

The very essence of democracy is protection of the individual citizen in the enjoyment of human rights; but the concept of the authoritarian states is the complete supremacy of the government and the absolute regimentation of the individual. There is no mystery about democracy. Almost without exception, it finds its source in revolution which had for its objectives national independence, freedom of human rights, and the perpetuity of free institutions. It is the direct outgrowth of a passionate belief that government can be created and maintained for the preservation and security of human rights. Representative government promotes and fosters ability, talent, initiative, freedom of thought, freedom of expression, right of peaceable assembly, and the privilege of advocating a cause regardless of how unpopular it may be with those in official authority or those in private life. Totalitarianism is the antithesis of all of these. It stifles, restrains, proscribes, and destroys all of these rights and privileges, and it sometimes proceeds in ways which shock right-thinking people throughout the civilized world. Many things which suit the purpose of a despotic power cannot abide in the pure atmosphere of political liberty and human freedom.

Certain major democracies of Europe have gone forward during recent years relying upon the good faith of solemn treaties, devoting themselves to the repair of their domestic affairs and making essential readjustments necessitated by the World War. But during these processes of democratic government their peoples have been free, contented, and happy.

On the other hand, one major authoritarian government in central Europe has pursued a diametrically contrary course. She has been restless and discontented ever since the war; and beginning about 5 years ago, and continuing with frequency since, treaty obligations have been disregarded, deliberate preparation for war has gone forward, and ruthless war is now being waged. It is not too much to say that respect for treaty obligations deteriorated during that time to an unprecented low level. In following that course and in bringing on the existing war she has enslaved her people and is exacting of them terrific burdens and loss of life, but that is the price exacted by governments dedicated to that philosophy. Every student of world affairs is thoroughly familiar with the facts in relation to the Austrian, the Czechoslovakian, and the Polish crises. Free men in all parts of the civilized world have stood in amazement at the lengths to which totalitarianism has gone. Covetous hands have been plunged in many directions. Helpless minorities have been victimized and extinguished. Their property has been confiscated, their governments destroyed, and they have been brought to a condition of servitude. Three great European nations are engulfed in war. It is being waged on land, in the air, on the sea, and beneath the sea. Its length, its destruction of life, and its devastation of property, are matters of speculation and conjecture. No one can forecast with any measure of certainty the course it may take, the area it may involve, the toll it may exact, or the conditions which will exist after its termination. We give thought to this question with the deepest concern. To this brief résumé of conditions in Europe must be added a scant word about the development in the Far East.

War is being waged on China. Territory and resources are the material objectives. One power in the Orient has declared her domination of all eastern Asia. She has announced that she will promulgate what may be called the Monroe Doctrine of the Orient and that she will enforce it. She has thrown overboard the treaty which guarantees the open-door policy in China—a policy which was promulgated by a distinguished Secretary of State of the United States almost forty years ago, at which time the now recalcitrant nation wholeheartedly and enthusiastically subscribed to the doctrine. In strict violation of that covenant, she has sought to restrict trade opportunities of the United States and other nations in China. These stern facts compel a candid realization of solemn truth that despite the idealism with which the democratic nations united in waging and winning the war, the rule of blind and self-seeking force has for the time being established itself in the control of human affairs in a substantial part of the civilized world.

And these tragic occurrences have caused some to wonder whether the basic policies which we have followed thus far in our national existence are adequate for our needs or have become outmoded and should be cast into the discard; and at the same time they have accentuated the solicitude of all for the security of the free institutions of our own Republic. Among nations as among individuals, trouble is far more easily caused than repaired. A cloudburst, a bolt of lightning, a cyclone, or an earthquake may cause more damage in the twinkle of an eye than can be repaired in days, weeks, or months. Indeed, any of these forces of nature may strew devastation in its path which is irreparable, but science and ingenuity meet and combat them without discouragement or loss of heart.

It is the earnest desire of the United States, through human enlightenment, human freedom, development of science and culture, and a spirit of toleration and mutual respect, to maintain and sustain amity and appeasement with all other nations. The cause of world peace, the best interests of democratic government, and of our own continued independence will not be furthered by our participation in the problems of other nations concerning their forms of government or other internal problems. We should decline to be drawn into questions or controversies of that kind. Neither will our continued freedom be advantaged by resort to economic boycotts in concert with other powers against nations that violate our concept of fair and humane conduct in their relations with each other. We should join moral forces with all nations for the betterment of mankind, but we should reject all suggestions of uniting our military or economic forces with those of any other nation unless our own safety or integrity is imperiled. International conflict usually grows out of three factors. They are political—meaning the ambitious policies of government; economic—meaning loans, trade, and sales of munitions; and psychological—meaning pride, prejudice, or passion. These causes separately and collectively have caused rivers to run red with blood and battlefields to be whitened with bones. We genuinely disclaim each and all of them in our attitude toward other nations. We desire to mind our own business and are happy to have others do likewise. We cannot police the world and we have no intention of endeavoring to do so.

So far as we are concerned, the totalitarian states are privileged to exercise whatever form of government they wish and to which their peoples either subscribe or submit. But we insist that they accord us the same privilege without interference. We likewise demand with emphasis and determination that they refrain from exerting any effort, direct or indirect, to overthrow democratic government in the United States and substitute for it any ism emanating from a foreign source. We propose with grim determination to preserve and perpetuate inviolate democracy in the United States with its free institutions wholly regardless of the cost entailed or the sacrifice exacted.

Moved by these high purposes and noble objectives, the Congress passed and the President approved the so-called Neutrality Act of 1935. It provides that when the President shall declare by Executive proclamation that a state of war exists between or among two or more nations, it shall be unlawful to export arms, ammunition, or implements of war from any place in the United States to any port of such belligerent states, or to any neutral port for transshipment to or for the use of any belligerent country, and further that it shall be unlawful for any American vessel to transport arms, ammunition, or implements of war to any such port for such purposes. The act provides heavy sanctions for its violation. It will be noted that this statute only forbids the exportation or shipment of completed implements of war to belligerent states, but does not interdict the sale, shipment, or exportation of many kinds of uncompleted implements, as well as numerous types of general materials and supplies designed, intended, and essential to the prosecution of war. For instance, it is perfectly legal for Americans to sell and American ships to carry to belligerents all of the parts with which to assemble bombers or other types of planes, but the sale and shipment of the planes themselves is forbidden.

It is entirely permissible to sell and ship brass tubing or steel purchased for the sole purpose of manufacturing shells, but the sale and shipment of the shells themselves is forbidden. Many other similar illustrations could be given but they are wholly unnecessary. They are obvious. The danger of Americans selling to belligerent nations, or to private purchasers in belligerent nations all manner of materials and supplies known to be suited to and intended for use in the prosecution of a war, and of American ships carrying such materials and supplies is perfectly plain. Elaboration is not necessary to demonstrate that a belligerent nation will not stand idly by and permit American ships to transport and deliver enormous supplies of that kind to its adversary. It is manifest that if that policy continues during a stubborn war in Europe our ships will be stopped, searched, and cargoes confiscated, and perhaps serious infractions of the rights of Americans will ensue. So, the Congress was called into extraordinary session, and the President recommended that in lieu of this statute, appropriate legislation be enacted which will permit nations at war to purchase in the United States all kinds of materials and supplies, except munitions, for use in waging the conflict, but the purchase must be made here, payment must be made here, title must pass here, delivery must take place here, and shipment must be made in non-American vessels. Thus American vessels will not traverse danger zones ladened with materials known to be intended for war purposes, and thus the temptation will be diminished of belligerent nations stopping our vessels, searching them, seizing their cargoes, and perhaps going further with complicating eventualities.

The opportunity for all nations to come, make their purchases, and transport them, is equal despite our likes or dislikes, our agreements or disagreements with their respective positions in the war. True, one nation may be better able to take advantage of the opportunities extended under the act than another but these differences grow out of disparities in conditions over which the United States can have no control, and the right of the United States to enact such legislation without transgressing recognized principles of international law. One is to forbid in toto the sale or shipment of any materials or supplies for war purposes. Another is to permit sale and shipment under conditions and restrictions which are fair and impartial. And a third is to permit it without conditions, restrictions, or limitations. The bill also forbids the extension of credit to belligerents, or the floating of loans or sale of bonds by belligerents, and it authorizes the President to declare danger zones from time to time into which American ships cannot go, all of which is within the rights of the United States under international law, and will contribute much to our continued neutrality.

It is my considered belief that the repeal of the existing statute, and the enactment of legislation along the lines of the bill now being debated in the Senate will advantage our neutrality and will reduce the likelihood of our involvement in the conflict. You may disagree. The matter is one on which reasonable-minded, patriotic, and peace-loving American citizens differ widely and deeply. But there is one thing on which we stand united; one feature of the situation on which we do not differ. The United States can and must keep out of the European war. We may agree with one side and differ widely with the other respecting the questions over which the war is being waged. We may think one side is right and the other wrong. We may find ourselves in sympathy with the philosophy of government represented on one side and entirely in disagreement with that represented on the other. But that is not enough to suggest even remotely that we should become involved.

Despite all this there will be propaganda from many sources, of many kinds and types, some insidious and some otherwise, that it is our duty to enter the struggle for the purpose of saving democracy. Your task and mine is to be alert and to oppose all such efforts with every ounce of our strength. Bear steadily in mind that should we go abroad to save democracy, we must give it up in part here. We do not know what conditions will be at the end of a long war. The map of the world may be substantially changed. New conditions, new philosophies, and new elements of strength from different sources may present themselves. The greatest contribution that we can make to the world is to preserve unimpaired and intact democracy here in the United States, and present it as the kind of government best suited to personal liberty and human freedom. Though we may differ in respect of methods and details, let us unite firmly on that principle.

These alarming conditions in world affairs call for discussion as to whether our Army and Navy are reasonably adequate in strength for defense purposes. Those familiar with the facts realize full well that our Navy has been moded and geared with primary reference to the Pacific. Without going into details, the bald fact is that we have depended for a century and a half on one of the major democracies in Europe to mistress the Atlantic. But the time is at hand when we can no longer rely with safety upon any other nation for our own safety and protection in the Atlantic. We must rely upon ourselves. Our safety requires that the Navy be enlarged and conditioned to the point where it will be adequate for our own protection and defense in both oceans. We have been told by sources which seem to be authentic that a fleet reasonably adequate for that purpose would entail the expenditure of $4,000,000,000 or more. An outlay of that stupendous sum should not be undertaken without great deliberation and caution, but it is insignificant as a price for our national safety and security. And some enlargement of the Army seems equally expedient. Whether the program should be undertaken immediately and speedily or staggered over a period of years is a matter for due consideration. But it should be undertaken without undue delay.

In an effort to promote amity and appeasement, the United States has participated actively and sincerely in virtually all of the conferences held during the past century in the interest of world peace; and there is no basis for doubt concerning our willingness and desire to sit at future conference tables in earnest search for fair and reasonable formulas for preserving the peace of the world. Moreover, realizing that economic factors wield an important influence upon the relationships among nations, we have consistently and without interruption pursued a broad and fair and equitable policy toward all nations in respect of trade relations and trade balances—not a narrow, restricted, or unnatural policy. It will be recalled that time and time again the most-favored-nation provision has been inserted in our treaties, as well as other provisions evidencing our desire to avoid unfairness in trade relations with others. And, in addition, we have exerted an active effort at the inter-American conference held in Montevideo 5 years ago, at Buenos Aires 2 years ago, and at Lima in December of last year, to promote better understanding, better trade relations, and closer concert of action among the republics of the Western Hemisphere for the solution of their problems of common interest. A sobering realization of the stern situation is burned more deeply into the mind with one hurried look at a map showing the substantial part of the world in which there is no free press and where writers are denied the privilege of publicizing the facts. So much for world affairs as they relate themselves to free government, except to say that we do not stand alone in zealous and passionate dedication to the principles of democracy. Great Britain, France, Canada, Holland, Belgium, Switzerland, Australia, New Zealand, and the Scandinavian countries are on the roster. They have not capitulated. And that is an imposing and encouraging array of peoples who hold firmly to the belief that human rights and human freedom can best be attained and preserved for the present and future generations under the benign guidance of democratic government.

It would be a trespass upon your time to engage in an extended discussion of domestic affairs. It is enough to say that we must preserve a government of free institutions in which freedom of the press, freedom of speech, the right to trial by jury, the right to own property unless it is taken by due process of law and with reasonable compensation, the right to worship according to the dictates of our consciences, the right to develop our own initiatives, choose our own vocations, hew out our own careers, educate our sons and daughters, and enjoy a fair return upon our own industry, thrift, and frugality; and at the same time not trespass upon the rights of others or disregard the just requirements of society. The task may be fraught with difficulties, but that is no reason for an intelligent and patriotic citizenry seeking to evade it. If we take up where our forebears lay down, we must save democracy in this period of peril. The greatest need of the hour is clear and calm thinking and for Americans to rise to the height of the opportunity for self-government and effective leadership, both at home and abroad. The problem is not one of sectional discord or internal differences. It is one of a unified nation, triumphing over those forces which have for their objective the overthrow of democracy. It is one of making sure that our democratic impulses do not grow weaker under pressure of false doctrines or insidious propaganda with ulterior ends in view, whether from within or without. It is one of keeping a unified vision upon the substance of institutional arrangements designed to preserve these attributes of freedom, and of being alert to detect any attempt to impair them. I have faith in the wisdom, fidelity, and fortitude of the American people. I confidently believe that in a manner kindred to that in which light meets and battles darkness the victory will be won and democracy will continue to be enshrined in the hearts of men.

Public Enemy No. 1

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. LYLE H. BOREN
OF OKLAHOMA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, October 18, 1939

Mr. BOREN. Mr. Speaker, international problems are of grave importance, perhaps first importance, but let us not forget that we have internal problems of great importance also. The motion-picture monopoly has become public enemy No. 1 in our program to stamp out economic crime.

The motion-picture industry is controlled by a small number of executives who pay themselves prodigious salaries.

On April 7 of this year, the newspapers throughout the country published lists of the highest paid executives in the United States which might well be considered the highest salaries in the world.

The highest compensation went to Louis B. Mayer, production director of Loew's Inc. He topped the list with the stupendous sum of $1,161,753 received from Loew's, and another $134,750 which he received from Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer Corporation, which is Loew's motion-picture-producing subsidiary.

In these times, when over 10,000,000 people cannot find jobs, when 8,000,000 families are continually facing starvation, and 11,000,000 more families are fighting poverty, it is sickening to learn that one man receives a salary greater than the President of the United States, plus the salaries of 96 Senators.

Treasury Department reports indicated that of the 63 salaries of $200,000 or more, 40 were paid by motion-picture companies. In justice it must be stated that about half of these 40 names included actors and actresses whose earning power is usually restricted to shorter periods of years than that of the executives. While still fabulous in terms of the ordinary man, Clark Gable, the highest paid actor reported, received $280,000. That sum represents about 25 percent of Mr. Mayer's salary.

At this point it might be well to debunk a few misconceptions concerning the widely publicized idea that all actors are well paid. An N. R. A. report shows that during 1933, 1,563 actors and actresses, whose rate of pay was not less than $150 per week, were employed in the production branch of the industry. Nevertheless, 25 percent of this group received less than $1,000, about 50 percent received less than $2,000, and about 75 percent received less than $5,000. The above sums are subject to a deduction of 10 percent agent's fee and do not include heavy wardrobe expenses required to secure a job.

The next highest salary paid in the United States went to Mr. J. M. Rubin, vice president of Loew's, who received the princely sum of $651,123. Fourth on the list was the president of the same company, Nicholas M. Schenck, who received $489,600.

These men draw more than the presidents of the Chase National Bank, American Telephone & Telegraph Co., General Electric, and General Motors put together.

In this connection, it is interesting to note that two stockholders of Loew's, Inc., recently brought suit charging that excessive salaries and bonuses had been paid to officers of the company.

Stockholders consider such compensation unwarranted. Diversion of such large sums from earnings on equities seem inexcusable.

Interesting comparisons can be made between salaries paid to film-company executives and the remuneration received by the leaders of other great American corporations.

The most recent figures that have come to my attention—and I suppose there may be later ones—indicate that in 1936 the executives in this industry paid themselves about 6 percent of the industry's net income. Leading industrial enterprises, including the two largest steel companies, the Du Pont Co., General Motors, the Standard Oil Co., and Woolworth, paid their top executives only one-fourth of 1 percent of their net incomes. In other words, the czars of the motion-picture industry exercise such control that they are able to pay themselves 24 times as much of the net income accruing to their companies as other leading industries pay to their executives.

Such a wide disparity in remuneration cannot be accounted for by the mere statement that the motion-picture industry is an art requiring the creative talents possessed by these executives. Frankly, most of them differ very little from the ordinary successful businessman. The vision which leads a producer to pioneer in the field of entertainment is not at all unlike the instinct which springs from any other successful executive who envisions a new process or product which receives wide public approval at the counter instead of at the box office.

Such utter disregard for the public and their own stockholders can only be perpetuated and perpetrated by callous disregard of their managerial responsibilities to their stockholders.

It is the first duty of the Congress to protect the public interest. The motion picture lobby and its puppets are honeycombing the Nation's Capitol and the capitols of the 48 States in an attempt to corrupt the churches, schools, and the Nation's public servants.

I earnestly request that the membership of the Congress give some thought to this problem during this period that the House is marking time on neutrality legislation. At the last session the Senate passed the Neely block-booking bill and we will have that bill before the House committee at the beginning of the regular session. A few of us have prepared, with your aid, to make a comprehensive measure out of the Neely bill. We plan to put more guts and teeth in it.

Today I urge you to look into this industry that has reached proportions comparable to a basic public utility and yet has rarely been of public service; rather has it been guilty of constant propagandizing of a vicious nature. And what is more, there have never been gangsters or bandits in any land or clime that have excelled their talent for robbing the American public. I point to the motion picture industry as the economic public enemy No. 1 of America. I invite your thoughtful analysis to careful comparison of the methods of the Al Capones, the Pretty Boy Floyds, the Dutch Schultzs, and so forth, to those of the movie moguls, the Louis B. Mayers, the Warner Brothers, the Rubins, the Schencks, and so forth.

Salary range of some of the first- and second-class actors and first-, second-, and third-class executives:

Clark Gable, Metro	$289,000
Fred Astaire, R. K. O	271,711
Joe E. Brown, D. L. Loew	267,500
Hunt Stromberg, Metro	265,500
Charles Boyer, Wanger	265,191
Darryl Zanuck, Twentieth Century	260,000
Ernest Lubitsch, Paramount	260,833
Claudette Colbert, Paramount	248,055
William Powell, Metro	246,110
Bob Burns, Metro	242,856
Gary Cooper, Paramount	238,416
Jeannette MacDonald, Metro	238,299
Robert Montgomery, Metro	243,250
Warner Baxter, Twentieth Century	225,961
George Raft, Paramount	219,399
Sonja Heinie, Twentieth Century	210,729
Adolph Zukor, Paramount	210,479
Kay Francis, Warner Bros	209,100
Hal Wallis, Warner Bros	208,083
Wesley Ruggles, Paramount	203,051
David O. Selznick, Selznick, Inc	203,500
Katharine Hepburn, R. K. O	203,751
Herbert Marshall, R. K. O	198,166
Samuel J. Briskin, R. K. O	197,333
Wallace Beery, Metro	190,000

Ginger Rogers, R. K. O	$184,776
William LeBaron, Paramount	183,929
W. S. Van Dyke, Metro	178,816
Dick Powell, Warner Bros	176,249
Robert Taylor (listed as Arlington Brugh), Metro	173,362
Jack Conway, Metro	168,621
Frank Lloyd, Paramount	166,208
B. H. Hyman, Metro	165,456
Jack Oakie, R. K. O	164,416
Carole Lombard, Paramount (also $150,000 from Selznick)	164,000
Sam Goldwyn, S. G., Inc. (also $26,000 as president of United Artists)	163,000
Roy del Ruth, Twentieth Century	162,144
Victor Fleming, Metro	160,000
R. Z. Leonard, Metro	160,000
Clarence Brown, Metro	159,000
E. J. Mannix, Metro	157,500
Sam Katz, Metro	156,000
Louis Ligon, Metro	158,250
Henry King, Twentieth Century	157,444
S. Eckman, Jr., London office of Loew's	154,302
Mervyn Le Roy, Warner	153,517
Myrna Loy, Metro	152,583
Ronald Colman, Selznick	150,000
Eddie Cantor, Twentieth Century	150,000
Walter Winchell, Twentieth Century	150,000
Loretta Young, Twentieth Century	150,000
Preston Sturges, Hollywood writer, Paramount	134,500
Joel McCrea, Goldwyn	106,500
Shirley Temple, Twentieth Century (and her mother received $52,166)	110,256

Numerous others are listed at salaries in excess of that paid the President of the United States, but the foregoing are enough to indicate what occurred in Big Eight circles in 1937.

Importation of Fox and Mink Pelts

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOSHUA L. JOHNS

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, October 18, 1939

JOINT RESOLUTION OF THE WISCONSIN LEGISLATURE

Mr. JOHNS. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of Wisconsin:

Joint resolution memorializing the Congress of the United States to protect the domestic fox- and fur-raising industry

Whereas in Wisconsin and in the United States there has been developed a domestic fox- and fur-raising industry in the last quarter of a century which constitutes a national business amounting to millions of dollars and which employs large numbers of people; and

Whereas the fox- and mink-pelt production of this country has been primarily sold to the people of our country in the past with only relatively small foreign imports of fox and mink pelts; and

Whereas foreign countries, which produce approximately five times the number of fox and mink pelts produced in this country, have to a very large extent lost their markets on account of the European war; and

Whereas foreign countries are now making arrangements to dump this vast world supply of fox and mink pelts onto the United States market, which can only reasonably absorb our own production; and

Whereas the dumping of this vast quantity of foreign fox and mink pelts onto the United States market will practically ruin the majority of the fox and mink farmers of our country; and

Whereas there is no reason why fox and mink raisers of our country should have their industry destroyed by the dumping of foreign pelts: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the assembly (the senate concurring), That this legislature strongly urges the President of the United States and the proper Federal agencies to set up a quota on importing fox and mink pelts not to exceed the last 3 years average of fox and mink pelts shipped into this country; be it further

Resolved, That restrictions be placed on processed fox and mink pelts which would prohibit the flooding of the American market with these products and thus ruin our domestic fur industry; be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be sent to the President of the United States, the Secretary of State, the Tariff Commission, and to all Members of Congress from Wisconsin.

Neutrality

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. RAYMOND S. SPRINGER

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, October 18, 1939

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Speaker, the vital question of neutrality which is now presented to the Congress is one of the most important subjects, if not the most important matter of legislations, which has ever been presented to this great lawmaking body. The people of the United States of America are not unmindful of the great importance of this subject. May I say, in passing, the young men and women of our Nation are taking a deep interest in the discussion of our foreign policy in the Congress, because upon them would fall the very great burden of the active participation in a war in the event we should become so involved, and they have the right to that very great interest because it becomes entirely personal; to them would fall the responsibility of the active engagement in the war, and to them, and to their posterity, would fall the very great responsibility of the payment of the staggering cost of the war.

I do not think I misjudge the temper of the average American citizen in this critical period, because I have received untold hundreds of communications from the people of my good district, and from various points in the State of Indiana, on this vital subject and, without exception, every communication stated in unmistakable language, "You must keep our country out of this war." These letters came from the classes and the masses, from the farmers, the laborers, the industrialists, the professions, the mothers and the fathers; all of them truly American and thoroughly patriotic, with the love of our country foremost in their thoughts, but they have the vision of the tragedies of the late World War—they think of the terrible disabilities suffered by my own comrades in that titanic struggle and they seek to avoid any repetition of it in this European crisis; these people, and I speak of all of the people in my district in the State of Indiana, have the vision of their own boy, and the neighbor's boy, who was called to the colors in 1917–18, and who did not come back home after that war was over—because his grave is in France. And these people are thinking of their visits in the various veterans hospitals, throughout this Nation, where they see those boys, once keen, alert, and courageous, who are now suffering the pain and torture of 10,000 deaths—some of them are blind, some are limbless and armless, some of them practically destroyed by that most terrible disability of sleeping sickness—the shock from high explosives, in war, has wrecked their bodies and their lives—and they are thinking of war and its toll and of its destruction.

The people do not want war—they want peace. The people do not want disabled veterans of another war among us—they want strong young men who are able to engage in the arts and trades of civil life and who will aid in the inevitable progress of our Nation throughout the future years. The people of our Nation shudder, too, when they recall that we supported an army of 4,791,172 in the last war. Many of my comrades in that war are now Members of this body, and each one of us is proud of the fact that he was one of that great body of men who followed our flag in that conflict. But the people ponder, and we are saddened, when we realize that from that great number of men 173,274 were lost in action and died from other causes; 205,690 of our comrades were wounded; from exposure, poisonous gases, and other terrifying causes untold thousands of my comrades are suffering disabilities today, the peak of which will not be reached for many years hence. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, the people throughout the length and the breadth of this Nation are vitally concerned respecting the action which may be taken in the Congress on the pending bill, which relates to our neutrality.

May I say that the staggering loss of life and the disabilities suffered by my comrades are the greatest loss our Nation suffered from the World War, yet, may I add that there has been paid out of the Federal Treasury since the close of the World War the staggering and incomprehensible sum of $7,572,621,751.75 to veterans of that war, their widows, and orphans. The people know that war is a very serious subject. The people are speaking to their Representatives in the Congress, and they are urging us "to keep our country out of this European war."

We must not take that step which will lead our Nation into this war in which we have no concern. We must keep out of it. We must think of America first. We owe a duty to every young man of military age in this Nation to keep our country at peace; we owe a duty to every citizen of these United States, who would be directly involved in case of our participation in this foreign war, to keep free from any involvement in this European conflict; we owe a sacred duty to those comrades of the World War who sleep today, but whose memory is deeply recorded in our hearts, to keep our own country free from any entanglement in this tragic war which, if we should become involved in it, would claim its added toll from the ranks of our boys who have the right to live, to make progress, and the right to expect that you and I will protect them as Americans.

Mr. Speaker, may I say to you and to the Members of this honorable body that I will never cast my vote to take that step which will tend, in any way, to lead our country into this European war. The memories of the last war and the tragedies involved in it are sacred to me. We must think of America first.

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to include in and as a part of my remarks a very splendid editorial written by Mr. Leo Kinman, editor of the Shelbyville Republican, of Shelbyville, Ind., and which appeared in the edition of October 17, 1939, on the subject of American neutrality. In passing, may I say that the sound policy announced in the following editorial should be carefully considered by the Members of the House in determining our policy of neutrality. The editorial follows:

AMERICAN NEUTRALITY

On whatever action is taken by the Congress in the ticklish neutrality situation will depend the question of whether or not America goes to war.

The unbiased observer will readily admit that the present Neutrality Act has its draw-backs. Lacking elasticity, it seriously hampers American operations as a world power. On the other hand, a strict adherence to its provisions would be more desirable than involvement in the European fiasco. Always remembering that a large "if" looms even in the policy of extreme isolation.

There is one course, however, that the Congress must not take. It must not create a new neutrality law, the application of which is left to the discretion of the President. So far as the country as a whole has been able to see, the President has had no consistent policy (other than a rather constant attack on business generally) since his induction into the office.

Moreover, he has made repeated statements toward Germany which are not often used by the head of one nation toward another people with which his country was at the moment at peace (viz: The American frontier is on the Rhine). Such statements lack statesmanship. This country cannot afford to risk its future as the last stronghold of democracy to one who so casually makes such statements.

If the Congress changes the neutrality law, let it go slowly. Let it consider carefully that a cash-and-carry plan can easily become a credit-and-carry plan, and that the involvement of American money abroad becomes a major excuse for intervention with arms; let it be guided by the sordid history of the last World War when American idealism was wrecked on the dismal reef of European statesmen's realism, and the aftermath when Uncle Sam, the benefactor of the world, became Uncle Shylock in his effort to collect a fraction of the sum due him.

Above all, let the Congress stay in session and administer its own neutrality law. In its Members alone is vested the will of the people.

Then and Now

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. BERTRAND W. GEARHART

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, October 18, 1939

ADDRESS OF GEN. HUGH S. JOHNSON

Mr. GEARHART. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address delivered before the Twenty-first Annual National Convention of the American Legion, at the Auditorium Theater, Chicago, Ill., Wednesday morning, September 27, 1939, by Gen. Hugh S. Johnson:

Commander Chadwick, distinguished guests, my comrades of the American Legion, I am proud to be invited here by my comrades—ex-makers of the world safe for democracy; ex-warriors to end all war. Proud, but timid, too. I'm the guy who ballyhooed just under 2,000,000 of you into uniform to fight the holy war. It was my job to play that tune. Please don't shoot the professor.

Well, we all have an alibi. Twenty-two years ago and we were very young. We have learned a lot—or have we?

It was a magnificent adventure. We flocked to the colors, "to grind every selfish dominion into dust." No war of conquest. We sought no territory—not a dollar of tribute. We were not fighting the German people—only their dictatorial leaders. The only difference between Hitler and the Kaiser is the droop of the drawers and the cut of the mustache. We were out to abolish all former diplomatic games of seven-toed-Pete with deuces wild. Our boys died for "open covenants openly arrived at" to abolish the enslavement of peoples to either conquerors or domestic tyrants. We were for self-determination—no more international shotgun weddings.

With smiles and smirks our associates accepted our childish enthusiasms—while they took our money and our lives. We were the world's prize fat boy with the bag of candy among a horde of hungry urchins. We have been so ever since. As Will Rogers used to say, "We never lost a war or won a conference." And with Tex Guinan's greeting, I salute us all, "Hello, suckers!"

Who won the war—beside the M. P.'s? We never said we did. But nobody can ever deny this: Without us, the Allies were licked. Or this: With no thought of our own present or future interest, we denied no Allied request. We gave everything. We omitted nothing. No nation ever went so trustingly and generously to battle for the Lord.

When the Allies were busted, we simply opened our Treasury. Though they at first scorned our arms when the pinch came, at their desperate prayer we sent them "men in their undershirts"—boys untrained and unready—until we had more men in France than the British ever had. When they were starving, we rationed our people to give them food, without which, as they have admitted, they never could have held. When submarines wrecked their shipping, we almost ruined ourselves to replace it. When their raw materials failed, we supplied them fully. We withheld nothing. We did all this in time to turn certain defeat into accomplished victory.

What did it cost us? In dollars—forty billions. Skip it. Such boxcar figures reach so far toward the infinite that we can't understand. We paid a good half of the whole Allied cost of the war. Yet it was astronomical chicken feed to the real cost—10 years of terrible depression, $200,000,000,000 of lost income and production.

It has loaded our future with debt and taxes that chain our young generations like slaves to the cars of a Roman galley. You and I received this bright heritage of America from our fathers unmortgaged and free—a place where every man in the sweat of his labor could earn a reasonable living. That's the way we got it. We gambled it for Europe. We are passing along a wreck of it to our children. Rich or poor, they must pay 20 percent of all they make for our blunder, and the field of opportunity has been reduced one-third. That's what we paid for our last blunder, and we are not through paying yet.

What did we get for that deadly price? We were told we were going to get "international decency." Boy, look at the damn thing!

Of material things—territory and tribute—we got just what we asked—precisely nothing. We were fighting for treasures of the heart.

"Open covenants openly arrived at?" At the very moment that we marched secret treaties had promised to deliver conquered nations captive.

"No conquests?" Our associates partitioned the world. "No tributes?" Under the guise of fantastical "reparations" tributes enslaving generations and paralyzing the trade of the world were laid upon the conquered.

"War to end war?" The seeds were then sown of the red horror that now threatens the world.

"A world safe for democracy?" Except here and in a very few places in this hemisphere democracy is dead.

Not a vestige of our aims remains to reward us for all our sacrifice. We were bamboozled in the beginning and defrauded in the end. Faith in the promises of nations seems vanished from the earth. No pot can call any kettle black. Poland and Czechoslovakia will as bitterly accuse Britain and France of double-crossing and running out as they will accuse Germany and Russia. They two-timed us on the debts and threw us a curve on the post-war peace pacts—especially in Manchuria. Nice people! Every principle for which we went to war is a mouthful of dust and burned-out ashes.

Well, have we learned anything? I am not so sure. Nobody wants war; but we hear that we can't keep out, can't avoid doing it all over again with the same associates. The Book of Proverbs says: "As a dog returneth to its vomit, so doth a fool to his folly." Venture the welfare of this peaceful, honest, square-shooting people again into that welching, double-crossing betrayal. It sounds absurd and impossible. But are we surely foolproof against our own folly?

Who says we can't keep out if we want to—and why? This fatalistic dogmatic opinion is almost as dangerous as an outright demand to get in. It relieves our very Government of effort to the utmost to keep us out to the end, for, if it be true that we can't keep out anyway, how can anybody be blamed for getting us in tomorrow, or next month, or next year? Indeed, as professional soldiers, we know that if it were certain truth that we could not keep out in the end, it would be better to get in now. It would be better to gear the tremendous engine of destruction of an armed and mobilized America to its highest efficiency beginning immediately.

But we don't need to make a second fool's sacrifice. We can keep out. As Morton Downey says—England and France have. The argument is that, with the British Navy and the French Army defeated or weakened, we will be the next victim. That doesn't add up to make sense. If the war should stop tomorrow or with any outcome foreseeable in the next 2 years, we should still have the British and French Empires between us and the brutalitarian states. On the other hand, if the belligerents are fools enough to fight it out to a finish, both will be so exhausted that neither would dare take us on for a generation.

Apart from the utter destruction of long-drawn-out modern war is the fact that even conquering nations cannot spread themselves too thin or digest too much. Every one of Hitler's recent conquests have weakened him by presenting problems of territorial organization and the digestion of rebellious and alien peoples. Even in his joint venture with Russia he has simply gone to bed with another murderer. Neither of those political gorillas dares to go to sleep with his thumb in the other guy's mouth. Even a victorious Hitler can't straddle the Atlantic.

No; the war in Europe reduces the danger to the Americas. It is absurd to say we can't keep out. And yet it would be equally absurd to say, "We can't get in."

In one set of circumstances we can be drawn in. Nations have affronted us only when they thought we were weak or wouldn't fight. There is one absolute necessity in keeping out. We must become so strong in the air, on the sea, and the land that no nation dare attack us in this hemisphere.

It is a fashion to say that air force has dwindled our bulwarks of thousands of miles of sea water. That is plain nonsense. We are exposed to greater dangers of raid, but as long as those oceans remain, and we command the seas and adequately prepare on land, no nations can threaten us with armies. It is armies alone that can destroy nations.

The bulwarks are there, and we can defend them. But they must be armed and manned. We have not done that yet. Our Navy is as strong as it was in 1918. But the country does not know the half of the pitiful state of the armament and equipment of our Army. It has almost no modern equipment and no reserves. It is in no sense ready to keep out of war.

This is alarming. Here in the Americas are prizes richer for busted piratical nations than any galleon that ever sailed the Spanish Main. We can defend them. But we must prepare to defend them, and we are not prepared. Why haven't we done so?

That takes us right back to the argument that we can't keep out of this war because we must keep the British Navy and French Army between us and the dictators. In other words, we depend in part on them to defend the Americas and so have remained weak ourselves.

But, in this double-crossing, treaty-breaking world, how can we rely on any nation to defend our interests—even Britain and France? What happened to our reliance on them to support the highest ideals for which you fought twenty-odd years ago?

Every promise stands repudiated or broken. Czechoslovakia and Poland relied on them. Where are those nations now? In this treacherous modern world we can't stake our country in reliance on anybody but the strength of our own right arm and the unity and common purpose of our own people—armed and prepared not merely to keep America out of war but to keep war out of the Americas.

The argument that we can't keep out says that we must get in to destroy dictatorships. We are a democracy—almost the last one left. If we get in there would be more dictatorships than democracies on our side. One thing is certain sure, if we take arms in this war, good-bye democracy here—Kathleen Mavourneen—"it may be for years and it may be forever."

Look at our neighbor, Canada, today. Magna Carta is in the ashcan, and the Bill of Rights is out the window. You have to do that in war today. We did some of it in 1918. But Woodrow Wilson so hated centralized power that he gave up most of his war powers the day after the armistice. This administration also has had emergency powers. So far as I can recall, it never willingly gave up one. On the contrary, its policy has been constantly increased centralization of power, not merely in a Federal Government but in a Federal Governor. If we go to war we must not lose our democracy, but it is a fair bet that George Washington wouldn't be able to recognize it at the end. First, to hear that to keep out of war we must get into it. This argument is equally absurd—to keep our democracy we must give it up. Are we going "hay wire" on any such cockeyed, muddy thinking as that?

There is an even worse threat to democracy here. We entered the World War with trifling debt and taxes. We have multiplied that debt 40 times, and increased taxes to the breaking point. It is that which has hindered our prosperity and made living hard. If we go into a new war, we will double those already unbearable burdens—or worse. Neither our political nor our economic systems can stand the shock. Governments and property rights only exist so that people can work in safety. When any such systems become so hard to bear that people can't stand them—they go down and they should go down. Signing a declaration in this war will be signing a death sentence to democracy, and to everything that we have known and loved as American.

We shall find our way through. We shall, because we will stick to the fundamental principles of Americanism that made this country great. We will retain our forms of democratic government. We will keep out of European quarrels and entanglements. We will defend our own and remain strong enough to do so. Treating both sides at war with cold impartiality, we will rely on nobody but ourselves.

We want the world to know that while we bitterly deplore the destruction of everything we sacrificed and fought for in 1918, we recognize that both sides were in part guilty of that destruction. We hold it against neither. But that experience left us somewhat like the mouse in the cheese-baited trap. We don't want any more cheese.

They must fight their own battles, with this single warning: If they bring that fight westward to threaten us on own shores, we shall rise, as we rose in 1918, with all the power and the majesty of the strongest nation on earth to send them howling home.

Senator M. M. Logan

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. BEVERLY M. VINCENT

OF KENTUCKY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, October 18, 1939

FUNERAL ADDRESS BY JOHN A. LOGAN, AT BROWNSVILLE, KY.

Mr. VINCENT of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I insert the following funeral address of John A. Logan, at Brownsville, Ky.:

Friends, neighbors, and countrymen, on a bleak January day in 1874, there was born in a log cabin, nestling at the foot of this hill, a boy child, delicate in health. He exhibited extraordinary talent, and the divine spark of genius was apparent at an extremely early age. His fame spread rapidly; and before he was out of his teens he had distinguished himself as a scholar and as a teacher. His reputation at this early age had already encompassed his home county and was rapidly spreading in the adjoining counties. He was generally regarded as a paragon of wisdom and virtue by his home people. No such genius could long be encompassed by the confines that bounded the little county of Edmonson. He soon heard the siren call of fame from the outside world. He answered that call.

Honors and distinctions were heaped upon him one after another. He was called to fill many different positions of public trust and confidence, and no one will say that he did not fill each of the positions well. From school teacher, examiner of teachers, county chairman of the Democratic Party, county attorney of Edmonson, his native county, first assistant attorney general and later attorney general of Kentucky, chief justice of the court of appeals, Kentucky's highest court, he was elected to the United States Senate. These were but a few of the honorable positions he held.

If he had held each position to which he was chosen to its termination, it would have required more than 40 years of continuous service without a day of rest. But through it all he found time to teach a Sunday school class every Sunday for more than 30 years without missing a single Sunday.

He also found time to serve the Independent Order of the Odd Fellows in every capacity and office within the gift of this great order, including that of grand sire of the world.

He made public addresses in every county in Kentucky, in nearly every State in the Union, and in many foreign countries.

He practiced law in all the courts of the Nation from that of the justice of peace to the Supreme Court of the United States. It has been truthfully said that the work he did would have been sufficient to keep an ordinary man employed for hundreds of years, and yet he found time to greet every man, no matter how humble, and shake his hand and give him a word of cheer. He found time to worship his God and teach His sacred word for over a third of a century, and through it all he never lost the common touch.

On every suitable occasion and in every land, he praised the county of his birth—his county and your county—and never failed to praise the people whom he so dearly loved, honored, and respected. Your fame and virtues he has extolled from a thousand platforms, and on numberless occasions both public and private. The greatest tribute he has ever paid, and the tenderest testimony he could give to you and his county, showing the love and affection in his gentle and noble heart, was his request at the end of his labor that he be brought to rest with you until the coming of the Lord; that he thereby might be permitted to arise and meet his Saviour face to face, and side by side with you. We have brought him home—home to you.

The world has been the recipient of his wisdom and counsel. The wealth of the Nation was at his command, yet it could not tempt him from his faith in honesty and Christianity, which is the common faith of his native people. His philosophy, belief in Christianity, and everyday honesty, which all of you hold in common with him, is your greatest heritage, and was the greatest factor in promoting and raising him to the pinnacle of distinction and glory to which he arose.

Here we leave him in his glory, but we leave him not alone. The love and respect of his countrymen and his people will hover over him to keep him company in his dreamless sleep. Here he will rest until "the Master of all good workmen shall set him to work anew."

First Prayer Delivered in Congress

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN M. HOUSTON

OF KANSAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, October 18, 1939

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include what is purported to have been the first prayer ever delivered in the National Congress, uttered in December 1777:

O Lord, our Heavenly Father, high and mighty King of Kings and Lord of Lords, who dost from Thy throne behold all the dwellers on earth and reignest with power supreme and uncontrolled over all the kingdoms, empires, and governments, look down in mercy, we beseech Thee, on these American States, who have fled to Thee from the rod of the oppresser and thrown themselves on Thy gracious protection, desiring henceforth to be dependent only on Thee; to Thee they have appealed for the righteousness of their cause; to Thee do they now look up for that countenance and support of which Thou alone canst give; take them, therefore, Heavenly Father, under Thy nurturing care; give them wisdom in council and valor in the field; defeat the malicious designs of our cruel adversaries; convince them of the unrighteousness of their cause; and, if they persist in their sanguinary purpose, let the voice of Thy own unerring justice, sounding in their heart, constrain them to drop the weapons of war from their hands in the day of battle.

Be Thou present, O God of Wisdom, and direct the councils of this honorable Assembly; enable them to settle things on the best and surest foundation, that the scene of blood may be speedily closed; that order, harmony, and peace may be effectually restored and truth and justice, religion and piety prevail and flourish among Thy people. Preserve the health of their bodies and vigor of their minds; shower down on them, and the millions they here represent such temporal blessings as Thou seest expedient for them in this world, and crown them with everlasting glory in the world to come. All this we ask in the name and through the merits of Jesus Christ, Thy Son, our Saviour. Amen.

The American Merchant Marine

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOSIAH W. BAILEY

OF NORTH CAROLINA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, October 19 (legislative day of Wednesday, October 4), 1939

ADDRESS BY ADMIRAL LAND

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, I offer for publication in the Appendix of the RECORD a timely and important address delivered by Rear Admiral Emory S. Land, Chairman of the United States Maritime Commission, at the American merchant marine conference, at the Hotel Waldorf Astoria, New York, on October 10, 1939.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The circumstances under which we meet this year are overcast by doubts and dangers. We cannot view even the immediate future with any degree of certainty.

A large part of the world has again succumbed to the convulsion of war. The ultimate bearing this conflict may have upon our country cannot now be measured.

Some of our fellow citizens see civilization about to be consumed in fires of its own kindling. Others, and we hope they are right, see the horizon less darkly. It is my counsel to you that whatever happens we be prepared to meet it; that we meet it confidently and with a purpose inspired by the knowledge that we in America can tip the scales toward peace, justice, and the perpetuation of the best of political systems yet devised by man.

The industry with which we at this meeting are immediately concerned is the first to feel the pressures of the conflict. As time goes on those pressures increase, and, in my opinion, it is of vital interest to our country that our foreign trade and merchant shipping be not squeezed to death by our own hands.

As most of you know, the Maritime Commission was charged by the Congress, upon the Commission's creation in 1936, with the responsibility of returning the American merchant fleet to its proper place upon the seas. In this there was a double purpose. First, that what we may call the arts of peace might be stimulated and more soundly developed through the instrument of a stronger merchant marine; second, that our Navy be provided with a merchant fleet suitable for its needs in times of emergency.

The Maritime Commission adopted a plan to accomplish the purposes of the Congress in a systematic and orderly manner. The keystone was a construction program designed to provide replacements and such additions as might be necessary in a merchant fleet that had declined to such an extent that we stood at the very bottom of the list of the six principal maritime nations in respect to ships with a speed of 12 knots or less. We were next to the bottom among those maritime nations in respect to the advanced age of our tonnage involved in foreign trade.

At the beginning of the World War in 1914 we had scarcely any merchant marine in foreign trade. We were wholly dependent upon services provided by foreign-flag ships. Consequently our shippers, which, of course, included farmers as well as manufacturers, were at the mercy of a freight-rate structure over which we had no control whatsoever. I think most of you recall that little mercy was shown. Our shortcomings at that time cost us dearly. But it was a lesson we had to be taught.

Today, I am happy to say, we have the makings of a fine and substantial merchant fleet into which new life, new energy, and, I think, new enterprise, has been injected during the past 2 years.

During those 2 years the Maritime Commission has ordered for itself or in conjunction with private operators 127 ships, of which 22 have already been launched. Those upon which trials have been held have proved to be the most efficient of any of their types in the world, particularly from the point of view of economical operation. Great strides have been made in engineering and designing merchant ships. The Commission has worked out and placed on the shipways of the country several standard types of cargo vessels. Such a system effects substantial economies in design and construction, and in case of emergency it will not be necessary to lose weeks or months in working out ship designs.

As the months have passed, increasing interest on the part of private operators has been shown in connection with our new vessels. Inquiries and discussions indicate beyond any doubt that given anything like normal trade conditions virtually all of the vessels being built for the Commission's account would be acquired by private operators.

In recent weeks our construction program has been accelerated, but not increased, in point of view of the number of ships it was planned to build. Despite reports to the contrary, our normal program and now our accelerated program are being handled satisfactorily either with existing shipyard facilities or with such additions as private capital has indicated that it is prepared to finance.

Reports that the Commission was preparing to rehabilitate old shipyards or establish new ones are contradicted by the fact that we have neither the authority nor the funds for such purposes. And because orders have already been placed under the accelerated program, the Commission does not at this time intend to go into the market for additional construction.

So great are the problems faced today by our merchant marine that I decline to predict. I can say only that the Commission does not contemplate cancelation of any orders already placed for new ships. In that connection there are two points to be borne in mind; first, as I suggested a moment ago, the power and efficiency of a navy are minimized if not lost without fast and able merchant vessels. These are the ships which feed, fuel, and, to an important extent, house the navy in times of emergency, as well as carrying to our shores the strategic war materials necessary to national defense. The second point involves the future insofar as the necessity is likely to arise for extraordinary merchant services following upon the cessation of war. The extent of that need no one can say. We feel it may be great, for that would indicate that the pursuits of peace have not been wholly destroyed by the effects of war.

I have spoken of uncertainties, particularly in connection with the future. They are just as great as applied to the present with which we must be principally concerned at this time. We are presented with a possibility of legislation by the Congress, which, in effect, may virtually abolish the carriage of foreign trade in American-flag ships throughout the world.

There is reason to believe that our foreign trade may increase substantially, but by that I do not mean into the immediate belligerent areas. The merchant ships of the warring nations are being pressed into services primarily of a military nature. Sailing schedules have been interrupted and in some cases routes have been virtually abandoned. And this in areas remote from the actual scene of conflict.

It seems to me that here is an opportunity, without in any way endangering the safety of our Nation, to improve and to expand our trade relations with distant countries. But such expansion would be impossible were we to be deprived of the merchant ships to carry cargoes which such undertakings would involve.

Again, all the indices and business charts seem to point to a continuance and improvement in our domestic situation. That means there will be an increasing demand for raw materials within those industries, and there are many, which depend upon the products of other nations for their operation. Were we to abandon our fleet and again become dependent upon the speculative ventures of foreign-flag operators, much of the benefit to be derived from this expanding domestic situation would be lost.

During the first half of this year our export trade amounted to slightly less than a billion and a half dollars, and our imports for the same period to something in excess of a billion. These figures indicate that our foreign trade is still above the preceding 5-year average, and taking it on a quantity basis about 52 percent of our various export items showed increases over 1938, as did 71 percent of our import items.

This situation is one which is, of course, reflected in the balance sheets of our ocean carriers—our merchant fleet. A continuance of this trend would mean, I am sure, increasing share in this trade for vessels flying the American flag. And it is important to remember that revenues of the principal American-flag operators in foreign trade need not be increased unreasonably to reduce very substantially the amount of operating subsidies paid by the Government. These are now running substantially less than $18,000,000 a year against former payments of as much as $26,000,000 and $27,000,000 annually.

What we have gained and what we might justifiably hope to gain in the near future would be lost, and much of it perhaps irretrievably lost, were our merchant fleet to be taken off the seas.

With no attempt to criticize legislation now pending which carries this threat, it seems to me that there are a few salient facts which should be known and understood by those who may not be fully informed about our merchant marine.

Should this legislation be passed containing a prohibition against entrance of American-flag ships into all ports of belligerent nations, it would mean simply that American ships could no longer, for instance, carry on our trade at such ports as those of Australia, New Zealand, the Union of South Africa, Canada, British crown colonies and possessions, as well as those of France and Germany. Many of these ports—a substantial majority even—are far from the scenes of actual warfare.

Prudence alone, it seems to me, would exert considerable influence against carrying on traffic in areas of primary danger. That is not to say, of course, that danger zones where peril may be great should not be designated and American ships prohibited entrance into them.

Extending such a prohibition to the remote parts of belligerent nations would affect directly more than a score of American ship companies operating over 200 vessels of better than a million gross tons. This, I might add, is fully two-thirds of our existing merchant fleet in foreign trade.

The effect would be severe and widespread. The livelihood of several hundred thousand people and their dependents would be jeopardized, as well as investments of several hundred million dollars. Trade routes under development which have been considered by the Congress essential to the welfare of our economy and of our national defense would no longer be served. We would again become dependent upon ships flying flags other than our own.

The potentialities attendant upon virtual abolition of our fleet in foreign service seems to me of much more than incidental or minor importance in the whole problem the Congress is now discussing. The ultimate effect of withdrawing our ships from the seas upon our economy and upon our trade relations throughout the world can only be imagined at this time. But I am convinced that it would involve a sacrifice of very grave proportions. The desirability of taking such a crucial step at this time is the problem which the Congress in its wisdom must resolve.

Should it be decided that so great a part of our merchant fleet suspend its present operations in areas remote from the actual belligerent waters, the question arises as to what disposition shall be made of these vessels. At the moment it appears that many of them would have to be tied up and carried in idle status pending future developments. There have been reports that we might allow disposal of large numbers of these ships to foreign nations. No such plan is being considered. In that connection it is well to understand, and I repeat, that a merchant fleet is of vital necessity to an efficient navy.

It is to be hoped that whatever is done will be done without haste and with all the facts before the public, that all may be guided to a sound and dispassionate judgment in so important a matter as the future of our foreign trade and the ships which we hope may carry more and more and more of it to the ports of the world.

Trade With Latin America

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LISTER HILL

OF ALABAMA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, October 19 (legislative day of Wednesday, October 4), 1939

EDITORIAL FROM THE WASHINGTON POST

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an editorial from the Washington Post of the issue of October 13, 1939, under the heading "Too Great Expectations." The editorial has to do with Latin American trade.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Washington Post of October 13, 1939]

TOO GREAT EXPECTATIONS

In a letter to James A. Farrell, chairman of the board, National Foreign Trade Council, Jesse H. Jones points out that "trade balances necessarily control foreign commerce, credit can help temporarily, but the only permanent solution is real trade where we buy as well as sell. * * * During the past several years," he adds, "the Government has found it necessary to lend to business of almost every character, and it can continue to assist foreign trade in a modest way principally through loans to private business dealing in foreign trade."

Mr. Jones' wise observations apply with especial force to our trade with Latin America, and carry an implied warning against anticipation of any spectacular increase in that trade.

At first glance the trade openings created there by the outbreak of war in Europe appear extraordinarily promising. In 1937, for instance, Germany exported about a quarter of a billion dollars to Latin America, while Great Britain and France together shipped a slightly larger amount of goods. Since most of Germany's Latin American trade will probably disappear for the duration of the war and French and British shipments will doubtless be reduced, the United States will unquestionably be called upon to supply part of the huge deficiency in imports from Europe.

There are, however, two arresting thoughts to keep in mind when considering the Latin American trade outlook. First, we have to consider whether trade gained because of a war-provoked interruption to normal commercial transactions is likely to be a permanent gain. And, secondly, we must ask ourselves how the trade diverted toward this country is to be financed. The countries to the south of us are, with few exceptions, in open default on debt obligations held abroad, and all of them are pressed to find the foreign exchange with which to meet current payments for necessary imports. In short, it is the old story of being compelled to sell goods in order to obtain the means for buying them. Indeed, hard-pressed countries like those of Latin America need to sell a good deal more than they buy in order to service foreign indebtedness and pay for needed imports as well.

Unfortunately for our hopes, the loss of European export outlets in Latin America has been accompanied by the loss of Latin American export outlets in Europe. Hence, the ability of Latin America to buy our products—limited at all times—has been further reduced by the war. We must, therefore, either buy more from the other American republics, if we wish to expand our trade with them, or we must be prepared to dispose of goods on credit without proper assurance of repayment.

Credit can help temporarily, as Mr. Jones says, to develop our trade abroad, but it cannot supply the solid foundation upon which all foreign trade, in final analysis, is based. Trade agreements, too, eliminate artificial obstacles to trade with Latin American countries by lowering tariff barriers and removing causes of friction. But these aids to commerce must be implemented, so to speak, by an expansion of buying on our part if we expect to obtain a permanently larger share of Latin American custom.

That means, specifically, that we must be prepared to accept more goods of a type that is in competition with our own products, such as sugar, hides, beef, and other foodstuffs. For increased buying of coffee, bananas, and other noncompeting exports of Latin America certainly could not be counted upon to offset any large increase in our exports. If we are not willing to admit that necessity, we might as well resign ourselves to a very moderate increase in Latin American trade.

Canada and the United States

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES F. BYRNES

OF SOUTH CAROLINA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, October 19 (legislative day of Wednesday, October 4), 1939

ARTICLE BY WALTER LIPPMANN

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an article entitled "Canada and the United States," written by Walter Lippmann, in his column Today and Tomorrow.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the New York Herald Tribune]

TODAY AND TOMORROW

By Walter Lippmann

CANADA AND THE UNITED STATES

There is no subject which it is more important to study carefully, none about which it is more necessary to think clearly and speak responsibly, than the relations between Canada and the United States.

Canada is our immediate neighbor across the longest unarmed frontier in the world. Canada is a small country, with 10,000,000 inhabitants as against our own 130,000,000. The Canadian people have essentially the same culture, the same system of law, the same political philosophy as the people of the United States, and their economic life is closely interwoven with our own.

Canadians are a free, self-governing, independent nation, allied with but in no sense of the word subject to the British Government in the United Kingdom. They are not a British colony; their allegiance to the British Crown comes from no compulsion that Great Britain can exert, but from their own deliberate choice and free consent.

For more than a hundred years we have enjoyed the best possible relations with Canada; our common frontier, 3,000 miles long, is unfortified. Never at any time has this country had designs against Canada; never at any time has Canada seriously felt itself threatened by the United States. The fact that Canada is a part of the British Commonwealth has preserved the Canadian people against that feeling of inferiority, with its attendant fears and suspicions, that weak nations have in regard to powerful neighbors. The fears and suspicions that are so strong elsewhere in this hemisphere have been almost nonexistent in Canada.

We, on the other hand, had learned to recognize that the connection between Canada and Great Britain, plus the unfortified frontier, constituted an absolute guaranty of peace between the British Empire and ourselves. With Canada providing an unmistakable pledge of British good behavior, no one in his senses could look upon the British possessions in this hemisphere as even a potential and theoretical menace to our own country.

In the past weeks our relations with Canada and with the rest of this hemisphere have been disturbed much more seriously than appears on the surface, more dangerously than most people in this country have yet realized. There has been Colonel Lindbergh's speech, which, though this may not have been his intention, seems to say that Canada should disassociate herself from Great Britain and accept the United States as her guide, mentor, protector, and suzerain. There has been the very crude speech of Senator LUNDEEN proposing that we undertake armed aggression against British and French colonial possessions. The people of this country may think these speeches are isolationist and neutral, and evidently the pacifist organizations who are circulating some of them are under this illusion. But everywhere else in this hemisphere and in the rest of the world, these speeches will be taken as a manifestation of American imperialism.

It will be hard for this country to live down those speeches; they will be remembered long after the people of this country have hoped they are forgotten. For the weak who live next to the strong have long memories; they are disposed to fear the strong, and when they have been threatened as the British people in this hemisphere have been threatened, they tend to believe what their weakness has already prepared them to suspect.

This suspicion will haunt us, and it will poison in a degree that it will not be easy for us to remedy, the whole effort of this country to achieve a solidarity of peace and order in the Western Hemisphere. For let us have no illusions whatever about it. We are immeasurably the strongest power in this hemisphere, and the other peoples will never willingly accept our protection if they have reason to suspect that they must submit to our domination. How are they to know whether Colonel Lindbergh's remarks are the unconsidered opinions of an inexperienced young man or whether they express the sentiments of a party which may win the next election? But surely they will in their hearts suspect the worst, especially since the rest of Colonel Lindbergh's speech agrees so perfectly with the proposals of an important faction of his party.

For these reasons we cannot dismiss the matter from our minds as a deplorable incident about which the least said the better. The suspicion which has been planted in the relations of this hemisphere can be eradicated only by full and free discussion which will clarify our true relationship to Canada, and to the British Commonwealth, and to the British colonial possessions, and to all the Latin nations who are within the scope of the Monroe Doctrine.

It would have been better if these great questions could have been discussed in a quieter time, in an atmosphere free of the hysteria of war. But we have no choice; against the spread of such imperialist ideas in this country and the repercussions among all our neighbors in this hemisphere, it is necessary now to erect a barrier of true and sound and responsible opinion.

That will take time and much serious thought. But we must begin, I submit, by recognizing as one of the great circumstances of our life the fact that our nearest neighbor is a member of the British Commonwealth of Nations. We may like or dislike this historic fact; we cannot change it. Indeed, were we to follow Colonel Lindbergh by proposing that Canada separate from the British Commonwealth, we should instantly provide the Canadian people with the invincible reason why they must never separate from the British Commonwealth. For if Canada separated because we asked her to separate, Canada would become in fact, even if not in name, a protectorate of the United States. Being a nation of 10,000,000 to our 130,000,000, the position of Canada would be like that of Cuba.

It follows that Canada will remain a member of the British Commonwealth, even more solidly a member insofar as opinions like those of Colonel Lindbergh and Senator LUNDEEN are believed to be current in the United States.

We have then to recognize, I submit, that whatever the result of the war in Europe, Canada is destined to become a great, interior stronghold of the British system.

Once, Canada was a colonial outpost of the empire; then, it became a self-governing dominion; latterly, it has been an independent nation allied with the other British nations. Tomorrow, it will be an inner citadel, perhaps the inner citadel, of the British world. For since the British Isles are no longer invulnerable to attack by sea and by air, since Canada has grown in industrial maturity, Canada will almost certainly be developed as a vital strategic base of the British power.

This will be one of the great changes of modern history. The change is proceeding rapidly under the pressure of the war, which demonstrates the vulnerability of the British Isles, and under the influence of such measures as the arms embargo, which demonstrate the danger to Britain of her dependence upon uncertain supplies from this country. Indeed, if the arms embargo is retained, the very existence of Great Britain may depend upon the development of Canadian industry.

We must look forward, therefore, to seeing Canada become a strategic base rather than a mere distanct outpost of Britain. Then, obviously, the wise conduct of our relations with Canada will become the paramount question in our foreign policy.

That question will not be disposed of—in fact, it will be made totally insoluble—if we follow Colonel Lindbergh and challenge Canada's right and her interest as a member of the British Commonwealth. Such a challenge must inevitably be interpreted as a threat to Canadian independence and as a threat of imperialism from the United States. Such a challenge can engender only the invincible suspicion of a weaker people against its stronger neighbor.

That is a dangerously bad atmosphere to create for the discussion of the great problem which is now arising, because Britain and the United States are becoming so much more closely neighbors than they have ever been before. It is a problem, a momentous problem, perhaps in its consequences our greatest problem. It is delicate, difficult, and complex; and if there is any statesmanship in us, let us not begin by poisoning the atmosphere with suspicions like those which have made so tragically difficult an understanding across the political frontiers of Europe.

Let us instead recognize clearly, let us ponder calmly, let us discuss in a cool and generous spirit the fact—the great historic fact—that in our own time, now before our eyes, our northern land frontier is becoming a frontier 3,000 miles long between the United States and a Canada which is destined to be one of the main citadels of the British power.

A fact of that kind shapes the destiny of nations. For when a vital center of the British power is on one side of that frontier and the center of our own power is on this side of it, then for weal or for woe the fundamental policies of the two countries will be weighted with immeasurable consequences. For their policies will have either to remain parallel and reciprocal or to become divergent and antagonistic.

This is the great question which is now already visible on the horizon, and the whole capacity of both nations for sober thought and responsible speech and statesmanlike conduct will be needed to answer that question rightfully.

Effect of Proposed Concession in Argentine Trade Agreement on Domestic Cheese

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FRANK E. HOOK

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, October 18, 1939

BRIEF BEFORE THE FEDERAL TRADE COMMISSION

Mr. HOOK. Mr. Speaker, under unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD, I include therein a history of the Italian cheese industry in the United States, this being a brief which was filed before the Federal Trade Commission, as follows:

The per capita consumption of cheese in the United States is much lower than it is in most other countries. Comparatively, very little progress has been made in this country in increasing the consumption of cheese, while great progress has been made during the last 15 years in increasing the consumption of ice cream, butter, milk, and cream. The retarded development in the consumption of cheese by the American public is in a large measure due to the limited varieties offered by the American cheese producers to the consumers. Probably no other food is so important as cheese in the diet of the American people. It is only during the last few years that we have made some real progress in increasing the varieties of cheese and, to some extent, its consumption.

There is no doubt but that the strong competition of foreign cheese, in a great measure, is responsible for the retarded development in the production of cheese in the United States. It was felt for a long time that many varieties of cheese, such as the Italian types, Swiss types, and French types could be produced successfully only in the particular localities in which said types had originated. So for a long time it was the general belief that Swiss cheese could be made only in Switzerland; Italian types of cheese only in Italy; Camembert only in Normandy; and Roquefort only in France. Now all these varieties of cheese are made in countries other than the one in which they originated. Swiss cheese, for instance, is produced in Finland, Estonia, Czechoslovakia, Argentina, and in large volumes in the United States. Camembert is produced in Switzerland, France, and in large volumes in the United States. The Italian types of cheese are produced in Albania, Greece, and in large volumes in Argentina and in the United States.

It is true that the different regions are more or less adapted by reason of climatic or pastural conditions, to the production of certain types of cheese. The progress made by the dairy technician and particularly the achievement made possible by the adoption of milk pasteurization and by the use of special cultures, has permitted the cheese producer to overcome the many difficulties originally presented by milk and climatic conditions. Twenty years ago it was considered impossible to produce Provolone cheese in northern Italy. It was also considered impossible to produce good Reggiano, Parmesan, or Romano type of cheese in the United States. Today, however, Parmesan, Reggiano, Romano, and Provolone cheeses are produced in the northern part of Wisconsin and in northern Michigan, and their quality compares favorably with cheese of the same type produced in Italy.

The achievement of the Italian cheese producer in the United States is the result of 25 years of continuous research work and persevering effort. The Italian cheese maker is no longer left alone to cope with poor milk and with unfavorable climatic conditions. The bacteriologists, the chemist, and the engineer are all at his elbow.

The Stella Cheese Co., for instance, has a chemical laboratory in each one of its plants, headed by a very competent bacteriologist and chemist. All milk used in the plants operated by this company is filtered and most of it pasteurized. All its salting and curing rooms are air-conditioned. Every vat of cheese has a fermentation test record, and nothing is left to chance—everything is checked and rechecked. In this manner it has been possible for the Italian cheese industry in the United States to produce Italian cheese in large volumes and to have said cheese take the place of similar types of cheese which heretofore have been imported from Italy. The American food manufacturer, having had the opportunity of ascertaining the enormous progress achieved by the Italian cheese industry, is now almost exclusively using Italian cheese of domestic production, while only a few years ago he was very reluctant in adopting it. A large volume of Italian cheese is now finding its way into American production of spaghetti in cans, soups, meat balls, ravioli, etc.

While a few years ago the consumption of Italian cheese was limited mostly to Italian emigrants residing in the United States, today the American public is the largest consumer of grated Italian cheese used for seasoning. It is for this reason that the production of cheese of the Italian type has about doubled during the last 3 years. The progress made by the Italian cheese industry in the United States would not have been possible if the tariff on this cheese had not been adequate.

The United States tariff on all cheese of Italian types, with the exception of Gorgonzola, which comes under the classification of blue cheese, is 7 cents per pound, or 35 percent ad valorem, whichever is the higher.

The price of milk in Italy during the last 3 years has been at about the same level as the price of milk in the United States. The cost of labor and general overhead expenses in Italy has been and still is about one-fourth of the corresponding cost in the United States. The tariff protection has taken care, to some extent, of the lower cost of labor and overhead enjoyed by the Italian cheese producer. On the other hand, the imported Italian cheese, not so much by reason of its quality but mostly because it is an imported article and because it is sold under well-established and renowned foreign trade-marks, sells in the United States at a price which generally is from 20 to 30 percent over and above the price at which Italian cheese of American production of the same type sells on the American market.

In some of the years preceding the depression Italy exported to the United States as much as 36,000,000 pounds of cheese, which represented more than one-half of the total cheese imported by the United States from foreign countries, both as to volume as well as to value. The volume of cheese imported from Italy to the United States has decreased at about the same ratio at which the domestic production of it has increased. In fact, the total export of cheese from Italy to the United States in 1938 amounted to approximately 24,000,000 pounds, while the production of Italian cheese during the same year amounted to about the same volume.

It is important to take into account the fact that the American market for Italian types of cheese is limited because most of the cheese is used solely in grated form for seasoning purposes. In fact, the exportation of fresh cheese from Italy to the United States has never proved to be successful. The progress made in the United States in the production of cheese of the Provolone type has practically eliminated the importation of this type of cheese from Italy.

We think it advisable to attach herewith a brief study of the Italian cheese industry in the United States, together with 63 authentic photographs taken at the plants of the Stella Cheese Co. The history of the Italian cheese industry outlines the remarkable progress which it has made during the last few years. The photographs of the plants of the Stella Cheese Co. prove the permanency and large investment made in this industry. It is an important fact that at present the largest plants engaged in the production of Italian cheese are to be found in the remote regions of the cut-over lands in northern Wisconsin and northern Michigan, where an adequate market for milk has been in want for many years. It is also important to take notice that while the production of Swiss cheese in the United States decreased from 40,472,000 in 1937 to 38,500,000 in 1938, and while Limburger decreased from 8,844,000 to 7,695,000, the Italian cheese increased from 14,714,000 to 17,647,000 (this according to a bulletin issued by the Bureau of the Census, published December 19, 1938). If we take into account the number of Italian cheese factories that do not report their production and the extensive progress made by the Italian cheese industry in 1938 and 1939, we then reach the total calculated production of 30,000,000 pounds, as indicated in the history of the Italian cheese industry.

We thought it advisable to make special reference to the cheese imported from Italy on account of its close relationship with the Italian cheese imported from Argentina to the United States. Years ago, when there was no production of Italian cheese in Argentina, large volumes of cheese of Italian production were exported from Italy to South America, and some of the largest Italian producers had headquarters in Buenos Aires.

First the European War and then the economical conditions which prevailed in Argentina in the period after the war caused the large producers of Italian cheese to emigrate and transplant their industry in Argentina. They did so, first, in order to take advantage of the extensive consumption of Italian cheese in Argentina, caused by the large number of Italians residing there; second, to take advantage of the cheese protective tariff of Argentina; but principally to take advantage of the low cost of milk, labor, supplies, and low rates prevailing in that country.

We desire to present herewith a statement outlining the comparative cost in the operation of a small cheese factory in the United States and in Argentina. The cost of the milk indicated in said statement is the one prevailing at this writing in Wisconsin and in upper Michigan. The cost of labor and overhead for the American cheese factory is based on certified audited reports of the Stella Cheese Co. as per the year 1938.

Comparative monthly cost of operating a cheese factory engaged in the production of Italian-type cheese, using 4,000 pounds of milk per day, in Argentina and in the United States, as of Oct. 1, 1939

	Argentina	United States
A. 4,000 pounds of milk per day testing 3.5 percent, 4,200 pounds of butterfat, Argentine price 9/10 of a peso or 16.50 per pound	$693.00
United States price 39		$1,638.00
B. Labor (1 cheese maker and 1 helper). Argentine cheese maker 120 pesos, helper 70 pesos, (at 33 cents per peso)	62.70
United States cheese maker $150, helper $50		230.00
C. Supplies, warehousing, management, taxes, insurance, depreciation, interest on investment, cost of distribution. In Argentina, ratio of 1/3 to the cost to United States	152.30	457.00
Total	908.00	2,325.00
Butterfat recovered in the manufacture of cheese on the basis of 8/00 on volume of milk (butter in Argentina at 14 cents per pound. In United States at 27 cents per pound)	134.40	259.20
Net cost of cheese	773.60	2,065.80
Total cheese of the Sbrinz and Romanello type produced when ready for market, on basis of 7 pounds of cheese for every 100 pounds of milk ..... pounds	8,400	8,400
Factory cost of cheese per pound	$0.092	$0.248

The cost price of the cheese indicated in the above statement is net and does not provide for any return on the investment capital.

The cost of milk in Argentina is the one reported by the latest dairy-trade publications; the cost of labor is the one reported by the United States Department of Commerce; and the other items constituting the general overhead, were obtained from trade publications.

Under present conditions, the Argentine producers of Italian-type cheese can well afford to pay transportation to the United States, and our present duty on cheese, and still have a margin in excess of 7 cents per pound over the cost to the United States producers on the same type of cheese. This is proven by the fact that the volume of Italian-type cheese exported by Argentina to the United States has been for several years past—and is now—continually on the increase, as shown by the following statistics furnished by the United States Department of Commerce:

CHEESE IMPORTED FROM ARGENTINA TO THE UNITED STATES

1937: 1,048,000 pounds. Declared value $131,724.
1938: 1,464,000 pounds. No declared value available.
1939: 1,125,000 pounds (first 8 months). No declared value available.

Please take notice that the price of dairy commodities in the United States in 1937 and generally in the world markets, were 15 percent higher than they are at the present time. The per-pound price in 1937 of the Argentina cheese f. o. b. New York was 13 cents, as established by the above statistics. This was also true insofar as the cost, and thereupon, the price of cheese in Argentina is concerned.

COMPARISON OF THE RELATIVE TARIFF PROTECTION ON CHEESE OF ITALIAN TYPES WITH TARIFF PROTECTION ON OTHER DAIRY PRODUCTS

Due to the fact that cheese of Italian types are produced with a very low percentage of moisture and that the workmanship required in their production is very costly, the protection which the cheese manufacturer or the American farmer receives from every 100 pounds of milk, is much less than the protection which the producers of Cheddar cheese or butter receive on the same quantity of milk. The following computation will bring out the accuracy of this statement as shown on the next page.

Tariff protection of 100 pounds of milk at 3 percent butterfat used in the production of butter and its byproducts

From skimming 100 pounds of milk at 3½ percent butterfat (overrun 23 percent), 4.3 percent pounds of butter are produced, which receives a tariff protection on the basis of 14 cents per pound, equal to	$0.602
Dry skimmed milk produced at the rate of 8½ pounds for every 100 pounds of whole milk, tariff protection on same basis of 3 cents per pound	.255
Total tariff protection	.857

Tariff protection on 100 pounds of milk at 3½ percent butterfat used in the production of Parmesan and Reggiano cheese and its byproducts

Parmesan or Reggiano cheese fully cured, aged from 16 to 24 months, produced from milk standardized at 2.8 percent net butterfat, 6.25 pounds. Present tariff protection on same 7 cents per pound, equal to (Note: The Parmesan and Reggiano require longer curing and contain less moisture from Romanello and Sbrinz. All these cheeses are produced in Argentina.)	$0.4375
Butter produced from butterfat derived from the standardization of the milk and from the whey, equal to 0.8 pound of butter, tariff protection on the basis of 14 cents per pound	.1120
Total tariff protection	.05495

Tariff protection on 100 pounds of milk used in the production of American Cheddar and its byproducts

Cheddar cheese obtained from said milk when ready for market, 9½ pounds, tariff protection at the rate of 7 cents per pound, equal to	$0.6650
Butter produced from whey, 0.3 pound, tariff protection on the basis of 14 cents per pound	.0420
Total tariff protection	.7070

The low basic per-pound rate provided by the United States tariff, which would have not given adequate protection to the cheese of Italian types such as Parmesan, Asiago, Provolone, and Pecorino (which are produced with very low moisture content and which require long periods of curing) was intended to be supported by the application of the 35 percent ad valorem clause. But how can this provision be made applicable on Parmesan or Reggiano cheese from Argentina when they are invoiced at 13 cents per pound?

In other words, Parmesan, Asiago, Provolone, and Romano cheese—which require a very large amount of manual labor in their production, a long and expensive curing, and which give a yield per pound of butterfat of less than 65 percent of the yield given by cheese of the Cheddar type—receives no more tariff protection in relation to the Argentine cheese of Italian types than the cheese which is placed on the market 3 days after it is produced.

The data used in the foregoing computation are based on 20 years of continuous experience in the production of Parmesan, Reggiano, and Provolene cheese in Wisconsin and Michigan.

The difference of over 25 cents per 100 pounds of raw milk between the tariff protection enjoyed by the producer who uses this milk in the production of butter over and above the tariff protection given to the producer of cheese of Italian type does not affect the Italian cheese industry in the United States alone, but affects the American dairy industry in general.

The cost of transportation on cheese from Argentina to New York amounts to about 2 cents per pound, while the transportation of the Michigan and Wisconsin cheese to the consuming markets in carlot loads (the eastern seaboard States) is over 1 cent per pound. By adding the United States duty of 7 cents per pound to the cost of production and to the cost of transportation, the Argentine cheese producer is in a position to deliver his cheese in the New York market at 18 cents per pound. This is exactly the price paid today for Argentine Sbrinz and Romanello, which are the types of cheese used in the preceding statement concerning relative cost of production. The average cost of Italian cheese of domestic production delivered in New York is, instead, 26 cents per pound, while the price of the cheese of the same type imported from Italy is about 35 cents per pound. There is, therefore, no room for doubt that Argentine cheese needs no special protection nor any added inducement to enter the United States markets. On the other hand, we find that the production cost of Italian cheese in the United States is rapidly and constantly increasing, due to improved and more costly methods of production, higher wages, higher cost of building, machinery, and supplies—to say nothing about taxes and social security.

For the reasons given on the preceding page the Italian Cheese Producer's Federation earnestly and respectfully wishes to bring to the attention of the competent authorities of the United States Government the following:

1. The importance which the Italian cheese industry in the United States has acquired and the valuable contribution which it renders to the American dairy farmers by lifting the equivalent of 20,000,000 pounds of butter from the surplus dairy production of the nation.

2. The necessity for the United States to render itself self-supporting in its requirements of Italian cheese.

3. The large difference in the cost of production of these types of cheese in Argentina and in the United States (Argentina, $0.092 per pound; United States, $0.246) and the vast margin which the Argentine producer of Italian-type cheese has over the cheese producer of the United States.

4. The discriminating tariff protection already existing between the different products of the dairy industry, to wit, for every 100 pounds of milk used in the production of butter and milk powder, $0.357; for every 100 pounds of milk used in the production of American Cheddar cheese, $0.7070; for every 100 pounds of milk used in the production of hard types of Italian cheese, $0.5495.

5. The necessity of encouraging the development of the Italian cheese industry in the United States now that it has firmly established itself and is in a position to make substantial contribution in relieving a large part of the milk surplus of the Nation.

6. To the fact that the market on these types of cheese, which is used almost exclusively in seasoning foods is limited and that the cheese now being imported from Italy, together with similar cheese of domestic production, are more than adequate to take care of the American markets, for which reason the American producer should be given encouragement in further conquering the market now controlled by the cheese from Italy—which sells at a higher price—and not be harassed by special tariff concession in favor of the cheese from Argentina, much inferior in quality to the cheese of American production, and which Argentina cheese for the reasons indicated above sells at prices averaging 30 percent below the cost of production of the corresponding American cheese.

7. To the damage that would derive to the American cheese industry and to the American milk producers should there be any reduction in the tariff covering cheese of Italian types in the proposed new trade agreement with Argentina.

8. To the fact that all the cheese exported by Argentina to the United States, whether they be called Reggiano or Reggianito, Romano or Romanello, Asiago or Goya, Parmesan or Sbrinz, Provolone or Provolie, are all produced by the typical methods used in the production of the corresponding types of Italian cheese—and that, therefore, are intended to take the place of the typical cheese of Italian varieties produced in America.

Report of Northern Lakes States Regional Committee

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM A. PITTENGER

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, October 19, 1939

Mr. PITTENGER. Mr. Speaker, on August 5 I placed my remarks in the RECORD dealing with the discussion by President Roosevelt of a report of the Northern Lakes States Regional Committee. At that time I called the attention of Congress to the importance of this report and the need for legislation.

I have said several times that while Congress is in session that legislation needed to carry out recommendations of these committees should be considered right now.

This report which the President transmitted makes certain suggestions dealing with the unemployment problem in northern Minnesota, northern Michigan, and northern Wisconsin. It deals with problems which affect 86 counties in these States and over 57,000,000 acres of territory. The President says that this is a cut-over area. The forests have nearly all disappeared, and there are more people than jobs. I have discussed the situation with Farm Security Administration officials, and they are of the opinion that additional legislation is needed in connection with the program of transforming this area into self-supporting communities. The President, in discussing the report, calls attention to the fact that programs which have to do with forestry should provide opportunities for work for local people. I have just received an interesting letter which bears on this viewpoint. The writer of this letter is from the district I represent, and he suggests that the United States forestry program should furnish residents of the communities with an opportunity to work in the United States forests. I am in entire accord with his suggestion.

Then there is the problem that exists where people have settled on lands unsuited for agricultural purposes. Machinery should be set up to permit these people to be transferred to land that is suitable to agriculture.

The President also calls attention to the need of giving long-time loans to settlers on good land so that they may become self-supporting.

There are other problems which may require legislative action. My purpose at this time is to suggest that while Congress is in session the proper committees could very well hold hearings in connection with proposed legislation. Every Member of Congress knows that we cannot get congressional action unless the different Government departments that have to deal with these problems make their recommendations to Congress. They do this by appearing before the proper committee and discussing the kind of legislation that is needed and the appropriations that will be required.

This report is going to become a dead document unless the different Government departments appear before the committees of this Congress and suggest legislation that will carry out the suggestions made by the President when he transmitted this report on July 31, 1939. I do not subscribe to the view that all Congress has to do is to deal with the neutrality question and then go home. There is nothing more important to our people than sound legislation which will create more opportunities for unemployed men and women to find work and employment. It is my hope that the chairmen of the various committees in the House will hold meetings and discuss this report of the National Resources Committee.

I am sure that I voice the unanimous sentiment of the different townships, counties, villages, and cities in the district involved when I say that they are anxious to appear before the proper committees and make suggestions as to the type of legislation needed.

Effect of War on United States Trade

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM J. MILLER

OF CONNECTICUT

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, October 19, 1939

ARTICLE BY ROGER BABSON

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article by Roger Babson which appeared recently in the Christian Science Monitor:

[From the Christian Science Monitor]

EXPERT TELLS EFFECT OF WAR ON UNITED STATES TRADE—WORLD WAR CANNOT SERVE AS PATTERN, BUSINESS CONFERENCE HEARS—BABSON SEES STALIN TOP

WELLESLEY, MASS., October 17.—Commodity demand, supply, and prices will not follow the exact pattern of the World War.

Conditions are unprecedented, and the answer to what may reasonably be expected of commodities depends, Henry H. Stafford, commodity specialist, told the Twenty-sixth National Business Conference at Babson Park today, on whether the European conflict will be a long one of years' duration or a short one limited to months.

Assuming a long war, his forecast covered four major points: "Materially higher average commodity prices; a record volume of United States business, some commodity shortages, delayed and uncertain deliveries, and poorer quality; more Government control over commodities and virtual regimentation of business and industry should the United States become involved; some inflation, soaring indebtedness, and ultimate deflation."

VIEW ON COMMODITIES

On a short war, "say within 6 months," Mr. Stafford saw "a sharp decline in the average of commodity prices, with 'war babies' hardest hit; a recession in United States business due to the evaporation of war demand and the necessary adjustments to a peacetime basis; a renewed upswing in United States business and commodity prices following the peace adjustment; a boom in United States business which would be bullish on commodity prices, given a peace settlement inspiring genuine confidence. The outlook is for higher average commodity prices."

Just back from the Orient, Roger W. Babson said it was his conviction that a stalemate has been reached in the Japanese-Chinese war.

"Russia is the controlling factor in the world today. Mussolini has done much for Italy. Hitler has indomitable courage. Chamberlain controls the world's finances. But Stalin is the greatest statesman.

"Stalin's price for helping Great Britain (last August) was that Chamberlain should free India, socialize certain industries of England, and give equal opportunities to all nations and parties."

CITES STALIN'S VIEW

When negotiations between England and Russia failed, Mr. Stalin, according to Mr. Babson, declared: "If a new World War develops, its duration will not be determined by its navy, army, or air force, but by the revolutions at home."

All the belligerents are apprehensive of Soviet Russia and the spread of communism if the war is fought to a finish, Mr. Babson said. China and Japan share that apprehension, he said. Germany does not want Mr. Stalin to dictate peace terms any more than does Great Britain, France, Japan, or Italy—"in short, the whole world, with the possible exception of Russia, is hungry for a long period of peace," he stated.

Should a second World War come, Mr. Babson declared, "Germany and Japan are likely to be lined up with England and France, all against Russia."

On the position of the United States, he added, "If Congress will now amend the Neutrality Act as Col. Charles A. Lindbergh advises, the United States may never be asked to enter the war."

Advising investors, Mr. Babson said: "I should be very leary about holding too many 'war babies' and should carefully go through my safe-deposit box with the idea of getting rid now of certain 'cats and dogs.' But I should continue to hold good stocks, selected commodities, and productive real estate.

"In short, continue to invest according to fundamental conditions, ignoring the war one way or the other. Continue to avoid low-yielding long-term bonds; select stocks of companies which, when inflation comes, will have their own raw materials, and be sure to diversify broadly.

"Have a little farm somewhere inland as an insurance policy and always keep on hand a supply of gasoline, foodstuffs, flashlights, and cash for emergencies. Above all, lay up spiritual and physical reserves and train your children to do likewise as well as to have a useful education."

The Crusade for Peace

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN C. SCHAFER

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, October 19, 1939

RADIO ADDRESS BY REV. EDWARD LODGE CURRAN, PH. D.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following reply to Hon. Alfred E. Smith over Columbia network, October 7, 1939, by Rev. Edward Lodge Curran, Ph. D., president, International Catholic Truth Society; director, Anti-War Crusade, Brooklyn, N. Y.:

The crusade for peace is the most important issue before the attention of the American Nation today. It is a crusade to preserve our present constitutional form of American democracy. It is a crusade to intensify and expand the defenses of our country so that no "red" or "brown" aggressor may ever duplicate in the United States the cunning and cowardly rape of Poland. It is a crusade to keep the United States out of war. And it is a crusade to keep the United States out of the vestibule to war.

The crusade has expressed itself in letters, in phone calls and in telegrams to Congress demanding that the present embargo on arms and ammunition to foreign belligerents be maintained, no matter what other changes may be made in our present neutrality legislation.

Professional columnists in some of our metropolitan newspapers have referred sneeringly to this expression of an awakened public opinion. The professional columnists should rejoice that we still live in a country where citizens still possess the freedom and the energy to convey their attitude on proposed legislation to the supreme law-making body of the United States. The professional columnists themselves are professional letter-writers, receiving handsome salaries for their daily epistles in the metropolitan newspapers. In spite of the professional columnists we of the antiwar crusade intend to increase and deepen and intensify the voice with which the American people is beseeching the Congress to keep us out of war.

There is no mistaking the message of our voice. It is the composite voice of American manhood and American motherhood—Protestant, Jewish, and Catholic alike. It is the composite voice of all American citizens who remember the blunder and the stupidity and the failure and the deceit of our participation in the last World War. We insist that the Congress of the United States heed our voice.

We shall fight, if need be, to the last drop of blood and to the last breath of our failing bodies against any invasion by any aggressor against the continental, insular, or Territorial possessions of the United States. We shall fight against any dictatorship, either from the right or the left, that raises its hand within the gates and attempts to strangle our present constitutional form of American democracy. But we shall not fight for the European nations that took our money and our blood 20 years ago and then sneered at our peacetime idealism. We shall fight for the defense of our country along every American front, but we shall not fight, anytime or anywhere, for foreign causes upon foreign battlefields.

We beg the Congress of the United States to keep us out of foreign entangling alliances, whether they be the alliances of international politics or the alliances of the international munitions trade. We recognize a difference between arms and ammunition, which are fundamentally and primarily commodities of death, and all other commodities, which are fundamentally and primarily commodities of life, even if the munition makers and their allies, the foreign propagandists, refuse to do so. Therefore, we beg the Congress to keep us out of war by keeping us out of the vestibule to war. The contemplated repeal of the embargo on arms and ammunition to foreign belligerents means the entrance of the United States into the vestibule to war.

There is not a single argument advanced that can justify the removal of the embargo on arms and ammunition. Those who would sell arms and ammunition to all for cash and carry have already given the lie to the title of their amendment by providing for 90 days of credit to the very nations who have been our insulting debtors to the tune of billions of dollars for the past 19 years. If they have not paid in 19 years, how will they be able or willing to pay in 90 days?

Senator KEY PITTMAN, of Nevada, who is eloquent now on the Senate floor for repeal of the embargo on arms and ammunition, was eloquent 2 years ago for the maintenance of the embargo. We wonder who has whispered in his ear. What economic royalist has put pressure on the Senator through the White House? We should love to read the history of the psychological and political transformation by which PITTMAN the embargoist has become PITTMAN the repealist.

Stung by the concentrated expression on the part of hundreds of thousands of American citizens against removing the embargo on arms and ammunition, certain groups in the United States placed Mr. Alfred E. Smith, former Governor of New York State, before the microphone a week ago. There is no one who admires Al Smith more than I. As a fellow American, I love him for his Americanism. As a fellow Catholic, I love him for his Catholicism. He is one of whom all Americans may be proud.

We listened to the speech of Governor Smith with feelings of sadness and surprise. There was not a single argument presented to justify the President's demand that the embargo on arms and ammunition be removed from our new neutrality legislation. Mr. Smith said that the "present Neutrality Act does not work." When, Mr. Smith, did it break down? How and where did it break down? How can an embargo on arms and ammunition cease to work? Even if all other clauses of the present Neutrality Act should be changed, why cannot the embargo on arms and ammunition remain? For the past several years, Mr. Smith, the embargo clause of our present Neutrality Act has helped to keep us out of declared and undeclared wars in both Europe and Asia. It kept us out of the Spanish Civil War when every red in this country was howling for its repeal in order that Stalin might have accomplished in Spain what he has already accomplished in Poland.

You are not true to the record, Mr. Smith. The present embargo on arms and ammunition has worked. "It has not," as you tried to suggest, Mr. Smith, "been weighed in the balance and found wanting." The only balance that has weighed it and found it wanting has been the Fairbanks scales of the Du Ponts and the other munition-making economic royalists in this country.

For the sake of the record, Mr. Smith, we agree with you that the transportation of any goods or any passengers in American ships to warring nations should be prohibited. For the sake of the record, Mr. Smith, we agree with you that American ships and American passengers should be kept out of the export business. For the sake of the record, Mr. Smith, we believe that American markets of international trade should be kept open to belligerent nations for all commodities save arms and ammunition. We should sell all commodities, save arms and ammunition, to any belligerent power that comes with cash and that takes away the purchased commodities in its own ships or the ships of other nationalities. But we are now, and always, dedicated to the retention of the embargo on arms and ammunition, no matter what the President desires and no matter how itchy the palm of the munition makers and the international bankers may become.

Again, Mr. Smith, for the sake of the record, we resent your statement that only those who lack an understanding of the issue will oppose the demand of the President that the embargo on arms and ammunition be repealed. The record of the President is open to the American people for the past 6 years. American citizens have the right to criticize, in public or in private, the record of any citizen or public official of the United States, including the President of the United States. Should any citizen be denied the right to express public criticism of public acts, on the part of public officials, either over the radio or in the press or on the public platform, the moment of that denial is the moment of a collapsing democracy and an incipient dictatorship.

We of the antiwar crusade understand the issue. It is the issue of keeping us out of war by keeping us out of the vestibule to war. It is the issue of isolating and identifying those commodities which are clearly and directly and purposely and immediately weapons of death. It is the issue of refusing to become a party to the contract of wholesale murder by furnishing such arms and ammunition to any belligerent nation abroad.

It is the issue of refusing to allow the munition makers and the international bankers to wax rich and fat on the broken bodies and the bayoneted breasts of those who are done to death by arms and ammunition manufactured in the United States. It is the issue of remembering that the cash-and-carry policy applied to arms and ammunition 20 years ago became the policy of credit and carry and next, through the flotation of foreign loans in the United States the policy of float and carry, and finally the policy of being carried into the death and destruction and massacre and mutilation of actual warfare. It is the issue of amending and strengthening the present Neutrality Act without canceling a single word of the embargo on arms and ammunition to foreign belligerents.

This is not a Catholic question or a Protestant question or a Jewish question. This is an American question. We of the antiwar crusade who are fighting for the retention of the embargo on arms and ammunition in all neutrality legislation, resent certain recent attempts to identify certain remarks in the Italian newspaper, Osservatore Romano, as semiofficial approval of the President's desire to remove the embargo. They are nothing of the kind. Let it be said to all the world that the Osservatore Romano is not the official representative of the papacy. Let it be said to all the world that in matters purely civic and purely political no American Catholic takes orders from or is bound by the statements in any foreign newspaper no matter in what foreign country the statements may be printed.

This is not the time for participation in foreign affairs either directly or indirectly. This is the time for preparedness. This is the time to perfect our coast defenses and our antiwar craft. This is the time to build an army capable of successfully defending every mile of our boundary line and capable of successfully stopping the advance of any "brown" or "red" aggressor across our Mexican or Alaskan borders. This is the time to build an air force that can plunge every enemy bombing plane, reckless enough to attack us, into oblivion. This is the time to build a navy that can successfully protect both our Atlantic and Pacific coasts at one and the same time. This is the time to protect our country from subversive activities within the gates by removing every Communist and every Nazi from public office in America. This is the time to legislate for peace and prosperity and preparedness here in the United States of America.

Peace legislation means keeping out of the vestibule of war by retaining the embargo on arms and ammunition to foreign belligerents. Preparedness legislation means keeping the products of American makers defenses for the air and land and sea defenses of the United States of America. Prosperity legislation means vitalizing the economic life of this Nation so that 10,000,000 Americans can be put back to work, and so that every American family may be the recipient of a living annual wage.

This is the cause of our antiwar crusade. Billions for defense but not one cent of American money and not one ounce of American blood and not one item of American arms and ammunition for the foreign causes of foreign nations on foreign battlefields abroad.

A Righteous Neutrality With Peace for America

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ANDREW C. SCHIFFLER

OF WEST VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, October 19, 1939

Mr. SCHIFFLER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my own remarks in the RECORD, I wish to express myself upon that question which is foremost in the mind of every American citizen.

The efforts now being made to amend and repeal the neutrality laws are unneutral and in violation of the spirit and letter of international law and of neutrality. It is an established principle that once war has started a neutral nation has the right to amend its neutrality laws to improve its own condition so long as the same affects all belligerents with equal force and in exactly the same manner. Changes in such laws which create unequal advantages more favorable to one nation or group of nations than to another is a direct violation of the spirit and letter of true neutrality.

This principle has been stated by the most eminent authorities in America on international law and neutrality. Mr. Henry S. Fraser, legal adviser to the late Honorable George W. Wickersham, American delegate of the League of Nations Committee for Codification of International Law, one of these outstanding authorities for this proposition, September 21, 1939, said:

> Germany will instantly have the right under international law to take steps of reprisal and retaliation against American ships. Such reprisals might be taken against ships even in coastwise trade, and even if they were not carrying contraband. There is an established principle of international law that a neutral may not, after the outbreak of war, change its legislation for the purpose of assisting one of the belligerents.

The Honorable W. J. Bryan, as Secretary of State in the Cabinet of President Wilson, on April 21, 1915, so advised the German Ambassador that to amend the then existing neutrality laws would be an unneutral act. He said:

> It will be a matter of gratification to me if I have removed from Your Excellency's mind any misapprehension you may have been under regarding either the policy or the spirit and purposes of the Government of the United States. Its neutrality is founded upon the firm basis of conscience and good will.

The proposals now pending in the Congress of the United States are to completely repeal the arms-embargo provision of our neutrality law; to provide for the sales of arms, implements of war, and munitions; to provide for the establishment by the President of combat zones; to prohibit the travel of American citizens upon ships of belligerents; to prohibit the arming of American merchant vessels; and to prohibit the carrying of arms and munitions of war by American vessels.

Much emphasis has been placed upon the term "cash and carry." Many have been led to believe that the proposal made before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee and now before the Senate for consideration really provides for cash and carry of arms, implements of war, and ammunitions. This, in effect, means the complete transfer of title of implements of war and munitions and payment in cash in the United States before it is permissible to export such to warring nations. This is not the case. The bill provides for a transfer of title, but it does not provide in strict terms for cash payment. Even were this so, it would be highly objectionable and would amount to a change in our position on neutrality. Broad authority is given to the President of the United States to permit the extension of credit, and under the provisions of the pending bill it is possible to establish a large credit in the United States, there being no limitation upon the amount of credit that the President may permit. This provision might aptly be termed "tick and take it." It is the back door to the war and the first step to our active military participation in such war. The trinity of foreign credit, foreign trade, and foreign travel involved us in the last war. Any or all of these can get us into the present war, and would likely do so if we recede from our present position of safety and change our laws on neutrality. Many persons are bent upon breaking down those provisions of law, enacted when the Congress was cool in reasoning, calm in judgment, and the world at peace. Under the high-pressure propaganda now being promoted in the shrewdest manner, with the creation of phrases analogous to those used to incite and inflame the American people during the World War, and with the additional illusion of "fools' gold," we are very likely to be propagandized into a high state of emotionalism and consequently lose the power of rational reasoning.

If the American people will read and study the history of Europe and the various underlying causes of the many wars in the past, it should become quite apparent to them that our participation in the present war would be as fruitless and tragic as was our engaging in the last World War. At the very moment we allow indebtedness to be created by the warring nations in the purchase of war supplies, and thus give our economic aid, it is inevitable that our military participation will soon follow. The last war was incited by the use of illusions, idealistic phrases, and an imaginary interest, whereas there was no reasonable cause for our participation as has been pointed out by eminent historians.

Foreign credit was the beginning. Purchases were made in this country by warring nations and the indebtedness was held by international bankers. The condition of that indebtedness became precarious. By propaganda we were made to feel that except for our active help, the world would be lost and civilization destroyed. Incidents occurred, pressure was exerted and we, in this high state of emotionalism, became actively engaged in shipping materials, money, and men to foreign lands. The debts held by the international bankers were paid by the process of America issuing bonds to its citizens, commonly designated "Liberty Bonds." A part of the proceeds of such bonds was loaned to foreign nations, who, in turn, paid their debts to the bankers. The American taxpayers are yet looking for payment of a substantial part of their bonds, subscriptions for which, in many instances, were made at great sacrifice.

How severely must we be jolted in order to learn the lesson thus taught? The tragic deaths and lonely graves that fill Flanders Fields; the incalculable suffering of thousands of boys now hospitalized in this country; some eighteen thousand who, through shell shock and by other means, lost their reasoning and are hopelessly incurable, as well as the many other thousands crippled and now hospitalized or undergoing medical treatment, fought for a cause since proved futile and simulated by empty phrases such as "the war to end wars" or "the war to make the world safe for democracy." It is senseless and tragic beyond description.

We have a deep sympathy for the sorrow and suffering of those afflicted in Europe today. Let us do all we can in a neutral and peaceable manner to end this tragic chapter in human history. Let us extend the hand of friendship to aid in the solution of the world's problems and to bring to an end this useless and sinful chapter in history. However, let us be ever cautious that we shall not also become, to our everlasting sorrow, afflicted without reason in like manner.

War has prevailed in China for 3 years. The peace-loving, philosophic people of that part of the world have pleaded for assistance against the ravages of an unwanted war. We have shipped to the aggressor in a war of conquest the means to continue that warfare against a people who are stanch friends of our country. We have turned a deaf ear to their appeals. In the meantime, we have supplied the aggressor with all means of warfare. Steel, scrap iron, trucks, cotton for gunpowder, petroleum, copper, and other essentials of war were shipped, all for profit. The consequences of our turning a deaf ear and closing our eyes to these appeals and to this dismal picture will be visited upon us for many generations to come. Soon the white man and his commerce will be extinct in Asia.

We now turn to the European situation with a Messianic attitude and head directly for a bloody and tragic chapter in American history. It is not neutrality we seek in the proposed changes in our laws. It is the first step to alliances. Neutrality is a friendly attitude toward all belligerents. We seek to become partial and to pick favorites. How can the administration justify its rapid about-face?

Our neutrality legislation was enacted at a time when the world was at peace—when it was possible to make appraisal and arrive at a sound, impartial opinion. Such policy was entirely sound and practicable, as is evidenced by the language of all our leaders, including President Roosevelt, who on August 31, 1935, and at the time of the approval of the present basic neutrality law, said:

> I have given my approval to Senate Joint Resolution 173—the neutrality legislation which passed the Congress last week.
>
> I have approved this joint resolution because it was intended as an expression of the fixed desire of the Government and the people of the United States to avoid any action which might involve us in war. The purpose is wholly excellent, and this joint resolution will to a considerable degree serve that end.

President Roosevelt also, on October 30, 1935, said:

> This Government is determined not to become involved in the controversy and is anxious for the restoration and maintenance of peace.
>
> However, in the course of war, tempting trade opportunities may be offered to our people to supply materials which would prolong the war. I do not believe that the American people will wish for abnormally increased profits that temporarily might be secured by greatly extending our trade in such materials; nor would they wish the struggles on the battlefield to be prolonged because of profits accruing to a comparatively small number of American citizens.
>
> Accordingly, the American Government is keeping informed as to all shipments consigned for export to both belligerents.

President Roosevelt again, on February 29, 1936, said:

> I renew the appeal made last October to the American people that they so conduct their trade with belligerent nations that it cannot be said that they are seizing new opportunities for profit or that by changing our peacetime trade they give aid to the continuation of war.

Again, at Chautauqua, N. Y., on August 14, 1936, the President said:

> It was the prospect of war profits that caused the extension of monopoly and unjustified expansion of industry and a price level so high that the normal relationship between debtor and creditor was destroyed.
>
> Nevertheless, if war should break out again in another continent, let us not blink the fact that we would find in this country thousands of Americans who, seeking immediate riches—fools' gold—would attempt to break down or evade our neutrality.
>
> They would tell you—and, unfortunately, their views would get wide publicity—that if they could produce and ship this and that and the other article to belligerent nations, the unemployed of America would all find work. They would tell you that if they could extend credit to warring nations, that credit would be used in the United States to build homes and factories and pay our debts. They would tell you that America once more would capture the trade of the world.

The American people look to our honored President to keep his promises to them. These promises were made in the democratic platform of 1936, which contains the following language:

> We shall continue to observe a true neutrality in the dispute of others; to be prepared resolutely to resist aggression against ourselves; to work for peace and to take the profits out of war; to guard against being drawn, by political commitments, international banking, or private trading, into any war which may develop anywhere.

How in view of this positive language can the present attitude and proposals to amend the law be justified? Is it conceivable that such an inconsistent change of attitude can be based upon sound reasoning and a desire for impartiality?

We need not look for "fools' gold" in abnormal profits coming from the sale and export of war materials. This is clearly demonstrated by the occurrences of the past month or so. Our present upward trend in business and improved conditions in the employment of idle people indicate that when American markets are protected for American products, prosperity is within our Nation. Exports from European countries, by reason of the hazards of shipments to us from them have been greatly reduced during the past month. Exports from this country to neutral countries have substantially increased. If we can keep our hands clean, manifest a friendliness to the entire world, protect American markets from cheap foreign-made goods, and prosecute our legitimate export trade among neutrals, a wave of sound prosperity shall be our blessing. Let this be our course and seek no "fool's gold," but the honorable and legitimate prosperity that will come to us from a righteous course.

I am opposed to any change in our neutrality laws at this time, the reason being that such is unneutral, unjustified, and provocative of war. I desire for our beloved country real neutrality, prosperity, and a permanent peace, to have adequate protection by a strong, well-equipped, and efficiently trained naval, land, and air force. I shall lend my wholehearted support to obtain these.

I desire, strive, and pray for strict and honorable neutrality; honest dealings with all nations of the world; a preservation of American dignity; and a friendly attitude toward all people. To follow this course will be safe, honorable, and dignified, and will bring manifold blessings to our people.

Celebration in Honor of Senator Wheeler at Hudson, Mass.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LISTER HILL

OF ALABAMA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, October 19 (legislative day of Wednesday, October 4), 1939

ARTICLE FROM THE BROTHERHOOD OF LOCOMOTIVE FIREMEN AND ENGINEMEN'S MAGAZINE

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, on the 1st of October the city of Hudson, Mass., held a notable celebration in honor of her illustrious son, our distinguished colleague, one of the outstanding citizens and leaders of our country, the Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER]. The story of the celebration is told by Mr. D. B. Robertson, president of the Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen and Enginemen, in an article in the Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen and Enginemen's magazine for October. I ask unanimous consent to place the article in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen and Enginemen's Magazine, October 1939]

WHEELING WITH WHEELER ON WHEELER DAY—HUDSON, MASS., CITY OF SENATOR'S BIRTH, CELEBRATES IN HONOR OF ILLUSTRIOUS SON

(By D. B. Robertson, president)

Population of the little city of Hudson, in Middlesex County, Mass., increased some threefold on October 1.

The occasion was the homecoming celebration for the town's illustrious son, Senator BURTON K. WHEELER, of Montana, who was born there on February 27, 1882. Farmers, businessmen, laborers, and townspeople in general, turned out in great numbers. In all, some 30,000 persons, citizens of Hudson and surrounding communities in Middlesex County, participated enthusiastically in the proceedings.

Since June the event had been in preparation. Two hundred committee members covering every phase of activity worked throughout the summer months to give the Senator a hearty welcome. Brother G. A. Henderson, general chairman of our brotherhood on the Boston & Maine, lives in that locality and served on several committees.

Senator WHEELER graduated from the Hudson High School in 1900 at the age of 18. After working 3 years in Massachusetts industries he left his home town to enter the University of Michigan from which institution he graduated with a law degree. Many of his old high-school classmates were on hand at the celebration to greet him.

Upon leaving college Senator WHEELER moved to Montana, where he was admitted to the bar of that State in 1905 and started the practice of law in Butte. Independence of thought and action marked his career, and in him the common people found counsel upon whom they could depend.

After serving 2 years in the Montana House of Representatives he was appointed United States district attorney by President Woodrow Wilson in 1913, resigning at the completion of 5 years' exceptional service largely because of his pronounced views against war.

Progressives were scarce in the United States Senate and liberalism was not so popular when in 1922 Senator WHEELER was first elected to that body. He was reelected in 1928 and 1934. During the more than 16 years he has been on the Senate Committee on Interstate Commerce, many of which he has served as chairman, Senator WHEELER has made a study of the railroad industry and its financial practices. His numerous investigations have led to amazing revelations, and the courage, vigor, and intelligence he has displayed during his public career has made him a national figure.

Although the first Member of Congress openly to pledge support to Franklin D. Roosevelt for the Presidency of the United States, Senator WHEELER did not let his friendship for the President alter his characteristic independence. Ever an outstanding example of patriotic leadership in America, he has always fought for progressive legislation in the interest of all the people. Railroad men will never forget his efforts in the last session of Congress to secure enactment of measures designed to aid the workers and to rehabilitate the railroad industry and place it on an equal footing with other forms of transportation.

The homecoming celebration for Senator WHEELER in the town of his birth was an event of majestic proportions. The Boston & Maine Railroad ran special trains to Hudson carrying many from distant points and automobiles lined the highways in all directions. In the great parade that started at 1 p. m. were 5,000 people and several bands with infantry and floats in the line of march. The standard railroad labor organizations were represented in the parade by over 1,000 members, led by Brothers Henderson; F. A. Symonds, Massachusetts State legislative chairman; and F. S. Columbus, New York State legislative chairman. Many of the railroad men wore overalls and caps. The delegation was headed with a band and a locomotive float.

The Senator, some of his senatorial colleagues, and former classmates reviewed the parade near the entrance to Riverside Park in Hudson, where the celebration was held. Near this entrance is the Senator's birthplace, and the town is dedicating a new field house to him.

The park grounds were adequate to accommodate the 30,000 to 35,000 persons in attendance. A great chorus of 500 voices and a band of 60 pieces were in the background of the speakers' platform. Their selections included Hail America; Ol' Man River; Home, Sweet Home; the Hallelujah Chorus from Handel's Messiah; Land of Hope and Glory; Toast to the Flag; and the U. S. A. March.

In attendance, representing our brotherhood, were President Robertson, Assistant President Goff, and Editor and Manager Glenn, along with many of our general and legislative chairmen and local lodge officers in the New England States.

Among the speakers were Senators David I. Walsh and Henry Cabot Lodge, Jr., of Massachusetts, and President Robertson of our brotherhood. Senator WHEELER's address was broadcast over a Nation-wide radio hook-up and is reproduced, as follows:

"It is a pleasure to be back in Hudson and to greet old friends and acquaintances.

"Though the town has changed with the march of progress—though many sites familiar 30 years ago are no more—and though there is increased business activity and many more persons are here, yet the old spirit is the same. I am proud to be numbered among the sons of Hudson, just as I am pleased, beyond my limited description, with the great reception that has been accorded me.

"My obligations to you now are even greater, and I have long known that I owe you much. It was in your public schools that I received my primary education. It was the principal of the Hudson High School who suggested and encouraged my study of the law. Fate has treated me kindly, and I wish to acknowledge my debt to Mr. Charles A. Williams and to Miss Ethyl Rawson, of the Hudson public-school system, for the encouragement which they gave me.

"It was the town of Hudson, the county of Middlesex, the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, and the glorious traditions of all New England that furnished the background of which I am so proud. No State, no part of these United States, ever produced greater liberals, greater leaders, or better men than John Hancock, Benjamin Franklin, Samuel Adams, Paul Revere, John Adams, and the host of patriots whose names and whose deeds are so indelibly inscribed on the pages of history of this Nation. They were the liberals of their day. Some called them radicals. Today we honor them as patriots. The liberalism of these farseeing patriots has been a constant source of inspiration to all Americans.

"New England has contributed more than leadership to our great Nation. Democracy on this continent had its birth in the town meeting. I can well remember as a boy clutching the hand of Abe Tyler, my grandfather, as we went to town hall. I thrilled to the discussions. There it was after full and open debate by all citizens who desired to participate that town problems and policies were settled. Such free and open discussion, and the rule of the majority, is real democracy.

"Your forefathers and mine laid down their lives to establish a democratic republic in this land. They were farmers, cobblers, blacksmiths, tailors, merchants, and tradesmen, but with the march of progress the shoeshop became a factory and the cobbler an employee. The small factory or shop with its owner-worker disappeared and in its stead came modern industrialization, combinations, and trusts. Mass production replaced the individual and brought with it severe tests of democracy—unemployment, low farm prices, and poverty.

"Amid economic inequalities, social injustice, and poverty, democracy always labors, if, indeed, it does not fail. Poverty is as needless as it is vicious. It fills the earth with subversive dogmas—endangers our democracy, and hence our freedom. Poverty is the menace of peace, the seed of race hatreds, and the cause of religious prejudice. If man must hate, let us not hate each other; let us hate poverty. If man must make war, let us not fight each other; let us make war on poverty.

"The success or failure of American democracy is dependent upon economic and social conditions—upon the welfare and happiness of the people who compose it and not upon who wins the war in Europe. Men will fight and even die for democracy, but once gained, their children and grandchildren come to accept the privileges of constitutional democracy as commonplace. Lacking employment, food, clothing, shelter, or markets for their produce, they become a fertile field for demagogues. Once Germany attempted a democracy, but its people had been reduced to economic serfdom, and in poverty succumbed to the false promises of economic security. They sold their freedom for the promise of bread. The old saying that "You cannot have bread for nothing" is as true today as ever. You must work for it or you'll be required to give up your liberties for it.

"Through the ages the number one economic problem had been that of producing enough. American industrial genius solved this problem in our country by mass production.

"Now we are told we have too much farm land, too much factory capacity, too many mines, too much food and clothing—so much of everything that starvation lurks at our doors. So much wheat, milk, and meat that farmers are losing their farms, laborers losing their jobs, and people losing faith in their fellow man, if not in their Government.

"What a paradox.

"Let us not forget that it is the very lack of all these things of which we have an abundance that lies at the bottom of the wars in Europe and in the Orient.

"It must be apparent, then, that mass production to be successful must be accompanied by mass consumption—money earned and in the pockets of the people to buy the goods produced.

"We in America must use our genius and our resources in solving this paradox of want in the midst of plenty, if we desire to save the country from financial and moral bankruptcy. We must not use that genius or our great resources in a futile European war. It should never be forgotten that it is the moral and financial bankruptcy of a nation that brings about dictatorship.

"Less than 23 years ago we went into a bloody conflict 'to make the world safe for democracy.' Today, after that so-called victorious holy war, the world knows less democracy than ever before. To say the World War was futile is to be charitable—it was horrible, it was disastrous. I shudder to think of the potential results, direct and indirect, of the present war.

"A quarter of a century ago Kaiserism was to be stamped out; now it is nazi-ism. Both are indefensible; both are repugnant to free peoples. The problem that faces Europe today not only parallels the 1914 situation but is one which is recorded in the pages of European history a hundred times. The characters may be more bold, the names changed, and certainly the villain is equally or more repulsive, but the plot and the climax are as old as European history itself.

"My sympathies are with the Allies, and I know that the American people and all lovers of democracy want Hitlerism crushed. It is the symbol of dictatorship, of bankruptcy, followed by intolerance, bigotry, and prejudice. All this is the product of the last war and should the present war assume the dimensions of the first World War, I am fearful that there will not only be a bankrupt Germany but a bankrupt world—not one Hitler, one Mussolini, or one Stalin, but many.

"Sympathetic as we are with those who find themselves at war with dictators, we must never lose sight of the fact that our entry into war cannot be measured alone in terms of lives lost and dollars spent. The price would surely be loss of democracy and Christianity. They could not withstand the impact of war.

"Our problem is to solve our economic difficulties at home and not the politics of Europe. Our problem is to preserve American democracy and not the balance of power or the boundaries of Europe.

"We are passing through a grave crisis, a trying period. We must be vigilant in guarding our peace. Neither sentiment, propaganda, nor profits must be allowed to influence our determination to avoid our participation in the present conflict.

"Already there has been loosed upon us a flood of propaganda from both sides. Its intensity will be multiplied with the passage of time. Already in Washington the war hysteria rises in full flood. Detectives watch the Capitol, watch the office buildings, and watch each other. It won't be long now before we will be spying on each other and seeing German U-boats in the Great Lakes and enemy airplanes over the Rocky Mountains.

"I sometimes wonder whether we shouldn't be more afraid of the war propaganda originating in Washington than that which emanates from foreign capitals.

"The American people today seem resolved to withstand it. Let us pray that they keep steadfast in the hectic days to come. They realize that our vision may be clouded and our thinking dulled, but they know that the cost of war will be greater today than ever before.

"War profits will destroy true neutrality. They lure and corrupt. War profits may bring a temporary and artificial prosperity—a prosperity which would be only a shot in the arm of our economic system productive of a cheap and murderous jag—but which would end in a disastrous depression. At this moment there is some increase in the price of wheat, sugar, beef, and other basic goods. Certain industries are hastily reemploying men, but for any war-engendered prosperity we will eventually pay and pay and pay.

"We are neither Germans, Poles, Britains, Frenchmen, Italians, nor Russians. We are Americans and in this hour of world strife our country is a haven for peace. We must so maintain it. Cries of nazi-ism, fascism, or communism that we presently hear neither frighten nor interest me. Working democracy can withstand their attacks. The only 'ism' in which I am interested is Americanism. We should build up our national defense so that no nation will dare attack us; we must build up our trade in the Americas where our natural markets lie.

"As a member of the United States Senate I will never vote to send a single American boy across the water to fight on foreign soil. Neither will I, by my vote, approve of a single step that in my judgment may lead this country down the road to war.

"These are some of the reasons why I am not in favor of selling arms and munitions to any of the belligerents. This is why I would insist that all other products be paid for in cash and delivery made in this country. And this is why I would say to all Americans—you travel in troubled waters at your own risk; you cannot and must not involve this country in war.

"America must be kept safe for Americans in America."

Banquet tendered in honor of the Senator at 7:30 p. m. in the State armory was attended by 1,250 guests. Among the speakers there was President Robertson, of our brotherhood. He spoke as follows:

"Speaking for the Railway Labor Executives' Association representing national railroad labor generally and railroad labor in Massachusetts specifically, I congratulate this community on its great welcome of Senator WHEELER. It is evident all groups of people, regardless of occupation, pay this outstanding tribute to an American statesman who has earned the right to this fine recognition by his native town of Hudson.

"Why do we, representing over a million transportation workers, join you in this splendid celebration?

"Our experience with Senator WHEELER over the last 17 years has led us to admire and respect his independence and courage as a leader. We have gone to him on numerous occasions, since he has a heavy responsibility, regarding national transportation legislation. We have found him able and of high capacity. We have found him sound in judgment. We have found him honest and without prejudice—always seeking the truth. At times we have found him severe as a critic, if what we wanted did not appear to him as practicable as it had honestly seemed to us. When he gave his word, however, we could depend on it. We would respect him for his stand, whatever it was, as he would respect us for the stand we took.

"As a result of Senator WHEELER's leadership and great influence, the railroad employees of the United States have today a greater measure of justice to their interests and security for their jobs and families.

"Possibly, for the moment, public policies or principles he advocated would appear unpopular, but the truth he expressed would win, and public sentiment generally confirmed the justice and wisdom of the Senator's course and conduct.

"I can speak from a somewhat intimate contact and knowledge of this man in recent years. We could not necessarily agree with him always, for labor, too, needs education as well as everybody else. But time and again his uncanny sense of what is best for America and the realms of national government usually proved true and righteous altogether. A man who is motivated by an unselfish and honest desire to serve his country in domestic and foreign affairs, if he is intelligent and sound, in most instances, is bound to be right and just. Such a man should always have the leadership in national crises.

"We must not adhere to policies, whatever they are, which may develop causes that in their effects would ruin this American civilization and inevitably bring about complete collapse or insolvency. That is not the road to American democracy. Let us at all costs avoid such a road.

"Meeting dangerous conditions such as this country and the world are now passing through, requires high courage and keen, intelligent thought and action. We will not meet these conditions by hasty action or attitudes of fear. We will meet and overcome these present conditions of conflict only by patiently evolving a solution, based on first and enduring principles of the kind of democratic government that has made our country the greatest civilization in modern history.

"So, Senator WHEELER, my hosts in Hudson, and ladies and gentlemen, permit me to express my deep appreciation personally and on behalf of more than a million railroad workers and their families, of being accorded the privilege of being here and giving you this message."

[Copy of testimonial to Senator WHEELER, which was engrossed and framed and presented to him at homecoming celebration held in his honor in Hudson, Mass., October 1, 1939]

TO

BURTON KENDALL WHEELER
BELOVED NATIVE SON OF HUDSON, MASS.
DISTINGUISHED SENATOR FROM MONTANA ON THIS THE OCCASION OF YOUR HOMECOMING
OCTOBER 1, 1939

From this, your birthplace and the town of your boyhood, we, your townspeople, have caused to be enscrolled from our hearts this permanent record, expressive of our love and neighborly appreciation for a life that is being so usefully, courageously, honestly, and unselfishly lived in the service of your fellow Americans and in upholding and interpreting anew for this age the principles of government which have made our United States of America the greatest nation on earth—the one true democracy of friendly peoples in this world today, and, as such, the last bulwark of civilization as we know and cherish it.

May your life and your great talents of statesmanship be spared to the service of this country and its peoples for many more years to come in whatever high offices destiny may place you is the wish of your old friends, classmates, and those younger townspeople who have come to respect and admire you through knowledge of your laudable achievements in the public interest.

We of Massachusetts share you gladly and pridefully with Montana in the honor you have earned and the distinction you deservedly hold as one of the outstanding Americans of this day.

Reciprocal-Trade Agreement With Argentina

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FRANK O. HORTON

OF WYOMING

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, October 19, 1939

STATEMENT OF HON. FRANK O. HORTON, OF WYOMING, BEFORE THE COMMITTEE FOR RECIPROCITY INFORMATION

Mr. HORTON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include my statement delivered before the Committee for Reciprocity Information, in the old Land Office Building, Washington, at a hearing on the proposed reciprocal trade agreement with Argentina, as follows:

Mr. HORTON. I want to substantiate everything that was said by the Honorable HARRY B. COFFEE, of Nebraska, and that every farmer and every farm organization that I know of is absolutely opposed to the so-called reciprocal trade agreements, and I emphasize the word "so-called" because I feel that the agreements, the authority that has been granted by the Congress to draw up these trade agreements, has not been carried out in a reciprocal way, and it is this lack of reciprocity that I object to, and I particularly object to this trade treaty, this proposed trade treaty with the Argentinians because fully 95 percent of the articles which are under consideration are articles that are grown on the farm, and many of them in my own State, and I feel that no minor operation is going to correct the situation that confronts us today. It is going to be a major operation, and the only way we can restore prosperity, not only of agriculture, but of this country as a whole, is to not call them trade agreements any more, but to call them treaties and put them back where they should be and require Senate confirmation.

Tariff concessions on the farm and ranch products listed for consideration in negotiating the proposed reciprocal-trade treaty with Argentina are unwarranted, unjust, and indefensible. Not only would they be contrary to the theory of our trade-treaty policy, but they would defeat the declared purposes of that policy as well. To substantiate this, it is necessary to cite only a few of many grave objections:

1. They would tend to increase instead of to reduce our already unwieldy agricultural surpluses and to drive to still lower levels the prices for farm and ranch products.

2. They would be discriminatory in that they would provide expanding markets for industrial products at the expense of farm products without compensating advantages.

3. They would tend to aggravate instead of to solve the problem of unemployment, the greatest domestic problem which confronts this Nation today, and they would operate to tear down American standards of living through enforced competition with cheap, peon labor working long hours and under conditions intolerable to Americans.

4. They would put American meat products in direct competition with what in fact, if not in theory, amount to products which are subsidized by a foreign government.

5. They would ignore the wishes and be contrary to the best interests of the millions of American farmers and ranchers who would be the direct sufferers.

6. They would make commitments which might prove dangerous and damaging in a time of great international uncertainty and fluctuation in the rates of foreign exchange.

To a far greater extent in this proposed agreement than in any of the other 19 negotiated to date, 9 of them with Latin American countries, would American agriculture have to stand the burden of tariff reductions if concessions are made on the products to be discussed. Fully 90 percent of the items to be negotiated affect American farm products directly. Many of them, such as beef and veal in tins, beef and horse hides, skins, cheese and casein, tallow, tankage, extract of meat, pickled or cured beef and veal, turkeys, corn, eggs, dog food, alfalfa seed, and wool, are articles that will come in direct competition with products of my own State.

At this point I want to note that when you listed those various byproducts of the cow you have got the whole blooming critter coming into this country along with the canned beef. The embargo keeps the live animal out, but this proposed trade agreement lets the dead thing in, so in that respect, at least, you have circumvented the sanitary convention.

In view of our experience with some of the treaties which have been in effect for a period sufficiently long to permit analysis of their effects, I am amazed that this Government should seriously contemplate again trading off the American farm market for the benefit of the eastern industrialists. Agriculture is in no condition to sustain this added blow.

Take the plight of the dairy farmers for instance. Record production of milk during the last 2 years made it necessary for the Federal Government to purchase unmarketable surpluses and to give away these surpluses to persons on relief. Yet this same Government is contemplating action which would fasten low prices upon our farmers for many years as a result of cuts in duties.

One of the products up for discussion in connection with concessions is casein, made from skim milk. The present duty is 5 cents a pound. This duty was the subject of intense controversy in the Congress of 1930, when dairy farmers were lined up against coated-paper manufacturers who wanted to bring this product in at cheaper prices. Does the State Department today think more of the coated-paper manufacturers than it does of the dairy farmers?

There are billions of pounds of skim milk available in this country today. Yet the smaller creameries cannot afford to convert it into casein unless they can get a return at least sufficient to cover the processing cost. Manufacture of casein and manufacture of dry skim are alternate operations depending upon price returns. If the price of casein is lower as a result of tariff concessions, there will be an excess in the dry skim milk market such as will prove absolutely ruinous to skim prices.

Reduction in the duty on cheeses also is to be discussed. American farmers already have had to suffer from heavy price cuts in a wide range of cheeses competitive with the Argentine product in the United States. A cut in duty on this Argentine product would be a heavy blow to dairy farmers, especially in Wisconsin, Minnesota, and Wyoming, which produce close to 2,500,000 pounds of Swiss cheese per year.

Up for discussion also are tariff concessions on turkeys, dead, dressed or undressed, fresh, chilled, or frozen. What will a tariff reduction mean to the thousands of Americans, many of them residents in my home State of Wyoming, who depend upon the raising of turkeys for a livelihood? A clue to the answer is to be found in our experience with the Canadian trade agreement.

That treaty went into effect in November 1935. It reduced the rate of live turkeys from 8 cents to 4 cents a pound.

Government figures show that during 1933, 1934, and 1935, under the old 8-cent tariff, a yearly average of only 3,700 pounds of live turkeys found their way into the United States. In 1936 the tariff was reduced to 4 cents a pound, and we find a yearly average for the 3 years of 1936, 1937, and 1938 of 80,000 pounds entering the United States. Twenty-one times as many turkeys entered the United States when a 50-percent reduction in the tariff was made. Or, if you take the low figure of 1933, when the 8-cent duty held, and compare it with the high of 1938, when the 4-cent duty was really beginning to be appreciated in Canada, you find 148 times as many turkeys entering in 1938 as in 1933.

If they reduced the tariff 50 percent on Canadian turkeys in order to be neutral you will have to follow suit with the Argentine and reduce the present 10-cent duty to 5 cents; and, of course, it is only likely that the same pick-up will occur in dead turkeys from the Argentine as occurred in live turkeys from Canada. During the past 6 years the average yearly imports of dead turkeys has been 350,000 pounds, so to be consistent we will have to multiply this by 21, and when do we find some 7,350,000 pounds of turkeys on the march from Argentina for turkey days of 1940. Yes; and in order to give them full measure, bear in mind that even in these war-scare days 1½ cents per pound is the rate from Argentina to New York, while the rate from Wyoming to New York is 2½ cents per pound.

I might add here that 1½ cents is the price now, after the war scare is on, for turkeys from the Argentine to New York City. Just what it was before that I do not know, but I do happen to know that the rate on, for instance, canned meat, the normal rate before the war scare was $6.50 as compared with $8.50 now. So it is only fair to assume that prior to the war scare it was lower than that which I have just quoted—namely, 1½ cents per pound.

Wool, too, appears on the discussion list. To get an idea of what may be expected here we have only to scan the record of the British trade agreements. When the trade agreement with Great Britain first was suggested we were assured by the administration that the American wool producer would be fully protected. Despite these assurances and in consequence of the mere proposal of the treaty, wool prices in Wyoming for the 1938 clip were off fully one-third from the prices of 1937, even before the agreement was consummated.

That the fears of the wool growers were well founded is shown by the fact that since the British trade agreements have become a reality, imports of wool and mohair, wool waste, noils, and rags have increased roughly 600 percent. Department of Commerce figures show that during the first 6 months of this year wool imports totaled 116,801,000 pounds, compared with 25,415,500 pounds in the same period of last year. Herein is to be found the source of the great apprehension of our flockmasters over the proposed concessions to Argentina.

I realize we are told that these wools to be imported are coarse grades and will not come in competition with United States wool. My answer to that is that even now stranger things than coarse wool are being used as wool substitutes. I remember of having read a number of years ago of a freight-train wreck in which four cars or peanut hulls consigned to a certain virgin-wool manufacturer were busted wide open and strewn over the landscape. If wool concessions are started with the coarse grade, they will be followed by other concessions on all wools until our whole protection is gone. As it is now, less than 50 percent of virgin wool is contained in materials advertised as virgin wools.

Our cattlemen are even more concerned, because, with the present protective tariff of 6 cents a pound on canned beef, they have seen imports jump from 52,000,000 pounds for the first 8 months of 1938 to 57,000,000 pounds for the first 8 months of 1939. If these importations keep up for the full year, close to 100,000,000 pounds of beef will enter this country by the tin-can route.

According to conservative estimates, one average South American cow boils down to a 120-pound tin-can content. On this basis the 100,000,000 pounds of beef just referred to, translated into terms of cattle, would mean that about 850,000 head of cows from the Argentine will enter this country in tin-can form before the end of this year. If this is the situation under a 6-cent duty, how many more will come if that duty is reduced 50 percent? Will we have to multiply 850,000 by 21 (as was the case in live turkeys coming from Canada), and if so, are we face to face with a stampede of more than 17,000,000 tin-can longhorns when the full effect of this proposed treaty really gets under way?

For our cattlemen, the situation with regard to imports of beef and meat products is serious enough now. To further aggravate it would be a mistake of the first magnitude. Department of Commerce figures for the first 6 months of 1939 disclose the following: Imports of cattle, 6 months of 1939, 486,497 head, against 242,584 head for the corresponding 1938 period. Imports of other meat products, which include beef, pork, and poultry, amounted to 79,472,315 pounds for the first 6 months of 1939, against 75,884,822 pounds for the first 6 months of 1938.

I want to note right here that freight rates on canned meat, before the war, per 100 pounds from the Argentine to New York, was 29 cents, and now that the war scare is on, that rate has increased to 33 cents, but the rate from Chicago to New York is 51 cents. So the South Americans have an added advantage in freight other than that which is given by the tariff of 22 cents per hundredweight. Perhaps not much, but at that the equivalent of a further tariff reduction of nearly one-quarter cent per pound.

Despite the falling prices of American farmers for their hog products, importation of pork continues on a large scale. For the first 6 months of 1939, the imports of cheaply produced pork, hams, shoulders, bacon, and pickled pork amounted to 25,827,000 pounds, against 25,661,000 pounds for the comparable 1938 period. Our domestic market is being flooded also with cheaply produced foreign fats and oils, which also operates to the detriment of all of the farmers in the United States.

It will be remembered that the 1934 amendment to the Smoot-Hawley Tariff Act of 1930 authorized the President to enter into trade agreements "as a means of assisting in the present emergency in restoring the American standard of living, in overcoming domestic unemployment and the present economic depression."

It is obvious that none of these purposes would be served by tariff reductions on the items on the Argentine agenda. John D. Miller, president of the National Cooperative Council, an organization of agricultural cooperatives representing some 1,700,000 farmers and substantially all of the major agricultural marketing cooperatives of the country, made this statement, at a recent meeting of the organization's executive committee, in connection with the proposed agreement with Argentine:

"Reciprocal-trade agreements, in accord with the basic policy on which all such agreements are supposed to be based, are sound and helpful. We understand that one of these basic requirements is: that by the terms of such agreements each of the contracting nations receives things it needs in exchange for things that it does not need.

"A study of the various trade agreements made with other agricultural nations during the last 6 years shows that such agreements require this country to receive many forms of agricultural products, either in their original or processed form, of which there were at the time, and still are, surpluses so large that they have a continual price-depressing effect.

"Agreements of this type are a direct and harmful violation of the fundamental rules involved, in that, by their terms, this country is receiving large quantities of things that it does not need.

"In this type of agreement American farmers have been injured far and away more than any other group.

"In addition to all this, we find that the policies of the Government are conflicting and illogical in that some of the departments are paying farmers to reduce production, thus reducing surpluses, while the Department of State, in making these agreements, causes a material increase in the imports of like farm products, thus increasing such surpluses."

Before we take any steps to reduce tariffs on Argentine agricultural products we should remember that all of our experience with reciprocal-trade treaties shows that American products are bought abroad, not because they are cheaper but because they are better, while imported products are exploited here not because they are better but because they are cheaper.

Of course, Argentina can, with her cheap peon labor and inferior living conditions and standards, outsell any American products unless they are protected by an adequate tariff. But if the concessions to be discussed in the negotiation of this treaty are permitted to become effective it will be the workingman, the rancher, and the farmer who will pay the bill. And the more concessions granted, the greater will be that bill. Moreover, to the best of my understanding, the Argentine Meat Producers Cooperative is a government institution and its products are, in effect, subsidized products.

The exact opposite is the case in this country. The American product is certainly not subsidized; on the contrary, crucified is perhaps a more accurate word, and that by our own Labor Department rulings.

The attitude of our farmers and ranchers toward any letting down of the tariff barriers on the canned beef and beef products of Argentina was made unmistakably clear when the President defended, on May 12 last, the purchase of Argentine canned beef for the Navy. At that time D. M. Hildebrand, of Seward, Nebr., president of the United States Livestock Association, issued a statement, in which he said:

"The fact that the present administration has seen fit to buy beef from Argentina when our own livestock producers have been working under a heavy handicap for the last 4 or 5 years indicates that it is not in sympathy with making a market for our feed grains, as the only market the farmer has for corn and byproducts of the farm is livestock.

"With taxes mounting, certainly the livestock producers in the United States should have the first opportunity in the American market. The best aid that agriculture and livestock producers can have is to provide a market for what we produce in the United States."

A statement issued by President Ljungdahl and Secretary Miller of the Kansas State Livestock Association read in part:

"Producers of meat animals throughout our country need every possible help in obtaining the very best market for their products. Recent years of severe drought and unfavorable markets have brought serious losses to livestock producers, and if they survive these losses they must have every advantage possible in marketing meat animals.

"Our beef producers naturally object to being sacrificed upon the altar of so-called good-neighbor policy, and no good neighbor would expect it."

Moreover, any tariff reductions which would tend to increase our imports of canned Argentine beef or beef products would be detrimental to the public welfare for hygienic reasons. There is today an embargo against the shipment of live Argentine beef into this country because of the prevalence of the hoof-and-mouth disease in that country. We cattlemen of the West are fearful that the administration may attempt to make the proposed Argentine agreement by some means an instrument to circumvent this embargo. We know that such action would be fatal, because Argentina never has and and probably never will clean up.

In that respect let me quote from the present Canadian treaty:

"In the event that the Government of either country makes representations to the Government of the other country in respect of the application of any sanitary law or regulation for the protection of human, animal, or plant health or life, and if there is disagreement with respect thereto, a committee of technical experts on which each Government will be represented thereto, on the request of either Government, be established to consider the matter and to submit recommendations to the two Governments."

If a clause of that kind is written into the Argentine treaty, I am telling you that the embargo against the shipment of live cattle into this country from the Argentine is at an end, because such a provision opens the way to get around the embargo, and once live cattle are permitted to be shipped into this country from a country like Argentina, which never has and never will be cleaned up, then you can expect every herd in this country to become infected with the foot-and-mouth disease, and not only domestic cattle, but deer and cloven-hoofed game animals of every kind. Your past records prove that conclusively.

The President recently said: "You can't ship hoof-and-mouth in tin cans." That is probably true, but does the President know that Argentina does can cattle afflicted with hoof-and-mouth disease? Is it not a pretty thought to know that animals afflicted with this, the most loathsome disease known to cattle, are being put into tin cans and sold to the American public as a product "infinitely superior," to use the President's phrase, "to the American made article"? Yet that is exactly what is happening. It is bad enough as it is. Should the Government permit it to become worse?

Let me quote from a statement made by Mr. McKenzie, of the Matador Land & Cattle Co., before the Wyoming cattlemen's convention in 1937. Said he:

"I lived in Brazil and Argentina for 11 years and was constantly in the livestock business so I know the conditions and practices. Whenever a cow was taken with the hoof-and-mouth disease we rushed her to the packinghouse for slaughter. There was no law or provision of any kind against our doing so."

Irrespective of any such considerations, however, the fact remains that the granting of concessions on Argentine farm and ranch products would violate the sound principle that the first consideration of our foreign trade and tariff policies should be what we need to acquire, rather than what we wish to sell. Our approach to tariff problems should be: First, what is desirable and necessary to import. Second, how can we obtain these imports through agreements and gain exports by supplying the things which other countries need and desire.

On the basis of the treaties already made, the record shows that in spite of the large increase in the export of war materials, such as aircraft, motortrucks, scrap iron, pig iron, etc., our imports are gradually increasing and our exports are gradually decreasing.

These are uncertain and perilous times. Moreover, special conditions obtain as to Argentine trade which should make us wary of definite commitments in a period of wartime confusion and economic upheaval. Argentina has long been a British supply base. Great Britain has $2,000,000,000 invested in the Argentine, as compared with $700,000,000 invested by the United States. The British own the greatest Argentine railroad and have consistently taken about 4 percent of Argentine exports. The Argentine peso is rather closely tied to the British pound. As we all know, since the outbreak of the war the pound has been declining. What the future holds in store for the pound none of us can foresee. But that caution is needed in making commitments under such circumstances is clear.

We must not forget that late last August Argentina suddenly changed its trade system to one of import control, freezing foreign exports to Argentina at 1934-36 levels, and then setting import quotas. As recently as October 4 the American consulate general at Buenos Aires informed the Department of Commerce that the Argentine exchange control office had found it desirable to authorize the granting of a preferential exchange rate for many imported products important to American trade.

A circular issued by the Argentine exchange control office set forth a long list of products to which the exchange rate of 15 and 17 pesos to the pound, respectively, would apply. The rate of 15 pesos to the pound, or 3.7313 pesos to the dollar, applies to many products imported by Argentina in the past. The peso today is already off about 2 cents from a year ago. What is the meaning of all this for us? Where will it all end?

We are not clairvoyant, but we can learn much from actual experience. Let us again turn for enlightenment to the Canadian agreement and the behavior of the pound. From November 19, 1938, to September 15, 1939, less than a year, the British pound declined 21.1 percent in relation to the dollar and the Canadian dollar declined 9.7 percent. It is elementary that depreciation of one country's currency in relation to another imposes a heavy burden on the country whose currency remains at the old level. In the first place, with our currency at the old level, it raises the price of American goods to foreign buyers in terms of their depreciated money.

For example, prior to the British-American agreement, Canadian lumber enjoyed a 10-percent preference in the British market. Under the terms of the agreement this preference was reduced to 4½ percent. Even under this rate, American producers had difficulty in competing with Canada. Today, however, Canada's preference, despite the agreement, is greater than at any time before. The Canadian dollar has depreciated 9.7 percent in relation to the American dollar. Add to this the preference of 4½ percent, and Canada has what amounts to a preference of more than 14 percent.

The second and most important effect of trading with countries having depreciated currencies is the new ease with which they can sell to us. Depreciation of one currency in relation to another has the effect of reducing the price of articles imported in terms of United States dollars, or, expressed in another way, of reducing the tariff on the articles.

Of course, we could not foresee the outbreak of a European war and its effect on foreign exchange when the British agreements were signed. But today war is an actuality, and we have before us illuminating examples of the effect of that war on foreign exchange. It is unthinkable that we would have tied our hands in the British agreements could we have foreseen some of the practical effects of our commitments. It would be sheer folly, under present conditions, in which uncertainty has replaced stability throughout all world trade, to make definite and binding tariff commitments to Argentina now.

In conclusion, let me call to your attention the effect that the President's sales talk for Argentine canned beef has had. You will recall that some months ago the President stated that "Argentine canned beef was infinitely better than the American product" and when pressed for an answer why, stated that "he guessed it must be because the Argentine cow was just naturally better than the American cow." Here is the record, which shows that it pays to advertise:

	Pounds
August 1938—canned meat from Argentina	1,393,143
June 1939—canned meat from Argentina	2,440,202
July 1939—canned meat from Argentina	2,934,999
August 1939—canned meat from Argentina	3,518,566

The month of August 1939 shows an increase over August 1938 of 2,125,423 pounds.

If a sales talk alone can deliver such a crushing blow to our cattlemen, what are we to expect from continued sales talk plus a possible 50-percent reduction of the tariff?

The CHAIRMAN. Thank you very much. There is no authority in the trade agreement to modify our sanitary restrictions. The article you quoted provides only for consultation and recommendation of experts.

Mr. HORTON. May I ask whether you contemplate including that article in this agreement?

The CHAIRMAN. I do not know whether it was contemplated being included or not.

Mr. HORTON. If it is included in the Argentine agreement, would it be so translated as to mean that every other country, under the most-favorable-nation clause, would get the benefit of that agreement with Argentina?

The CHAIRMAN. One government can present its views to the other government and, after consultation, that they must recommend to the committee of experts.

Mr. HORTON. Who are the experts going to be?

The CHAIRMAN. In article XII of the Canadian agreement, which is in every one of our agreements, it is provided that—

"Nothing in this agreement shall be construed to prevent the enforcement of such measures as the government of either country may see fit to adopt," relating to various measures, including the last one, article XII, subsection 2 (a) and (b), "designed to protect human, animal, or plant health or life."

There is nothing in the trade agreement, or in any trade agreement, that we have to come in there to protect sanitary regulations.

Mr. HORTON. Will you make the statement now that the State Department has no idea or authority or intention of any kind of circumventing the sanitary convention?

The CHAIRMAN. It cannot do it.

Mr. HORTON. It could not do it if it wanted to? It will not do it? We can rest assured that it will not be done?

The CHAIRMAN. We cannot tell what the State Department will do.

Mr. HORTON. That is just the trouble. We don't know, either.

The CHAIRMAN. We know the State Department could not, under existing law—certainly not under the trade agreement—do anything to affect the sanitary embargo.

Mr. HORTON. I was trying to see if they could open up the question of live cattle coming into this country.

The CHAIRMAN. Nothing has been done under any sanitary regulations, and nothing can be done under any agreement to affect any sanitary regulation.

Neutrality

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN M. HOUSTON

OF KANSAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, October 19, 1939

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. Speaker, Europe had its war of nerves, then its war of peace, and now its war of arms.

The United States is having its war of words. Arguments pro and con in the Congress, over the radio, and in the press have brought forth "dead cats," "red herrings," and partisan political offal.

The bluster about helping the Allies or Germany or any nation other than this one of ours is ill-advised war-breeding talk. Our interests are on this continent, and all debts, real or fancied, have been paid with interest.

Speeches, debates, forums, and name-calling emotional outbursts have so prevented clear thinking that an armistice on neutrality hysterics should be proclaimed.

Repetition, digression, and silly prophesies have been a strain on ears, dimmed vision, and clouded reason.

A jury of one Gold Star Mother, an ex-service man, a farmer, an industrialist, a munitions maker, a shipowner, a naval officer, and an international lawyer could take the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD from September 21 to date, blue-pencil all repetition, partisan politics, pretty compliments, poetry, flag-waving tear-jerking bombastics, self-exaltation, condense the facts into readable and understandable form, and in 1 day arrive at a sensible conclusion as to how the peace of the United States can best be protected.

The existing neutrality law has some good points and some dangerous ones. Under its provisions American ships loaded with American-owned steel, copper, cotton, wheat, oil, manufactured goods except arms and ammunition—all essentials of warfare—and even American citizens, may go into seas infested with mines, submarines, and warships and make deliveries to ports of belligerents. That invites attack.

The legislation needed is that which will provide for the sale of all American products of farm, mine, and factory, except those which our Government may classify as strategic war materials required for our own defense, to all nations, belligerent or neutral, who will pay cash and take title and transport them on their own ships. Americans should not be permitted to travel in war zones or on ships of belligerents. A commission representing the legislative and executive branches of the Government should be appointed, having power to designate combat zones and restrict American commerce and travel in those areas alone.

The entrance into or avoidance of involvement in the European war cannot be controlled wholly by domestic legislation. Too much depends upon the actions of foreign nations, which are unpredictable. All we can hope to do is enact legislation regulating ourselves so as to minimize the chances of becoming involved. The President, the Congress, and the American people are determined to stay out of war as long as peace with honor can prevail. Our greatest need to achieve that end is an adequate defense on land and water and in the air.

"Render Unto Caesar the Things That Are Caesar's and Unto God the Things That Are God's"

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. OVERTON BROOKS

OF LOUISIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, October 19, 1939

ADDRESS BY HON. OVERTON BROOKS, OF LOUISIANA

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following speech delivered by me at the dedication of the chapel at Barksdale Field, La.:

My friends, we are gathered here on this Sabbath evening for the purpose of dedicating this house of worship. It is a matter of especial pleasure on my part to see so many of you out for this occasion, and especially is it a pleasure to me to see so many of our people, who have no connection with the Army, attending these exercises. This is indeed a memorable occasion in the history of Barksdale Field. It marks, in my humble opinion, an epic in the development of this great Army air post.

A number of years before I was elected to Congress I became interested in the possibility of obtaining for this Army post at Barksdale Field, La., a chapel, dedicated to the worship of God. I found that a great many ex-service men, members of the American Legion and other service organizations, had been discussing this matter for a long time, and felt that there should be, at this great Army center, such a building to provide adequate facilities for our soldiers and their families to the worship of God. Several posts of the Louisiana Department of the American Legion actually passed resolutions calling upon the Army for such a chapel. Of course, the ministers of every denomination and creed in north Louisiana have always shown a keen interest in obtaining this magnificent building, and have worked zealously among themselves toward this end.

One of the first things which occurred to me that should be done to bring about a well rounded completion of Barksdale Field was to obtain an appropriation for a chapel. I, accordingly, adopted this as the first objective in my legislative career.

During the first session in which I served, the Subcommittee on Military Affairs of the Appropriations Committee of the House of Representatives considered appropriations for Army construction throughout the United States. I importuned the members of this subcommittee and urged upon them the vital necessity of completing the development of this flying field. I urged especially the building of a chapel here, and I am glad to say that the members of the committee listened to my plea for this construction and in return suggested that I gather data on the plans and the cost of the building of this magnificent structure, keeping it within the bounds of which they thought at the time the cost could be appropriated for such purpose. The General Staff of the War Department responded to my appeal for this information, and these officers made many helpful suggestions, not only to me but to the members of the committee.

Shortly thereafter Congress passed the appropriation bill making available the sum of $80,000 for the building. Plans were completed in final form by the War Department engineers and actual construction work began. The building is completed and is now to be dedicated. You have but to look at the lines, curves, and graceful form of this building; you have but to examine its interior, its fixtures, its furnishings, and its fine pipe organ to know with what surpassing detail and architectural completeness these plans were drawn and have been executed. This is really an outstanding piece of Federal architecture.

In the city of Washington annually a competitive exhibit is made at the National Museum of the finest types of Federal construction. Models and pictures of all outstanding recent construction are placed in this exhibit and disclose in infinite design and in perfect replica the original buildings located in all parts of the United States and its far-flung possessions. Last year the Army, Navy, and the Public Works program all entered strong exhibits, each claiming parts of their building program as worthy of special mention by the architectural world. This chapel building at Barksdale Field constituted a part of the Army exhibit and we take pride today in knowing that it took a blue-ribbon prize for architectural symmetry and perfection.

Religion has always been closely identified with military history. It is interesting to go through the pages of the past and note the many instances where religion has played such an overwhelming part in the destiny of Christian nations during conflicts. It is a matter of history that no pagan leader has ever been permanently successful and that Christian nations, today warring though they may be, dominate the world. In our own country the history of the past shows how closely identified the worship of God has been with the success of our armies. Those who have had the opportunity of visiting in the environs of the city of Washington may visit the little chapel built along the historic streets of Alexandria, Va., and pause for a minute before the pew which the Father of our Country occupied during times immediately preceding and after the American Revolution. The religious activities of Abraham Lincoln during the Civil War are known to every schoolboy, as well as are known the devotions of the great commander of the Confederacy, Robert E. Lee, and his courageous lieutenant, Stonewall Jackson.

Nor was the experience of the World War different from the instances I have just mentioned. If you pardon a personal reference, I will take you to the scene of the sunrise Easter service with the Army of Occupation in Germany on Easter morning following the close of the last World War. In the center of a great plain, under the open sky, was builded an immense altar made completely white by altar coverings. Priests of the Catholic Church and ministers of the Protestant faith jointly officiated. As the sun arose over the hills to the east its shafts of light fell full upon not one or two thousand soldiers of the American Army, but twenty-five to thirty thousands of our soldiers, who, joining in the service, knelt on the bare ground still wet with dew to offer up their supplications to Almighty God.

It is therefore most appropriate that we should observe the dedication of this chapel as a most outstanding occasion in the development of our air field. All of Louisiana is of course keenly interested in Barksdale Field, and scarcely a day passes but what I talk to our citizens in reference to the work being done at this field. One who is not completely familiar with the manner in which an air post is run, and does not know the personnel of our post and the families, may be inclined to feel that the business of operating an Army post is severe and without normal feelings and emotions. To those of us who have been able to go among you and meet your families and see your children we know that the need for a place of worship here has been extremely acute. It impressed the committee in Washington very much to learn that in the past the gymnasium here on Sundays has been converted into a church for Protestant men and their families, while during the week it has been used for athletics. It impressed the committee to know that the bachelors' quarters had to be used by the Catholic boys and their families as a place of worship on Sunday, and the Jewish personnel at this post had no place at all to go for sacred purposes.

If one would desire to know the real heart of Barksdale Field; if one would desire to feel the real pulsations of the heartbeat of the men who operate this post; if one would know the families of the soldiers who come and go here and know their real, fundamental interests, stripped of all the surface gaiety, levity, and frivolities that naturally goes with all large groups of men brought together, one must know not only the barracks here, not only the concrete aprons, the landing field, the ships that go and come and fly into the azure depths of the sky, but one must also take into consideration the homes on this post and around the post wherein reside the wives and mothers and wherein are found the little children.

That the Army knows this is true is well shown by the keen interest which it has had in building our church. We civilians are inspired by the thought and are given new confidence in the fact that our Army needs and provides for its personnel this beautiful building.

We meet today to dedicate this edifice. It is appropriate that we dedicate the building and its equipment first to the use of the United States of America and to the preservation of its Constitution, its Bill of Rights, and its fundamental institutions. We especially dedicate its use to the United States Army and to its Air Corps, rich in its tradition, its heroism, and its accomplishment. We further dedicate it to the use of the officers and men of this post and their families as a haven of refuge and a place of solace. And, finally, we dedicate this temple to the service of Almighty God.

The Argentine Trade Agreement

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ESTES KEFAUVER

OF TENNESSEE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, October 19, 1939

EDITORIALS FROM THE WASHINGTON DAILY NEWS, THE WASHINGTON STAR, AND THE WASHINGTON POST

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorials relative to the proposed reciprocal trade agreement with Argentina:

[From the Washington Daily News of October 17, 1939]

CANNED-BEEF POLITICS

At the first day's hearings on the proposed United States-Argentine trade treaty seven Senators from our cow country exerted their influence and oratory against reducing the tariff on imports of canned beef.

Not one lawmaker appeared to say a word in behalf of the millions of American families who eat canned beef.

Thus it has always been in the matter of tariffs. A few organized ranchers out where short grass and Senators are plentiful have more pull than millions of unorganized consumers.

Very little beef is canned in this country. In Argentina, where there is a great beef surplus, some fine cuts are tinned, but here similar cuts go into the making of hot dogs, hamburgers, and other American delicacies, and thereby bring higher prices to the packers.

The Senators argue that the 6-cents-per-pound tariff on canned beef should not be reduced because that would mean larger imports and more competition with United States beef. But the American housewife who goes to a grocery for a can of beef and decides against the purchase will not instead buy a tenderloin at the meat counter. She is more likely to choose a can of beans or something else her budget affords.

Instead of whittling away at the purchasing power of American workers, it seems to us the cattle Senators might better devote their attention to ways and means of making it possible for these workers to get their teeth into some rich roast beef and thick, juicy steaks, both home grown and imported.

The purpose of the pending United States-Argentine treaty is to start a real two-way flow of trade between the two countries. Specifically, there is immediately at hand in Argentina a market for some $50,000,000 more yearly of United States manufactured products. That is the amount of Argentine trade which Germany forfeited when she went into war. There are other millions in trade which British and French industries can't hold and Americans can get. The same is true in other Latin American countries. But we can't get it unless we are willing to buy what the Latin Americans have to sell. Only by selling to us can they obtain the dollar credits with which to buy. And what they buy will be produced in United States factories by United States workers getting good wages—wages which should enable them now and then to enjoy a real sirloin off a Texas steer.

[From the Washington Evening Star of October 17, 1939]

THE ARGENTINE AGREEMENT

Of all the countries in the Western Hemisphere, Argentina is the only one which has resolutely resisted the policy of solidarity and unity which the United States has preached since 1933. It has its own good reasons for taking its independent stand, but the United States long has been seeking the means of turning the South American Republic toward a more friendly feeling for its far-northern neighbor. A milestone in the development of more friendly relations between Argentina and the United States is the proposed Argentina trade agreement on which hearings opened yesterday at the Tariff Commission. Of course, the agreement and the proposed American tariff concessions to Argentinian goods will be discussed immediately in the light of their commercial and economic implications. In the long run, however, the agreement will be regarded as a political document, a strengthener of the Argentine-American tie.

Members of Congress from the Western agricultural States have raised the objection that the agreement, with its proposed concessions, will work great harm on the American cattle industry, the American flax growers, the wool growers—indeed, the American raisers of all the agricultural commodities on which concessions are contemplated to Argentina—and to the rest of the world, under the most-favored-nation policy of the agreement. This cry is a good deal like the protest raised against the trade agreements with Canada. In both instances the spokesmen for agriculture contend that the reciprocal trade agreements program harms the farmer in order to provide a larger foreign market for the industrialist.

The same Government which frames the agreement has been pursuing a most lavish policy of subsidizing agriculture during the past 6 years. Only this spring Congress voted more than $700,000,000 of special payments for the farmers. It does not seem probable that the Government would deliberately nullify its subsidies by embarking on a program aimed at the farmer's ruination. Perhaps the farmer will suffer slightly from the Argentine competition. But his benefit is likely to be larger in the end, because the Argentine agreement will, if it is signed, improve the American industrial market and enhance the purse of the domestic buyers of American farm commodities.

The larger commercial question involved in the Argentine agreement is that it can serve to break down Argentina's discrimination against American goods. In recent years Argentina has favored the British through the Rocca agreement and frowned on American traders through import quotas and exchange discrimination. This attitude is a reflection of a political antipathy toward the United States. In times of peace the United States wants the active friendship of Argentina. In the present time of war, the United States needs that friendship, for it is becoming more apparent every day that the New World will be, for a while anyway, almost the whole of our world, commercially speaking.

[From the Washington Post of October 18, 1939]

TRADE WITH ARGENTINA

The proposed agreement with Argentina seems destined to put Secretary Hull's reciprocal trade program to its most severe test. Farmers and their representatives in Congress fear that concessions on competitive Argentine products may add to existing agricultural surpluses in this country. Some legislators have gone so far as to threaten a fight to repeal the trade-agreement act if a larger volume of competitive farm products is admitted to the American market in return for Argentine concessions on our industrial exports.

These fears are based largely upon the list of products on which the United States is considering concessions. Included in this list are casein, linseed oil, canned meat, cheese, corn, cattle hides, and various other agricultural products. Fresh meats would be excluded, however, under the sanitary embargo which still remains in effect.

On the other hand, the negotiations with Argentina are considered by many as an opportunity for the United States to take over part of that country's trade heretofore going to European countries now at war. An agreement with the most progressive nation of South America, it is argued, would strengthen commercial ties with our southern neighbors to the mutual advantage of all countries in the Western Hemisphere.

This desire to extend American trade is, of course, wholly constructive. But it is not simply a problem of inducing Argentina to buy more American machinery, automobiles, and typewriters. The war has made it even more essential that we take a larger volume of South American products if we are to expand our markets in that region. And we must face the fact that most of what Argentina wishes to sell is competitive with the products of our own farms.

Obviously, this proposed agreement should be negotiated with full recognition of its direct bearing upon our domestic agricultural policy. As Senator CONNALLY pointed out to the Committee for Reciprocity Information, Congress appropriated $700,000,000 to aid farmers this year. Much of this money is used to compensate tillers of the soil for reducing the size of their crops. Federal funds have also been used to purchase surplus commodities and to pay export subsidies on wheat and cotton.

It would be a direct contradiction of policy for the administration to grant concessions on competitive agricultural imports while it is paying domestic farmers for not producing similar crops. So the Department of State faces the necessity of reconciling whatever concessions may be granted with the general farm policy of the Department of Agriculture. The whole theory behind the A. A. A. is that it will tend to bring agriculture into a more balanced relationship to industry. Unless that policy is to be abandoned, it would seem to preclude any extensive concessions at the expense of agriculture for the benefit of expanding industrial exports.

A consistent policy does not mean, of course, that no trade agreement with the Argentine can be negotiated. There are a number of products on which concessions can be granted without piling up new agricultural surpluses. The careful defense of domestic interests in all the trade agreements negotiated to date strongly suggests that the pact with Argentina will be similarly safeguarded. For that very reason, however, only moderate increases in our trade with the other American republics can be reasonably anticipated.

Neutrality

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN W. FLANNAGAN, JR.

OF VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, October 19, 1939

Mr. FLANNAGAN. Mr. Speaker, I want to talk on neutrality—what it is and how it can best be maintained.

Too many these days are talking and writing about neutrality without knowing what they are talking or writing about. It is a catchy word that is sweeping the country like some catchy song because somehow we all think that neutrality means peace, and peace is what we want.

This loose talk that most of us are indulging in is creating a great deal of confusion. To hear those in favor of the embargo and those opposed, and those in favor of "cash and carry" and those opposed talk, the ordinary fellow, who does not pretend to know much about either side, thinks that it is "be damned if we do and be damned if we don't." While the situation is bad enough, no matter what we do, it is not quite that bad, for behind all the gusto, the fervid appeals, the cold reasoning, and, in many cases, the hysteria, you will find a peace complex which is an encouraging sign and is a stronger guaranty of peace than all the neutrality laws that can be passed, because while we can by wise legislation pass neutrality laws that will lessen the danger of war, ever remember we cannot legislate peace. Today I am persuaded that every true American, no matter which course he may be advocating, has the same object in view; namely, a neutrality law that will best serve to maintain peace. Yes; the aim and object of every true American today should be to keep our Republic at peace. There can be no division as to our objective. That we may honestly disagree in the methods employed to bring about our objective is but natural in a democracy that believes in freedom of thought and freedom of speech. I am relying upon the will of the American people to remain at peace more than I am on congressional neutrality legislation to keep us out of the European conflict. "Where there is a will there is a way."

NEUTRALITY—WHAT IT MEANS

Neutrality is the state of being neutral. And neutral—why, "there ain't no such animal"—according to the lexicographers, means having no decided character, indefinite, middling, colorless, and these things add up an imaginary thing known as a nonentity which we commonly call neutrality. Now, it is pretty hard to be good and it is pretty easy to be bad, but this thing of being neither good nor bad, active nor passive, hot nor cold, positive nor negative, acid nor basic, is about the hardest job an individual or Nation ever tackled. And these are the things we have got to be if we ever reach that estate known as neutrality. Well you know and I know that as a practical proposition it is impossible for an individual or nation to be absolutely neutral.

To reach that imaginary estate we would have to be handcuffed, put in a strait jacket, gagged, have our ears plugged, and then for fear of thinking out loud we would have to live in a vacuum. Certainly no one expects the impossible. With respect to nations it can at best only mean that we remain friendly to the belligerents, treating them all alike, not intentionally taking the part of either or any of them. No matter what we say or do one side of the belligerent forces, if so minded, can construe our words or acts as unneutral; and do not think that this will not be done if the interests of one side of the belligerent forces will be better served, because experience teaches that in spite of what is known as the accepted rules of international law the rules of warfare change as emergencies arise. People engaged in the unethical, silly, fiendish business of war are out to kill and destroy and you need not expect them to live up to the ethics of a game that has no ethics. The best we can do when we sin against the law of neutrality—and sin we will in the eyes of one side or the other no matter what we do—is to be sure we sin in favor of our friends and not our enemies.

THE HANDS WE CAN PLAY—WHICH IS THE BEST?

As I said, most of the confusion has come from loose talking and writing. I am sorry to have to state it, but the truth is that many of those who speak and talk with authority could not, if their lives depended on it, tell you what our rights as a neutral are under the present neutrality laws, what our rights as a neutral will be if the Senate bill is passed, or what our rights as a neutral will be if the present neutrality laws were wiped out, the Senate bill failed of passage, and we had to rely upon our rights as a neutral under what is commonly known as international law.

Now, I believe it will clear up a lot of confusion and assist us at arriving at a correct conclusion if we turn the cards face up and look at and study the three respective hands honestly, dispassionately, and prayerfully, with this one question in mind: In order to stay out of the European conflict and remain at peace, which is the best hand for America to play?

I am not afraid of the verdict of the American people—and, my friends, the question should be and will be decided by the American people—if that verdict is based upon a deliberate, conscientious, and prayerful consideration of the true facts. Personalities, ill will, hatred, and the emotions should play no part in the consideration. Out of a multitude of voices cometh forth wisdom. I welcome the composite voice of our people. In such a voice we can in the future, as in the past, look for guidance. The American people are pretty good card players and will know which hand to play and which hand to lay down if the deal is honest and there are no blacklegs in the game. And they will know how to play our neutrality hand if you give them an honest deal and keep the blacklegs out of the game. The only way to give them an honest deal is by a free, frank, and full discussion that presents the real facts; and the only way you can keep the blacklegs out of the game is by both sides looking with disfavor upon anyone who tries to color the facts through prejudice, ill will, or political bias.

Let me deal you the three hands, the cards face up, and in this way assist you in determining which hand the American Government should play.

COMPARATIVE PROVISIONS OF EXISTING NEUTRALITY ACT OF MAY 1, 1937, PENDING SENATE NEUTRALITY BILL OF 1939, AND INTERNATIONAL LAW

1. Transfer of title of goods exported from the United States to belligerents: (a) Existing neutrality law: No provision in existing law. Discretionary authority to require it expired May 1, 1939.

(b) Senate bill: Required by pending bill.

(c) International law: Not required by international law.

2. Loans and credits by American citizens to belligerents: (a) Existing neutrality law: Prohibited by existing law, except that ordinary commercial credits and short-time obligations may be permitted. No limit set on these credits and they can be renewed.

(b) Senate bill: Prohibited by pending bill except that ordinary commercial credits and short-time obligations may be permitted with a limit of 90 days. Renewals not permitted. Moreover, if default is made, all further credit cut off during period of default.

(c) International law: Not prohibited by international law.

3. Carriage of goods to belligerents in American vessels: (a) Existing neutrality law: Not prohibited by existing law, except carriage of arms, ammunition, and implements of war. Discretionary authority to prohibit other carriage expired May 1, 1939.

(b) Senate bill: Prohibited by pending bill.

(c) International law: Not prohibited by international law. Vessels carrying contraband to a belligerent are subject to capture.

4. Export of arms, ammunition, and implements of war to belligerents: (a) Existing neutrality law: Prohibited by existing law.

(b) Senate bill: Not prohibited by pending bill.

(c) International law: Not prohibited by international law, although as contraband such exports are subject to confiscation by belligerents.

5. Travel of American citizens on belligerent vessels:

(a) Existing neutrality law: Prohibited by existing law, although exceptions may be made by the President.

(b) Senate bill: Prohibited by pending bill, except under such rules and regulations as may be prescribed.

(c) International law: Not prohibited by international law.

6. Passage of American citizens and ships through combat areas:

(a) Existing neutrality law: No provision in existing law.

(b) Senate bill: Discretionary authority in pending bill to prohibit American vessels or citizens to proceed through such areas defined by the President.

(c) International law: No well-recognized restriction under international law on passage of neutral vessels or neutral nationals on the high seas, except when destined for a blockaded port.

Now, after you examine the respective hands, I believe you will come to the same conclusion I have; namely, the American people should play the hand outlined by the President in his message to the Congress, which is incorporated in the Senate bill, because it offers greater safeguards than we now have and will tend to reduce the controversies that are likely to draw us into the conflict, and thus minimize our chances of becoming embroiled in a war we had nothing in the world to do with bringing about.

Let us take up these provisions one by one and see if we will not be strengthening the hand of peace in following the President's recommendations and passing the Senate bill.

1. TRANSFER OF TITLE OF GOODS EXPORTED FROM THE UNITED STATES TO BELLIGERENTS

Under the present neutrality law and under international law title does not have to be transferred before shipment. It is true that the Neutrality Act of May 1, 1937, contained a provision requiring the passing of title to goods before shipment, but this provision in the 1937 act expired May 1, 1939. The Senate bill simply restores the passing of title provision contained in the act of 1937, and strengthens same by further providing that no loss incurred by one of our citizens in connection with the sale or transfer of title shall be made the basis of any claim put forward by the United States Government.

The object of the passing of title provision is to safeguard against complications that might arise in the event of the destruction of shipments of goods. We simply say to the belligerent purchasers, "When American goods are loaded on your vessels from then on the goods are yours, title has passed, and if they are damaged or destroyed the loss is yours." There seems to be no controversy over this provision.

2. LOANS AND CREDITS BY AMERICAN CITIZENS TO BELLIGERENTS

Under international law there is no prohibition against the extension of loans and credit. The Neutrality Act of May 1, 1937, prohibits the extension of loans and credits, except ordinary commercial credits and short-time obligations may be permitted, though no specific limit is set on these credits and there is no prohibition against renewals. Under the Senate bill, while loans and credits are prohibited, commercial credits and short-time obligations may be permitted, provided same do not run for more than 90 days; and the bill contains a prohibition against renewals and provides that if default is made all credit is cut off during the period of default. The Senate bill, therefore, as to commercial credits is nothing more than a cash transaction, because under the usual practice governing export trade, checks and drafts payable in 90 days are considered cash payments. However, in order to allay the fear entertained by many that these permissible short-time credits will be manipulated in such a way as to become long-time credits—probably frozen credits—I would like to see a strictly cash provision.

The charge has been made, and no doubt it is believed by a great many, that we were dragged into the World War by our citizens extending large loans and credits to some of the warring nations. While I do not believe that there was a single Member of the Congress so low in thought or purpose, so inhuman, as to have consciously cast his vote for war in order to attempt to make his Government a collecting agency for these loans, as a matter of fact, I am afraid a great deal of the war propaganda that flooded our country just prior to our entrance into that war was directly traceable to these loans. The human instinct to protect a loan is strong—some people will follow the dollar a long way—and it is but right that we should confine our dealings with the belligerents to cash transactions, and thus remove this war irritant.

3. CARRYING OF GOODS TO BELLIGERENTS IN AMERICAN VESSELS

Under the Neutrality Act of May 1, 1937, the only prohibition against American vessels carrying goods to belligerents is the prohibition against the carriage of "arms, ammunition, and implements of war," as the discretionary authority to prohibit other carriage expired May 1, 1939. There is no prohibition under international law, though, of course, vessels carrying contraband to a belligerent are subject to capture. Under the Senate bill American vessels are prohibited from carrying goods of any kind to belligerents.

This, in my opinion, is one of the most important provisions in the bill. Under the law as it now stands our ships can carry anything to a belligerent except "arms, ammunition, and implements of war," and this enumeration of prohibitive carriage cannot be added to or taken from, because it is defined by legislative enactment. Considered as a practical means of lessening our chances of becoming embroiled in the war, arms, ammunition, and implements of war is but a sounding phrase that, though pleasing to the ear, is misleading to the American people in that, while it has a peace sound, it in no way insures peace by lessening our chances of becoming involved in the war. Let me give you the reason: While there is no doubt about the list of manufactured articles which are defined under the act as "arms, ammunition, and implements of war" being contraband and appearing on the contraband lists of both sides of the warring powers, the contraband lists of the nations engaged in the war already contain many things not defined as being "arms, ammunition, and implements of war," and the lists will be added to from time to time as the war progresses, and there is no prohibition in the present act against American vessels carrying these other things, although they appear on the contraband lists of the warring nations. Now, we know that anything appearing on the contraband lists of the belligerents will be seized and confiscated if found moving to their enemy. With respect to the carriage of goods to belligerents in American vessels, the only way to lessen our chances of becoming embroiled in the conflict is by a prohibitive provision against the carriage of any goods to belligerents in American vessels. The Senate bill contains such a provision.

I realize that this provision will work a heavy loss on American shipping and export industries running probably into the millions, but I am persuaded it is a sacrifice we should make to the end of keeping our country out of a war that will cost the Nation, looking at the question from purely a material standpoint and not taking into consideration the untold suffering and misery that would follow in its wake, not millions but billions of dollars. If we are going to have a neutrality law in order to lessen our danger of becoming involved in the conflict, we should not let the dollar sign warp our judgment in framing the law. A few dollars picked up by assuming a risk that may lead to war is a bad investment. However, it may be possible to work out an exception relaxing shipping restrictions in the Pacific and other waters far removed from the danger zones and areas. Such an exception would seem to be wise if it would not in any way subject us to the danger of having our ships destroyed and our citizens killed. In the event such an exception is written into the bill, it should expressly give the President the right to withdraw same, at any time, in the event it appears likely that our further shipping in these waters will bring on complications.

I said that in my opinion this was probably the most important section in the bill. Now let me tell you why I entertain this opinion. While there were many contributing causes that led us into the World War, the compelling cause—the cause that finally forced us to take the fatal step—was the illegal killing of our citizens on the high seas. When Germany in its desperation announced in January 1917 that its submarines could not safely rise to the surface and search to see if vessels were carrying contrabands, and that thereafter she would, without notice, sink every vessel, neutral or belligerent, found within a certain unmarked zone hundreds of miles out from shore, and commenced to destroy our vessels and kill our citizens without notice or warning, the illegal and inhumane killing of our citizens was such an affront to our national honor and integrity, such an invasion of our rights, that we could not do other than declare war. Now, if we prohibit our vessels from carrying goods of any kind to belligerents, there can be no excuse for a belligerent to destroy one of our vessels, involving, as it will, not only the destruction of the vessel but the illegal killing of our citizens. This provision, if adopted, will, I believe, do more toward lessening our chances of becoming involved in the war than any other provision in the bill.

4. EXPORT OF ARMS, AMMUNITION, AND IMPLEMENTS OF WAR TO BELLIGERENTS

The Neutrality Act of May 1, 1937, prohibits all shipments of "arms, ammunition, and implements of war" to belligerents. No matter in whose vessels—American, neutral, or belligerent—these shipments are carried, the prohibition is absolute as to these things. Such shipments are not prohibited by international law, although under the laws of nations such shipments are considered contraband and if intercepted by one of the belligerents are subject to confiscation. The Senate bill simply repeals the prohibition contained in the act of 1937 as to the shipment of "arms, ammunition, and implements of war."

Now, keep in mind that the present law, which is the act of 1937, only prohibits the shipment of "arms, ammunition, and implements of war." It does not prevent shipment of the raw material out of which "arms, ammunition, and implements of war" are made, the prohibition only applying to the finished product. In other words, we can ship the belligerents the ingredients out of which gunpowder and other explosives are made, knowing they will be promptly mixed or compounded into explosives as soon as they reach their destination, and used in the war to destroy and kill; we can ship the belligerents the ingredients out of which poisonous gases are made, knowing they will be promptly mixed or compounded into deadly gases as soon as they reach their destination, and used in the war to kill; we can ship engines used in bombing planes and the raw material out of which their bodies and other parts are made, knowing that they will be promptly fabricated and assembled into finished planes as soon as they reach their destination, and used in the war to destroy and kill; we can ship the raw material out of which guns and cannons are made, knowing they will be promptly used to manufacture guns and cannons as soon as they reach their destination, and used in the war to destroy and kill, but we cannot ship the finished product.

The idea seems to be that it is immoral and illegal to sell an implement that will kill and destroy forthwith, but perfectly moral and legitimate if you require the purchaser to put the implement together or do a little work on it—probably on the theory that it will salve our conscience if the purchaser becomes particeps criminis in producing the instrument—before it goes forth on its mission of death and destruction. Such reasoning simply does not appeal to me. To my way of thinking there would be just as much logic in saying to the man who attempts to purchase a loaded pistol with which to commit suicide, "I am sorry, old fellow, that under the law I cannot sell you a loaded pistol with which to commit suicide, but I'll tell you what I can do; I'll sell you a pistol and a box of cartridges, and all you will have to do is to load the pistol and pull the trigger. Oh, this may delay you a few minutes, but it will do the work and kill you just as dead as if you bought the pistol loaded."

Now, the only practical effect such a policy can have is to take business away from industries in America, throwing thousands out of work, and turning the business over to the industries in the belligerent countries. Oh, you say this is a sordid, materialistic way of looking at the matter. In answer, I say I am only facing the facts and telling you what will happen, because pious talk and emotional appeals are not going to keep the belligerents, in the event they cannot purchase "arms, ammunition, and implements of war" from manufacturing them as long as they can obtain the raw materials.

Moreover, to carry on warfare there are many things just as essential as arms, ammunition, and implements of war. How about the fuel for the battleships, the gasoline for the planes, cotton for explosives, food, and clothing? Shipment of these things, all absolutely essential in war, is not prohibited. Take food for instance: Why withhold ammunition and permit the shipment of food, when you know and I know that an army can no more fight on an empty stomach than it can with an empty gun.

Again, the embargo provision in the act of 1937 does not apply until it has been determined a state of war exists. All a belligerent would have to do, seemingly, is not to make a formal declaration of war, which seems to be the fashion these days, in order to purchase all the arms, ammunition, and implements of war it pleases. Take Japan for instance: We all know that Japan and China are at war, yet neither side has made a formal declaration of war and, consequently, either side, although we know they are warring as hard as they can, under the present Embargo Act, can purchase all the arms, ammunition, and implements of war they can come over and get. Of course, we all know that the present Embargo Act gives Japan the advantage, because China cannot send its ships over.

Oh, but I hear the cry that if we repeal the embargo on "arms, ammunition, and implements of war," we will be favoring the Allies and it will be construed by Germany as an unneutral act. Let us see. While I believe it would have been much better to have followed the President's recommendation and repealed the embargo at the last session of Congress, there can be no foundation for the argument that because we are a little late in correcting a mistake that we are committing an unfriendly act. It is just as logical to say that if we fail to make the correction our failure will be construed as an unfriendly act. I admit that probably the act as it now stands gives Germany the advantage because, due to the fact that the Allies have command of the sea, German vessels cannot come over, and the vessels of the Allies, although they can come over, are prohibited from carrying back "arms, ammunition, and implements of war." But, remember, when we wipe the prohibition out by repealing the embargo we are returning to international law, and, as a matter of right, neither side can ask us to do more than observe the laws of nations. Moreover, when we repeal the embargo, remember, we are treating both sides the same way. We are simply saying to all belligerents, "We will sell you all the 'arms, ammunition, and implements of war' you can pay for, carry away in your own vessels, and at your own risk." I realize that as a practical proposition this will probably give the Allies the advantage because they have the cash and will be able to send their vessels over, but, remember, we are not creating the advantage by legislative enactment. The advantage, if any, will be brought about by conditions over which we have no control, namely, by the fact that Great Britain is a great sea power and its exchequer is in much better shape than the exchequer of Germany. As I have said, no matter what we say, no matter what we do, one side or the other of the belligerent powers can, if so minded, say that we have committed an unneutral act. In this case, if Germany so construes our act, we have the consolation that if repeal is a sin against neutrality, then, if sin it be, we have sinned in favor of our friends and not our enemies.

5. TRAVEL OF AMERICAN CITIZENS ON BELLIGERENT VESSELS

While travel by American citizens on belligerent vessels is not prohibited under international law, such travel is prohibited under the Neutrality Act of May 1, 1937, and practically the same prohibition as is found in the 1937 act is carried in the Senate bill.

Of course, to permit American citizens to travel on belligerent vessels is nothing more nor less than an invitation to get killed. Oh, I know back in 1916, when it was proposed that Americans stay off belligerent ships, that the proposal was rejected on the ground that it would cause us to suffer national humiliation if we denied our citizens the right. Well, we learned a good many lessons in the World War, and today the reasons for denying our citizens this right seem to be so obvious that there is no controversy over this provision.

6. PASSAGE OF AMERICAN CITIZENS AND SHIPS THROUGH COMBAT AREAS

The Neutrality Act of May 1, 1937, contains no prohibition against American citizens and ships passing through combat areas or danger zones, and, as the law now stands, there is no restriction against American citizens and vessels entering these areas or zones, as under international law this is permitted unless the ship happens to be destined for a blockaded port. The Senate bill prohibits American citizens and American ships entering combat areas and danger zones.

American vessels can, of course, carry goods to neutral nations. The carriage of goods to neutrals will, in many cases, lead us into waters infested with submarines and other crafts of destruction. And we know just what will happen if our vessels and citizens are permitted to enter these waters. Our vessels will be destroyed and our citizens killed, and the first thing we know we will be right back into another foreign war. Oh, I know we like to talk about our rights as a Nation, and this, that, and the other, but common sense ofttimes tells you that under some circumstances it is the part of wisdom to refrain from exercising some of your rights; and when our national safety is at stake, it behooves us to forego some of our rights, provided we do not compromise our national honor and integrity, if by so doing we will promote the national safety and security.

CONCLUSIONS AS TO THE BILL

The questions involved in the Senate bill are as great and momentous as any ever considered by the Congress. They involve the peace and security of our Nation and hence affect every man, woman, and child who lives under the flag. While I realize the provisions in the bill are a far-reaching departure from the accepted rules of international law under which we have conducted our foreign relations, with a few exceptions, all down through the years; while I realize we are surrendering, for the time being, certain accepted rights we have as a Nation; while I realize we are subjecting our shipping interests and export industries to huge losses; while I realize that we are subjecting ourselves to the criticism from those whose false national pride will cause them to view our action as a national humiliation; looking at these questions from the standpoint of our national interest and welfare—from the standpoint of the peace, happiness, and security of our people—I am persuaded the bill should receive the favorable action of the Congress, because its passage will tend, at least, to lessen our chances of becoming involved in the European conflict and to this extent aid in maintaining American peace. Peace, my friends, is cheap at any price short of our national honor and integrity and I see nothing in the bill that either reflects upon or jeopardizes the honor and integrity of this Nation.

To those who seemingly view with alarm the discretionary powers vested under the terms of the bill in the President, may I say that the discretionary powers have been reduced to the minimum, that in the very nature of things it is necessary that certain discretionary powers be vested in the President, and that the American people should be thankful, yea, grateful to a kind Providence for placing at the head of this Government, during these days of stress, a man whose "ways are the ways of peace," and whose every effort has been to keep Old Glory floating over a Nation at peace with God and man.

SOME OTHER THINGS WE SHOULD DO IN ORDER TO INSURE PEACE

But in addition to passing the Senate bill, I am definitely of the opinion that there are other things that we will have to do in order to insure our peace and tranquility.

A. KEEP STRONG MENTALLY

In the first place, we will have to keep strong mentally. We will have to keep our own resistance around normal, or over, so we can withstand the propaganda, much of which will be honest and sincere, some of the seductive and insidious type that will be carried in the press, glut the mails, keep the telegraph wires hot, and fill the air with charges and countercharges. When it comes to propaganda, it takes a strong, clear, healthy mind to separate the gold from the dross.

Then we have got to use a little mentality—horse sense, if you please—in our foreign relations. While many these days seem to assume great knowledge and understanding about international affairs which, of course, are carried on through diplomatic channels, I have always been a little leary about foreign diplomats. My honest opinion is that Bret Harte's observation on the ancient Chinee applies with peculiar force to the foreign diplomat. I can paraphrase his lines and give you a fairly accurate description of what I think of foreign diplomats and foreign diplomacy:

Which I wish to remark—
And my language is plain—
That for ways that are dark
And for tricks that are vain
The foreign diplomat is peculiar.

Recent and past events in Europe would indicate that the representatives of some of the nations at least possess the spirit of the old-fashioned horse swapper, and are engaged, more or less, in a game of horse swapping. You know the old-fashioned American horse swapper was a cold, calculating chap, whose conscience recognized no moral obligations, whose representations were made to deceive and not to inform, whose agreements and warranties ended with the conclusion of the trade, and whose philosophy of life was pretty well summed up by David Harum when he said, "Do unto the other fellow the way he'd like to do unto you, and do it first." You know, these fellows helped to talk and trick us into the World War by selling us on the idea that we had to fight to save the world for democracy, and then, after the war, after we had gone in and saved the world for democracy, went ahead and drew up a peace treaty that did more to destroy democracy and bring about autocracy and dictatorships than anything ever written on paper. My advice is to stay away as far as possible from these fellows that think one way and talk another.

Now, as a matter of fact, while very few, if any, of us know a great deal about foreign relations, most of us know a great deal about domestic relations, and we know that if we keep our own house in order we can live in peace and tranquillity, because our time will be fully occupied and we will not have time to horse swap around with the other fellow. Oh, I know they tell us that, due to science and invention, world affairs have changed and that we are just one great big family. But, my friends, while science and invention have wrought many changes, there are some things that they have not changed. Neither science nor invention has changed the spirit of the horse trader or altered his philosophy of life, nor the tongues and mental processes of the foreign diplomats. Neither science nor invention has changed the consequences of "butting in," "nosing around," "meddling," and "sticking your finger in the other fellow's business." And, my friends, neither science nor invention has changed the good old American axioms predicated upon common sense, that it is a good idea to "play in your own back yard," "stay on your side of the high board fence," and "never butt into a family quarrel."

I do not mean by this that I am an isolationist. I am not. We cannot live alone. We are not self-sustained. It is necessary for our national economy and well-being that we have intercourse with other nations. This intercourse should be, however, of a friendly, commercial, and business nature and should never lead us to become entangled in their domestic and international rackets and disputes.

And in order to keep our well-founded or ill-founded convictions from getting out of bounds, we are going to need all of our mental strength. While we all have convictions, and some of us pretty strong convictions, as to who is right and who is wrong in the European conflict; while many of us, no doubt, view with alarm the rise to power of those who arrogantly proclaim themselves foes to God and religion; while many of us, no doubt, shudder at the thought that rulers of certain nations are brazenly exterminating the thought, speech, and movement of their people, not only by intimidation but by force of arms, in many cases silencing the opposition by the hand of the assassin; while many of us, no doubt, tremble at some of the larger nations in some cases wiping out smaller nations by force and in other cases bringing them by force under their dominion and power; and while we entertain these views because these doctrines and these policies are contrary to the lofty ideals and purposes upon which our Nation was founded, I cannot believe that these causes—as grave and menacing as they may be—are so impelling, as long as they do not directly affect the Americas, as long as they do not involve our national safety, honor, and integrity, as to cause us to plunge our country into war in an attempt to correct them by the sword, and in so doing bring economic loss—probably ruin—to our national economy, and misery, suffering, and death itself to untold millions of our people.

Then we will need all of our mental faculties to keep our sympathies from running riot. While I know it is but natural for the sympathies of Christian democratic America to go out to those who are in distress, to those who have been wounded and maimed, to those who are sick in body and mind, to those who have been driven from home and country, to those who are hungry and naked, and to those who are gripped by a fear far more terrible than death itself, and that when we contemplate the scene oftimes our sympathies are turned into hate and resentment against those whose wanton butchery and destruction brought about such needless distress and misery and destruction, I say to you that this is no time to let sympathy supplant reason and let our emotions carry us blindly into a strife that sooner or later would visit the same suffering, misery, and distress upon our own people as they minister to their sick and wounded and mourn their departed dead. I yield to no man in sympathetic impulses, my heart ever goes out to those in distress, and I can share the pangs of sorrow with my friends as they go through their "sorrow's crown of sorrows." But because I can sympathize with my friends in death is no reason why, in order to prove that my sympathy is genuine and sincere, I should commit suicide. The sensible thing, the reasonable thing for me to do under such circumstances is to retain my composure, my faculties, so that I can the better administer to their wants and needs after their trials and while they yet linger down in the low grounds of sorrow and distress. The same is true of a nation. This old world has gone through many periods of grief. I doubt if the sun as it makes its daily round has ever failed to light up some stricken area; and as I view the situation today, I am afraid that unless the Divine hand of Providence intervenes, when the present European conflict is over, the sun as it girdles the earth will reveal more destruction, more human suffering and misery, covering a larger area, than its effulgent rays ever shown upon since the decree went forth, "Let there be light."

When that day comes, I hope, I feverently pray, Christian democratic America will still remain intact, even yet the citadel of peace, standing in her might and majesty as a reminder that the teachings of the Master "that my ways are the ways of peace" cannot be flouted by the sons of men. Then I am willing for sympathy to play upon the heart strings of my fellow countrymen, and I know they will respond with true American sympathy and benevolence. Then, my friends, we can render a true service.

B. KEEP STRONG PHYSICALLY

In the second place, we will have to keep strong physically. This means we must keep prepared at all times, on land, on sea, and in the air, to maintain the honor, integrity, and safety of our Republic, and to withstand any attack made by an aggressor nation. In spite of compelling causes you will find that somehow the aggressor nation always thinks that it has the physical power to avenge the supposed wrong. The nation that runs amuck never attempts to wreak its vengence upon its equals or betters. You will find that nations, like men, think it is better "to bear these ills we have than fly to others that we know not of." Probably we will advance to higher ground somewhere down through the ages, but today, whether we want to believe it or not, the only force recognized by the nation, whose leadership seems bent upon running amuck, is physical force. The best insurance policy against insults that would reflect upon our national honor and integrity or against acts of aggression is a strong Army, a strong Navy, and a strong air fleet. Somehow the bully treats his physical superiors with a great deal of consideration. The chip he carries around on his shoulder is for his weaker brother.

C. KEEP STRONG SPIRITUALLY

And, in the third place, we will have to keep strong spiritually. The nation, like the man, that leaves God out of its life loses all sense of proportion. Christian nations see clearer, think straighter, and act saner than those nations that leave God out of their counsels.

What the American people want—yea, what the people of all the nations want above everything else—if they could but give true expression to their feelings, is peace. And as paradoxical as it may sound, while we abhor war and love peace, we go on as soon as one war is over preparing for another, without giving any real thought, time, or attention to the spiritual force that can alone bring peace. We enter into Kellogg peace pacts, alliances, and hold economic and disarmament conferences, ever leaving vacant at the council table of the nations the seat of the only diplomat capable of working out an alliance among the nations of the earth that will usher in the golden era of peace. When that vacant seat is filled by the Prince of Peace, then and not until then, may we look for peace. May God speed that day. Until it arrives may America walk close to God.

The Arms Embargo

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EARL R. LEWIS

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, October 19, 1939

POEM BY GRACE MARIE PIPER

Mr. LEWIS of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, the proposal to lift the embargo on arms, ammunition, and implements of war has stirred this country as few measures in my memory have done. It is, of course, known to all of us that this subject is a matter of discussion wherever people meet. It is not so well known that the children in schools are discussing and writing about this matter, and I was considerably surprised to receive yesterday a letter from a little girl, 14 years of age, containing a poem addressed to her high-school class, of Bethesda, Ohio, the subject being On Lifting the Embargo.

As an example of what the children in schools are thinking on this subject, I am glad to present this poem by Grace Marie Piper, of Bethesda, Ohio, to the Members of Congress. The poem is as follows:

ON LIFTING THE EMBARGO

(By Grace Marie Piper, 14 years of age; addressed to her class in Bethesda, Ohio, High School)

I hope the class will listen to me
As I speak on the subject of neutrality.
If we want to stay neutral, we must keep on our shore
And sell no munitions to countries at war.

If we lift the embargo, and ship powder and lead,
We should feed their poor orphans and bury their dead.
We should carry their wounded from fields where they lie
And hear the sad moans of the boys as they die.

We can use their "blood money" to buy butter and bread,
And eat to their blind, their maimed, and their dead.
We can destroy their churches, their homes, and their schools—
Certainly our embargo lifters are either traitors or fools!

If we lift the embargo, we're helping Stalin the "Red,"
Who expects to rule the world when civilization is dead.
Will our good-neighbor policy furnish a shell
That will black-out civilization and sink it in hell?

Leif Ericson's Challenge to This Age

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ALEXANDER WILEY

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, October 20 (legislative day of Wednesday, October 4), 1939

ADDRESS BY HON. ALEXANDER WILEY, OF WISCONSIN, BEFORE LEIF ERICSON SOCIETY, CHICAGO

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an address on Leif Ericson, delivered by me on October 9, 1939, before the Leif Ericson Society, of Chicago, Ill.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

In evaluating any life that has been lived on earth, we cannot simply tell of the deeds and the accomplishments which were wrought by that life; rather we must ask ourselves what is the meaning of this life to this period in which we live; what are the lessons to be learned from that life; what stimulus and courage can we get from recounting the incidents of that life.

I have just returned from the Land of the Midnight Sun. My own parents were born in Norway. My mother was 3 years old when her parents decided to emigrate to America. I had the privilege of visiting her old home, located on the side of a mountain out in Gausdal, which is an offshoot of Gubrandsdalen. I had also the rich experience of visiting my father's home, located by the side of Numedals-Logan in Numedal. For many years I had a longing to see Viking Land—this summer that longing was partially satisfied. I'm going back again sometime.

As we sailed up Bergensfjord in the steamship Venus, my mind went back to the days when probably out of this same stretch of water Leif Ericson and other Viking spirits, in their open boats, sailed back and forth between Iceland and Norway. These restless spirits were interested in knowing what was beyond their realm of knowledge, so they sailed forth across unknown seas (Undres mig paa hvad jeg faar et sae over de hoij fjelde). There was an inner urge to go forth to accomplish, to discover. They were explorers—exploring the unknown. On my trip back home just a few weeks ago our boat sailed north of the Shetland Islands, then southwest between the Shetland Islands and the Faeroe Islands. We were practically as far north as Iceland. We were then on those seas that Leif Ericson sailed over in the year 1000 when he reached Norway in his visit from Greenland.

You and I will remember that it was in the year 1000 that he embraced Christianity. It was also in that year that he returned to Iceland from Norway. In about the year 1000 or 1003, Leif Ericson set sail for Vineland and the best historians agree that Vineland is America and that Leif Ericson spent a winter on American soil. He reached Cape Cod and built a house. A year later he returned to Greenland, later on other Viking discoverers sailed to America.

We do not know the exact date of Leif Ericson's death—it has been put between 1020 and 1025; we do not know the date of his birth. After all, such dates are insignificant anyway. What men do, what they stand for, what they contribute to their day and generation and the ages to come, is what lives after them.

The voyages of Leif Ericson and others, as they were chronicled (and we must remember, in that period that Iceland kept the candle of Christianity lighted and was the center of intellectual growth in Europe) gave impetus to the discovery of America by Columbus in 1492. So today, more than ever before, the things that America does and America stands for will determine the course of world history tomorrow.

What is the meaning of this life to this period in which we live?

Let us realize that Leif Ericson became a Christian. What did that mean? Until he went to Norway in the year 1000 he believed in the old Norse gods, the gods of force, but when he went to Norway he came in contact with the doctrines of the Nazarene. He was a man who sailed the seas in an open boat, the boat was propelled by force of wind and oars; the boat at most probably was not over 50 or 60 feet long. He lived up among the icebergs; he knew the ruggedness of Iceland and the rugged fjords of Norway—Nature in the rough; yet, into his soul came the light of Him who taught, "Love one another," who taught that life was continuous; that the greatest man was he who was the greatest servant; that is, the greatest giver.

Into this rugged soul of Leif Ericson there was lodged the dynamic thought that "God is love," not brute force. Into his being came the tremendous preachments of the Old and New Testaments that "In Him (God), we live and move and have our being," and into this man's great heart came the direction to "Feed my sheep."

As he sailed the wild wastes of water; as he conquered with his little skiff the mountain-high waves; as he at night, while ever sailing on and on, contemplated the starry heavens, something of the meaning, something of the import of these new teachings gripped every fiber of his being. And when he returned to Iceland he saw to it that the people there embraced Christianity.

Then, as he heard rumors of another land beyond Greenland, the Viking spirit in him still dominant sent him forth in this search for undiscovered lands. His discovery in Norway in the year 1000, of the new teachings undoubtedly gave impetus to the thought that there were undiscovered lands to the westward.

So now, from this great character we can learn that great men and people do not stay in a rut. In his day there must have been those who said, "Do not embrace this new religion; do not sail westward; do not explore into the unknown."

Leif Ericson apparently heeded none of their admonitions—he was an explorer. Oh how we need his type today. The world is hungry for men who will reach out and find new continents, men who will dare to get out of the ruts, men who will seek to find solutions to our many, many problems, including that of war. And around us we hear people say there are no more frontiers. Why, my friends, that argument was used against Leif Ericson. There were those who said "Our concepts of the religion of Thor are adequate for us," but he reached out and found a new dynamic faith which gave him added courage, added vision, added incentive, to venture forth to explore. In my opinion human beings haven't touched the outer garment of the knowledge that is to be found. Our Edisons, our Wright brothers, our Franklins, were Leif Ericsons in their field. There are a million frontiers yet to be crossed in every realm of human knowledge. If Leif Ericson were on earth today he would accept the challenge that presents itself to America and the world, the challenge to find a solution to war.

Undoubtedly he would also accept the challenge that exists in this land because of our pseudo politicians to find a solution to our capital-labor problem.

I believe also, if he were alive today, he would tackle the problem of ever-increasing centralization of power—the road to fascism and nazi-ism and communism.

To fully appreciate this leader one must realize, as I have said before, that Iceland in his period was the intellectual oasis of the western world. Here a university existed; here learned churchmen kept alight the things of the spirit; here saga writers delineated adventure and romance and discovery; here thinkers reveled in the realm of thought. So Leif Ericson represented in the year 1000 to the day of his death the mentally alert people of the western world.

What are the lessons to be learned from this life? We have already partially answered that question.

We, as citizens of the New World, the world that he discovered, cannot lie down and say there are no new worlds or things to discover. We cannot quit life before we have lived it. In this age when the world is afire, when war once more strikes at America, we can, at least, learn from his life the need of developing fearlessness, courage, and the desire to do something constructive. When Leif Ericson was filled with the spirit of the Master he was not simply satisfied with getting that truth himself, he disseminated it wherever he went, he became a great giver; he followed in His footsteps.

We in this country are disciples of democracy. You and I were handed this thing we call democracy; you and I were given this citizenship which we call American; we did nothing to create it, but now, in the spirit of Leif Ericson, let us accept the challenge to do something to preserve it, let us become explorers, and, if necessary, sail on uncharted seas to preserve the heritage that is ours—Christianity and liberty.

In the last session of Congress I introduced a resolution for an amendment to the Constitution, which provided as follows:

"The Congress shall have power to declare war when the United States or any of its Territories or possessions have been invaded, or are in immediate danger of invasion, and when any part of the Western Hemisphere has been invaded by, or is in immediate danger of invasion by, the forces of any non-American nation, and shall have power to declare war in other cases only if a majority of those persons voting in a national referendum, held in such manner as the Congress shall by law provide, shall vote in favor of such declaration of war."

You will notice that this proposed amendment provided an added check on war. Jefferson, when he wrote into the Constitution that Congress alone should have the power to declare war, said that he had put a check on the dogs of war. In my joint resolution you will notice that I place a double check on the dogs of war. In other words, I said except in thoses cases above enumerated, before Congress would declare war there must be a referendum favoring war, and even this did not compel Congress to declare war—it would only be a direction.

I believe America should be the lighthouse keeper. The business of a lighthouse keeper is to keep the light burning. It is not the business of a lighthouse keeper to go out and attend to the wrecks. He must keep the light burning so that when the navigators of ships look for the light it will be there. If Europe "goes to pot," it is not our business to "go to pot" with her. It is our business to keep the light of democracy burning, so that in the years that are ahead stricken people everywhere will be able to see the glory and the worthwhileness of democratic principles. If we keep our thinking straight, America will not get mixed up in any future wars.

Speaking in the Storting at Oslo, in August 1939, I said:

"I had not intended to speak, but when it was suggested by the chairman of our delegation that I say a few words I was especially happy to comply with that suggestion for two reasons:

"First, there was a sentimental one. I wanted to speak from the rostrum of the Storting. My parents came from this land. They have both gone on ahead in the journey. If they were alive they would be happy to see me, a representative of America, in their own homeland.

"My first reaction was not to speak, because I remembered that on one occasion one of the great statesmen of this country over a century ago, in the great international crisis when Napoleon was stirring up affairs in Europe, said in response to an inquiry: 'Nu er det tid til a holde kjeft,' meaning that now it was time to keep your mouth shut. But again I realized that in a meeting of this kind—a meeting of the Interparliamentary Union, the only institution of its kind on earth, dedicated to the perpetuation of parliaments—it was my duty to speak.

"The second reason, then, for my speaking, I have already referred to. It is this: To bring to this body of serious-minded men, many of whom have dedicated their lives to this work; men who have come year after year to the meetings of this organization to exchange their points of view to the end that the great parliamentary systems of the world may be preserved; to preserve the great freedoms of mankind; to bring to this great body a reiteration of the old, old need, a quest for God. It is the supreme need of the hour; Goethe called it 'more light.' Others call it a 'spiritual rebirth.' The history of nations is replete with instances when men and nations returned from their waywardness to find inspiration, courage, vision, guidance, and rebirth in the 'things of the spirit.'

"You men know that integrity of the individual man is the great need of mankind today. You men know that it is the 'great business' of parliaments and of the members thereof not only to pass laws but to provide moral leadership in this changing world."

Leif Ericson was a character who didn't live in the past! he lived in the eternal present. He accepted the challenges of the present and went out to meet them head on. We of this generation should conceive of life as he did, as a thing to be lived, a thing to discover the meaning of. Leif turned on "new lights" that never go out.

Yes, my friends, Browning says, "Life has meaning, and to find its meaning is my meat and drink."

Leif Ericson showed that man here does not live by bread alone; that there was something else to live for besides accumulating material things. He knew that life has meaning, and he was trying to find the answer. He knew that life meant, as one great German thinker said, "to transform into light and flame all that we are or meet with." He knew in his day, as we must know in our day, that while these are challenging times, civilization is not in the death throes but in the birth pains of new life. He had not one idea of a defeatist in him; he conquered defeat and hysteria; he was a smasher of false barriers; he was no underling.

Let each American read and understand the lesson of his life, and there will be no underlings among us. May we, too, continue to seek undiscovered continents of national and international law and order, peace, and good will. Then, like Leif Ericson, we will turn on the lights that never go out.

Business and Taxes

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HARRY FLOOD BYRD

OF VIRGINIA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, October 20 (legislative day of Wednesday, October 4), 1939

ADDRESS BY HON. JOHN W. HANES BEFORE BOND CLUB OF NEW YORK

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the Appendix of the RECORD a most able and informative address made by Hon. John W. Hanes, Under Secretary of the Treasury, before the Bond Club of New York at New York City on October 18, 1939.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

May I say at the outset—and with great sincerity—that I am grateful for this invitation to meet with you at your first fall luncheon. I have never received an invitation I appreciated more. Through personal acquaintance, business experience, and contact in public life, I know the caliber of the men in your group, the significance of your function in our national life, and something of your problems. One reason why I am particularly happy to be here is that it gives me an opportunity to acknowledge the friendship, confidence, and sympathetic understanding which you have shown me during the days of my service in Washington.

By that I do not mean to imply that all of you have been in complete accord with my official record. I do assume, however, that you have allowed me credit for trying to do the best job of which I am capable.

If any virtue is to be attached to that job, it must derive largely from this approach, which is neither particularly original nor particularly complex: I have consistently pursued the policy of insisting that the biggest issue in this country is economic recovery. I have never made a public statement or held a private conference or labored with the Congress without urging the necessity for recognizing economic recovery as a condition precedent to the solution of almost every important domestic problem which our Government has faced during this period. After 2 years of public experience I am more firmly convinced than ever that this is the correct approach to the cure of our domestic ills.

When I left New York for Washington I realized my lack of training in public service. Like thousands of other businessmen tremendously interested in national problems, I had not been in a position to consider them as exhaustively as I should have liked. Moreover, I knew little of the science of politics, its conflicts, its compromises, its prejudices, pitfalls, and animosities.

It did not take long to learn that in the last analysis legislation is compromise—compromise between one point of view and another, compromise between what you want and what you can get. I have been compelled to accept as a fact that there are at least two sides to every public question, and to recognize the inevitable necessity, if progress is to be made, for reconciling viewpoints in common-sense solutions. This very process, however, while stimulating in its exposure to a variety of opinions, likewise impresses with the need for maintaining a clear perspective.

I am grateful for that experience. It has been my good fortune to serve under the leadership of Secretary Henry Morgenthau, Jr., a man blessed with an uncommon supply of common sense. I have never known a more faithful public servant or been associated with a man more sincere in the performance of his duties. There has never been a cloud of doubt in his mind that the open way for national well-being lay over the broad road of economic recovery.

The promotion of national recovery is a task of many aspects. I am not an expert or an economist, but it is plain to me that the root of our problem is unemployment. We have several million people in this country today wanting to work and finding nothing to do. Their idleness is not only subtracting from the productivity of the Nation but is causing a heavy drain on the resources of those at work in the form of great expenditures for relief and public-works programs. The cost of our unemployed to the economy of the country is conservatively estimated at more than $20,000,000,000 annually.

We must face and solve this problem both publicly and privately. These millions must either be fed and clothed or put back to work. They cannot be ignored. There has never been in any country a dictator whose origin did not date back to a condition where faith in existing government was gone, where standards of living had collapsed, and men were hungry. Hungry men are the raw material out of which dictators are made.

The primary solution of this problem must lie in the increase of industrial production—the creation of additional national wealth. This can result only from the maintenance of conditions under which private enterprise may make reasonable profits. Profits earned by business, or the prospects of profits to be earned, form the basis for attracting additional credit resources and investment by the public. It is imperative that we direct every effort toward encouraging investment in enterprises which will provide employment.

In this connection not the least of the factors to be considered is that it has been estimated that the investment in plants of industrial companies decreased from approximately $41,000,000,000 in 1929 to approximately $32,000,000,000 in 1937. Under more normal circumstances, plant account should have grown at least $1,000,000,000 per annum during that time, or to a total of, roughly, $48,000,000,000.

May I also point out that it is estimated that the sum of approximately $7,000 of capital assets, such as land, buildings, equipment, and tools, is required to put one man to work. We have approximately 600,000 young men and women each year coming into our employment stream as candidates for jobs. To put these 600,000 people to work we require, therefore, new investment in capital goods at a minimum rate of $4,200,000,000 annually.

Your group should have no sympathy with the view sometimes expressed that we are suffering from a matured economy; that our economic frontiers have disappeared; that there is not ample room in the national economy for new investments in enterprise. We would be sad, indeed, if we found this restricted philosophy accepted. It reflects upon the genius of American science and upon the drive and ingenuity of our people; it is inconsistent with our insatiable demand for an ever higher standard of living; it is repudiated by the achievements of the past and the prospects of the future.

Well do I recall many years ago when I left North Carolina to enter college. The only fabricated wearing apparel known at that time and for 6,000 years prior to that time was of wool, silk, linen, and cotton. Yet in the space of one generation a new fiber has been discovered in a chemical laboratory known as rayon. This new fiber, made from wood pulp, has revolutionized the textile business of the world.

Some time ago I listened to Mr. Kettering, of General Motors, talking to a group of Congressmen and telling them of some 50 items which the research departments of our great industrial organizations have perfected to the point where immediate manufacture is possible. I call your attention to just a few of these developments: (1) Fabrication of silk hosiery from coal; (2) manufacture of wool, not from sheep but from cow's milk; (3) processing of a product resembling glass from wood fiber; (4) manufacture of fireproof cloth from glass; and, lastly, effective coverage of the great field of temperature control in both winter and summer by the same system of heating and cooling.

It should be tremendously encouraging to all of us to know that on the picket line of our civilization there are men like Kettering lighting the fires of ambition and research, stimulating the machinery of private enterprise, and broadening the fields for new investments in the products of American genius. Equally imperative, if less spectacular, must be the drive to bring to all of our citizens more of the products already available to some—better food, better transportation, better housing, better clothing—through increased production at reasonable prices.

We all realize, of course, that the solution of our economic problem cannot be achieved by any single expedient or in any single field. But, in my opinion, one of the important ways in which the Federal Government can contribute effectively to industrial development, reemployment, and economic recovery is through a fair and intelligent tax structure. Taxes may be prosaic in discussion, but they are vital in action.

We now have the most powerful Federal tax system in the history of the country. Including the pay-roll taxes, in the fiscal year 1938 we collected a total of more than $6,200,000,000. There are six main sources of this revenue. They are: (1) Individual income tax, (2) corporation income tax, (3) customs duties, (4) estate and gift tax, (5) excise or sales taxes, and (6) social-security taxes. The largest single source of revenue to the Federal Government is the so-called excise- or sales-tax group.

Prior to going to the Treasury I had never studied the tax problems of the country from the viewpoint of the tax collector. I had, however, become somewhat conscious of one or two problems from the standpoint of the taxpayer. From the standpoint of both, it seems to me, a sound tax policy must be based on three fundamental objectives: First, it should produce the necessary revenue; second, with the least injury to the taxpayers and the national economy; and, third, with the least trouble and expense to both taxpayer and Treasury. To the extent that our present tax system fails to reach these objectives, or sacrifices these objectives for others, it should be revised.

One thing is indisputable about the present tax system. Notwithstanding the enormity of its yield, it does not produce the necessary revenue.

Thus we are brought immediately to these questions: Does it operate in the manner best calculated to foster the national economy? Does it contain elements which, if removed, would at the same time promote the national economy and maintain or increase the tax yield? Can the yield be increased without serious impairment of the economic structure?

In considering these questions it is obvious that we must bear in mind three known factors of outstanding importance: (1) That until a relatively short time ago business was lagging; (2) the shrinkage of industrial plant account; (3) the shortage of venture capital. To the extent that our national tax system contributed or now tends to perpetuate any of these factors it should be changed.

I think the Treasury has already made some contribution in the right direction, both psychological and material, and that that contribution has been reflected in recent business improvement. As you know, the Congress at the last session enacted the Revenue Act of 1939, embodying various revisions of our tax legislation. Without attempting to detail these changes, I will refer briefly to some of the more important, as follows:

(1) The amendment permitting corporations and individuals to deduct their net operating business losses incurred in 1 year from their profits in the succeeding 2 years. This should be of particular help to new enterprises and the capital-goods industries, ordinarily subject to wide fluctuations in earnings.

(2) The repeal of the undistributed-profits tax and the substitution of a flat tax on corporations with net income over $25,000, and a lower graduated tax on those with smaller income.

(3) The amendment allowing corporations to deduct their net long-term capital losses from the year's ordinary income.

(4) The liberalization of the interrelated capital stock and excess-profits tax provisions, so as to eliminate the uncertainty and inequity theretofore attendant upon the necessity of accurately forecasting business profits for 3 years in advance under penalty of payment of increased taxes.

(5) The liberalization and clarification in various respects of the provisions of the law relating to exemption from taxation on corporate reorganizations.

(6) The amendment permitting corporations in unsound financial condition to scale down their debts or to repurchase their obligations at less than face value without tax liability.

By administrative regulation Secretary Morgenthau has put into effect a program of decentralization in tax administration, by virtue of which disputes now may be settled locally, without the expense and inconvenience of going to Washington.

Much remains to be done, if the abnormal circumstances abroad do not prevent their being accomplished. Recognizing this need, the House of Representatives, before adjourning its regular session, instructed a subcommittee of the Ways and Means Committee to make a thorough study of internal-revenue taxation.

With the approval of Chairman DOUGHTON, of the Ways and Means Committee, and Chairman JERE COOPER, of the subcommittee, we have asked more than a thousand leaders in industry, labor, commerce, banking, and agriculture to give us their suggestions. In requesting this help, we have offered them informal private hearings before the Treasury staff assigned to compile a record of public tax opinion; and digests of these hearings will be presented to the Ways and Means subcommittee. We have received many sincere and helpful suggestions. I shall not undertake to enumerate the range of these suggestions, except to say that they cover vast fields of the explored and the unexplored.

What disposition will be made of these suggestions which have come in, and are coming in, I cannot, for obvious reasons, predict at this time. The Treasury recommendations I hope will be framed in the light of the considerations to which I have already alluded.

A few minutes ago I referred to abnormal circumstances abroad. It is inevitable today that you and millions of our people are thinking in terms of the effect of the war in Europe or its settlement not only upon our domestic economy but upon our country and our immediate personal welfare. We all remember the chaos that occurred in 1914 upon the advent of the World War. It should be some comfort to all of us to contrast the economic shock of 1914 with the relative economic equanimity with which we met the shock of September 1, 1939. In 1914, our Government was utterly unprepared. I think it can be truthfully said that your Government, before September 1 of this year, had rendered by its preparedness an incalculable service to its citizens. For months, before Poland was invaded, we had been working diligently in Washington to cushion the system of this country against the economic dislocations of a European war.

It is interesting to recall that in September 1938 at Munich when the war clouds began to look ominous, the markets, in memory of what happened in 1914, took a nose dive, and again in April of 1939, when the war again looked imminent, fears of collapse appeared and there was another drastic decline in values. Rarely have we seen a more complete reversal of business sentiment than that which occurred in September of this year. You know the story. People went about their business as usual. The Stock Exchange remained open. There were no panic-stricken citizens pounding on the closed doors of avenues of credit. People spoke of an epidemic of confidence, instead of a scourge of collapse.

In spite of the recurring and depressing fears of war in our national psychology, we were already in a period of expanding recovery before the first gun was fired. It seems to me that we have tended to overlook the upsurge that was taking place, and have been disposed to attribute to war an abnormal proportion of the advance that has occurred. I think that we were on the road to economic recovery prior to Poland. Let's look at the facts:

Business activity showed a strongly rising trend. Moreover, there were further improvements in prospect, due, among other things, to the outlook for an early and rapid increase in automobile production, a rebound in crude oil production, and the probability of replenishment of inventories owing to the low levels to which they had been reduced.

In August the Federal Reserve Board index of industrial production had risen to 102, as compared with a low of 92 in April and May. The further rise to about 110 in September was due only partly to the effects of the war. In fact, the level of business activity at the time the war broke out, as shown by the New York Times index, was already sharply higher than the average August level; railway traffic was rapidly increasing; steel activity was rising; the automobile companies were calling for delivery of a large volume of steel products contracted for earlier in the year; electric power production was establishing new all-time highs.

As I have pointed out, the situation in the automobile industry, with indications pointing to a more active demand for cars than in the fall of 1938, was an important factor lending strength to the business prospect. It is significant, therefore, that despite the curtailment of export demand for passenger cars due to the war the industry has reached an output of 75,000 units per week about 3 weeks earlier than in 1938.

All this data points to the conclusion that the present up-swing has not come directly from war psychology and should not be wholly divested of domestic factors, which we may truly claim were developing a clearer and more constructive perspective before our path was clouded with the confusion and conflict of arms.

I think it is safe to say that whether or not the war continues for some time industry is going to require new capital. The utilities, for example, may require perhaps twice as much in some instances as they had planned a few months ago. The machinery for handling this corporate financing is here, and I know it is ready to perform the task. We realize the value of your contribution to the economy in this crisis, and the Treasury is ready to help in every possible way. Speaking a moment for the Bureau of Internal Revenue, may I say that in times gone by you have been most excellent customers. I hope the time will not be too far removed when we can count on you more regularly every March 15.

Just one further observation: You will remember the severe headache that we had in this country following the close of the last war, when we had a tremendous rise in all prices, which terminated suddenly, and the demand for everything ceased so abruptly. It is just this shock that I think our business leaders of today are trying to avoid when published reports from all parts of the country state that manufacturers in basic industries are not going to advance prices in response to a speculative war psychology.

I believe that experience has taught us in this country to expand the economy on a broad, flat basis without getting ourselves on a pinnacle of price levels which will inevitably lead to another collapse.

What the future has in store for our country I make no effort to prophesy. Neither you nor I can penetrate this veil. We must trust to the sound common sense of the American people and appeal to the innate fairness and justice that underlies all differences of calling, class, party, or creed, and which in every hour of national crisis makes us realize more fully the meaning of being able to say, "I am an American citizen."

May I say again how happy I am to return to this city and take part in this reunion with friends and former associates. I shall never cease to be grateful for my experience here, and, likewise, I shall never cease to be grateful for the opportunity of spending 2 years in the nerve center of my Government. I wish government could spend more time with you and you more time with government. I am confident this exchange of scholarship would develop a more cordial and sympathetic understanding between the two.

Effect in Oregon of Reciprocal-Trade Agreements

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. RUFUS C. HOLMAN

OF OREGON

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, October 20 (legislative day of Wednesday, October 4), 1939

ARTICLE FROM THE OREGON VOTER

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. President, I request unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an article, published in the Oregon Voter of October 14, which pertains to trade agreements and their effect in Oregon.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Oregon Voter of October 14, 1939]

TARIFF TREATY RECIPROCATES IN REVERSE

Senator C. H. Zurcher, of Wallowa County, saw something on a recent trip that convinced him our lumber industry is not the only great Oregon industry that was sacrificed to the buy-British treaty negotiated by the Roosevelt administration under authority of Congress to be without confirmation by the United States Senate.

He was passing through Pasco and found in that vicinity there were some 6,300 Canadian calves, weighing about 250 or 300 pounds each, that were being fattened for the American baby-beef market by being fed Argentine corn and East Indian molasses. A small duty had been paid on the import of the calves, but Argentine corn delivered was cheaper at Pasco than Iowa corn could be shipped to the same locality, and the ships from the Orient also brought molasses from the East Indies cheaper than our own sugar wastes could be obtained. So long as we are paying American wage rates to workers in our domestic transport, and so long as the costs of agriculture continue high as a result of our efforts to maintain something like an American standard of living on our farms that pay high taxes for our public schools and old-age pensions, America finds it difficult to compete with producers where standards are lower, especially when their products are brought to our ports in foreign ships which are operated at far less costs than those forced on American ships to sustain American standards.

On top of this, we open the gate for more interchange of trade with Canada, for the supposed benefit of our own industry, and find that the commodities which come into our country as a result of this interchange are products, such as cattle, which we already are producing ourselves. The suspicion that all is not well with the reciprocal treaty would appear to have enough foundation to justify the efforts being made by our Senator HOLMAN and Representative ANGELL to have the subject opened up for inquiry.

To sacrifice Oregon lumber, livestock, and agriculture to the national interest may be justified if the Nation is benefited. But to sacrifice them without a compensating benefit to the national economy is something else. We would like to know more of these supposed benefits, if there are such, before we settle down to expire uncomplainingly under the sacrifice.

What War Really Means to Animals

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HOMER D. ANGELL
OF OREGON
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, October 20, 1939

Mr. ANGELL. Mr. Speaker, on April 27 last I made some observations in this body addressed to the question, Should America take sides in European wars? My conclusions were then, and I am now of the same opinion, that America should maintain a strictly neutral position; that we should mind our own business, hold aloof from European entanglements, and not take any position that ultimately may lead us to war. Once started down the war road, there will be no turning back. We cannot be half in and half out of this war. We must go in all the way or keep all the way out. As has been so well said, we cannot be the arsenal for one of the belligerents without being the target for the other.

If we should repeal the embargo on arms and munitions, which has now become our fixed foreign policy, we are giving up a neutral position for a partisan one to help one of the parties in the present conflict. The avowed purpose of the repeal of the embargo is to aid one side of the conflict. As I observed on April 27, there is one thing that has caused more heartache and misery in the world than any other, and that is war. The sole objective of war is destruction. Brute force is its mainspring; the dead and the maimed are its harvest. It not only bankrupts nations in their material welfare but it robs them as well of all spiritual values. It not only sets nation against nation but breeds in the hearts of men hate and the desire to destroy and tear down. It never builds; it never ennobles. Worst of all, its fruitage is the death and maiming of the young manhood of the country. It feeds not upon the old and the maimed but devours the flower of the youth of the country, and leaves the living impoverished, sickened, and spiritually weakened for generations, and cast its spell and its burdens upon generations yet unborn.

If we should repeal the embargo and take sides in this conflict, and if this first step toward war should lead to the ones which logically will follow—namely, participation by credits and ultimately by sending our soldiers abroad—we should provide, so far as is humanly possible, to protect not only our armed forces, but we should not overlook the fact that many animals are sacrificed at the same time. The American Humane Society has recently called attention to the part played in the tragedy of war by these dumb animals. I take the liberty, with the consent of the House, of including the statement of this association as a part of my remarks, with the hope that suitable provision will be made to heed the admonitions advanced by this great humane association for the protection of these dumb creatures.

The statement follows:

WHAT WAR REALLY MEANS TO ANIMALS

While many painters have pictured the panoply of war in a spirit of glorification, a few have shown it as it really is. Landseer gave a remorseless rendering of the horrors of war, dead troopers, dying frantic horses, flames and smoke all bearing eloquent testimony to the havoc and madness of battle. There are others, such as Schreyer's Abandoned, and Barker's painting of Napoleon at Bassano with death all around and one lone dog watching over its dead soldier master.

War cannot be made humane to animals or men. Clara Barton wrote in 1900:

"Among the shocking and heartrending scenes of the battlefield the screams of the wounded horses lingered more painfully in my ears, if possible, than the moans of the wounded men. * * * They die slow and hard if left to themselves, and I myself have seen the vultures hovering and tearing at them while life yet remained."

In the Crimean War horses died of starvation, fatigue, and exposure. In the Franco-German War (1870–71), following the surrender of Sedan—

"The starving horses had gnawed off everything, even the bark of trees. Many * * * were in a piteous condition between the houses and walls, motionless, awaiting death by hunger; half broken down, some sat on their haunches, others licked the slime at their feet, and many had sunk down in harness by the carts. * * * Carcasses of horses lay in the morass. * * * It was a hell on earth." (Major General Maurice, C. B.)

If that be viewed as ancient history, being 70 years ago, let us come to the beginning of the present century—the Boer War. Here is what a soldier in hospital told a London reporter, as published at the time:

"I think I pity the horses more than I do the men. Poor beggars. You see 'em all gashed and torn and reeking with blood and staggering as though they can hardly carry their riders; but you know a man ain't going to part with his horse while the horse can carry him and he's under fire."

And here is a horrible recital concerning the horses in General French's forced march to Kimberley:

"Had you seen those bags of bones looming through the twilight it would have startled you no less than it did me and would have brought before you * * * the horrors of war * * *. The less decrepit among this awful band of skeletons had been back from the front about a month. * * * If it be true that for 50 hours the horses of the force had to continue their march without nourishment, no wonder they fell down to die by the roadside in hundreds, or that the great deed of the relief of Kimberley was costly to a degree that makes one shudder for very pity for the poor animals that had to be sacrificed. * * * I care not to call up the remembrance of those angular, almost transparent frames and tottering limbs. Of the whole 600, only 4 could be found against whose hoof numbers one could write 'fit for service.'"

Julian Ralph, Daily Mail war correspondent, wrote these passages:

"In battle their legs are snapped off, their bodies torn, and their heads shattered, and there is nothing to do but to leave them to the aasvogels, as the vultures are called. There is no time in battle to shoot them. * * * Of all the pitiful, heart-rending scenes I have ever seen, none had compared to this view of hundreds upon hundreds of dead and dying horses on this hundred miles of war's promenade * * * to see them shattered by shell and then ripped open by vultures, often before they were dead, was enough to snap the tenderest chords in one's breast.

"But the worst horror was to come * * * only 24 hours after the fight at Driefontein. On this field not nearly all the horses were yet dead. As I came up beside the prostrate body of a beautiful steed it would slowly and painfully lift its head and turn upon me a pair of the most pleading, woe-stricken eyes, full of a hunger to know what I could do for it. And all I could do was to drive on, for I had no firearms, even for my own protection, deep in an enemy's country."

Another brilliant war correspondent, Charles E. Hands, presented this picture:

"More pathetic than the sight of the dead horses was the sight of the living ones There were horses that had been hit, horses that had been broken down with overwork and underfeeding, horses with hideous saddle sores hidden by clustering mounds of flies, horses abandoned for every conceivable defect; some horses for whom death had loosened their riders' control, big English horses, unshod Boer ponies, most of them with hip bones that projected so far as to suggest dislocation; and all along by the side of the river, where they found grazing and water, they were wandering about helpless, forlorn, abandoned creatures, who looked at you dubiously, as though they feared you were bringing them more of glorious warfare; and then, seeing you pass, turn listlessly away, and, hanging down their heads, went on with their dejected grazing."

The war correspondent of another London newspaper has written:

"Do not look at the horses as you go to the front. They rarely unsaddle even a cavalry horse, but if you see one with bare back, it is invariably covered with festering sores 6 inches square. Both the horses pulling the heavy artillery pieces through all sorts of impossible places, beaten, clubbed, cursed, and those dying, lacerated, dismembered by the bursting shells, as well as the wretched survivors, ruined by the desperate service, call for infinite pity."

The most graphic and the most horrifying picture of horses on the battlefield is that of Erich Maria Remarque in All Quiet on the Western Front. Here are some extracts:

"The cries continue. It is not men; they could not cry so terribly.

"'Wounded horses,' says Kat.

"It's unendurable. It is the moaning of the world, the martyred creation, filled with terror and groaning.

"We are pale. Detering stands up.

"'God! For God's sake shoot them!'

"He is a farmer and very fond of horses. It gets under his skin.

"The screaming of the beasts becomes louder and louder. * * * Detering raves and yells out:

"'Shoot them! Shoot them, can't you? Damn you again.'

"We see a dark group, bearers with stretchers, and larger black clumps moving about. Those are the wounded horses. Some gallop away in the distance, fall down, and then run on farther. The belly of one is ripped open. * * * The men cannot overtake the wounded beasts which fly in their pain, their wide-open mouths full of anguish. One of the men goes down on his knee, a shot—one horse drops—another. The last one props himself on his forelegs and drags himself around in a circle like a merry-go-round; squatting, it drags itself around in circles on its stiffened forelegs, apparently its back is broken. The soldier runs up and shoots it. Slowly, humbly it sinks to the ground."

All this is terrible reading. But no matter what precautions may be attempted, all war is hell and worse for animals. Build all the hospitals you like; provide all the ambulances that can be used; send a thousand veterinarians to the scene of every battle, and you have today far worse war conditions than in 1900. Today with death-dealing air bombs, perfected cannon, and armies shorn of pity and unmindful of blood, war is worse for humans and animals than it ever was.

Accursed be he who brings war to the world.

Neutrality in Warfare

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WALTER CHANDLER

OF TENNESSEE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, October 20, 1939

LETTER FROM MR. CLOYD LAPORTE

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following letter:

[From the New York Times of October 14, 1939]

NEUTRALITY IN WARFARE—REMOVAL OF ARMS EMBARGO HELD NO BREACH OF INTERNATIONAL LAW

To the EDITOR OF THE NEW YORK TIMES:

Professors Charles Cheney Hyde and Philip C. Jessup in their letters to the Times of September 21 and October 4 have taken the position that the removal of the arms embargo under present circumstances would be a breach of international law. They base their position upon two contentions: (1) that there is a rule of international law which prohibits neutral states from changing their neutrality legislation during wartime if the motive leading to the change is the desire to assist one or more of the belligerents, and (2) that such a desire would be the motivating cause of the adoption of the changes now proposed.

The sole authority which they cite for their alleged rule of international law is the Draft Convention on Rights and Duties of Neutral States in Naval and Aerial War, being a part of the Harvard Research in International Law (American Journal of International Law, vol. 33, supp., July 1939). Professor Jessup was himself the reporter who prepared the draft.

NOT A CONSENSUS

The nature of this as authority should be examined. It is, as its title indicates, a draft of a proposed convention designed to regulate neutrality in warfare. Its publication date is as recent as July 1939. It has not been adopted by any government. It does not appear to represent even the consensus of opinion of existing writers on and students of international law. This appears from the following foreword which accompanies the draft:

"The consideration of the Draft Convention on Rights and Duties of Neutral States in Naval and Aerial War revealed fundamental differences of opinion regarding the general organization of the draft, its underlying theories, and a number of specific rules and principles set forth therein. The research nevertheless presents it, without any implication that the draft as published reflects even a consensus of the members of the advisory committee, hoping that its debates upon the problem may be continued among scholars throughout the world with a view to the further clarification of the subject."

The draft convention consists of a number of articles and appended to each article are pages of "comment." It is from a part of this discussion—the comment on article 13—which Professors Hyde and Jessup quote in support of their alleged rule of law to the effect that any change in neutrality laws made in wartime must not be "the result of a desire to aid one or the other belligerent."

PERTINENT FACTORS

The articles themselves, which purport to state the principles to which some of those engaged in making the draft subscribe, do not state any such principle. The pertinent provisions are in articles 4 and 13. Article 4 reads as follows:

"A neutral State, in the exercise of its neutral rights and in the performance of its neutral duties, shall be impartial and shall refrain from discrimination between belligerents."

Article 13 reads as follows: "A neutral State, for the purpose of better safeguarding its rights and interests as a neutral or better fulfilling its duties as a neutral may, during the course of a war, adopt new measures or alter the measures which it has previously adopted, provided, however, that the new measures adopted do not violate any provision of this convention."

It will be noted that article 4 merely requires that a neutral State "shall be impartial and shall refrain from discrimination between belligerents" and that article 13 expressly recognizes the right to alter measures in wartime. Nothing in the proposed article lays down any test requiring a searching into the motives of the lawmakers in adopting a change of rules. The text of the articles would seem to be complied with when the new or altered measures are applied to all belligerents. In fact, the authors of the draft convention state, in their comment to article 13, immediately before the sentence which is quoted by Professors Hyde and Jessup in their letter of October 4:

"As already indicated in the comment under article 4, the impartiality required of a neutral state is a technical rather than a factual impartiality; the neutral state is under no duty to attempt to equalize conditions thrown out of balance by geographical factors or by the relative power of the contesting parties on the sea, in the air, on land, in supplies of raw materials, or in industrial equipment."

INDEFINITE DOCUMENT

Neither the draft convention nor the comment accompanying it indicates to what particular theories the "fundamental differences of opinion" revealed by the research related. In their letters to the Times Professors Hyde and Jessup indicate that the portion of the comment quoted by them is not merely a "theory" upon which there may be fundamental differences of opinion, but that it is law binding upon all neutral states. Yet, interspersed throughout the comment are references to previous action of neutral states, including the United States, which appear to be contrary to this so-called rule of law. Thus, it is stated:

"Indeed, most of the progress in the development of the law of neutrality from the end of the eighteenth century to the present time has resulted from changes introduced while a war was in progress. Some of these changes have been made and justified on the theory that they were designed merely to make more effective the discharge of a preexisting legal duty, but, as in the case of the laws and regulations adopted by the United States in 1793, there was in reality a progression beyond the point then established in international law."

Also it is said that: "The United States passed and lifted several embargo acts during the French Revolutionary and Napoleonic wars," although it is said that these acts may be justified as retaliatory.

The comment further says:

"It is clear, therefore, that in the course of the American Civil War neutrals made changes in their policies although these changes were not required by the then existing international law and although they operated unequally upon the belligerents."

It would seem, therefore, that the test of impartial motive applied to legislation passed during wartime is by no means a doctrine so generally accepted that it may be called a binding rule of law. Assuming, however, without conceding, that there is such a rule of law, it is submitted that the neutrality bill now before the Senate fulfills the requirements of any such rule.

In the first place, the act would be applicable to trade with all belligerents. If some of the belligerents would not be able to take advantage of its provisions because of geographical or other factors, these are factors which, as the comment above quoted indicates, a neutral state "is under no duty to attempt to equalize."

In the second place, the question of motive is not to be resolved by the opinions which Professors Hyde and Jessup say they hear on every side. There are undoubtedly varying reasons which lead individuals to support or oppose the measure. In a democracy all shades of opinion are freely expressed. It is primarily those responsible for legislation whose reasons are entitled to the greatest weight. Among these is the report of the Committee on Foreign Relations of the Senate accompanying the bill which states its purpose to be "to preserve the neutrality and the peace of the United States and to secure the safety of its citizens and their interests."

The best evidence that the purpose of the legislation is to preserve our own neutrality is to be found in the fact that the repeal of the embargo on arms does not stand alone but is coupled with the imposition of an embargo on shipping and provisions regarding the passage of title and cash payment and short-term credit, which can only operate unfavorably to Great Britain and France.

What is proposed is the repeal of an arms embargo which by itself will operate to the advantage of Great Britain and France, coupled with other drastic provisions which must operate to their disadvantage. Whether the measure will help or harm them in the long run is a question which only the future can answer. The proposed legislation must be considered as a whole.

If there is a rule of law, as contended by Professors Hyde and Jessup, making the motive of proposed legislation determinative of its legality—and the existence of such a rule appears at the least to be extremely doubtful—it is submitted that the neutrality bill meets the requirements of such a rule.

CLOYD LAPORTE.

NEW YORK, October 11, 1939.

Establishment of Permanent American Cemeteries in Europe

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. THOMAS E. MARTIN
OF IOWA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, October 20, 1939

MEMORANDUM FROM THE WAR DEPARTMENT

Mr. MARTIN of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, under permission to extend my remarks in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, I am setting out herein an official memorandum of the War Department describing the policy of the War Department relative to the establishment of permanent American cemeteries in Europe. I believe that this memorandum should be given publication in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD at this time because of the general interest in all problems connected directly or indirectly with the problem of neutrality.

POLICY OF WAR DEPARTMENT RELATIVE TO ESTABLISHMENT OF PERMANENT AMERICAN CEMETERIES IN EUROPE

It is the fixed policy of the War Department, and has been since 1900, after the Spanish-American War, to return all remains of its military dead to the United States for burial in their local private cemeteries or in national cemeteries.

During the World War, as it was impossible to return the remains of deceased soldiers to this country immediately after death, they were interred abroad temporarily, to be shipped to the United States after hostilities ceased. As the war progressed there was a growing sentiment among relatives in this country to let their dead remain where they fell in battle and the War Department began to consider modifying its policy to allow the permanent interment abroad of those soldiers whose relatives so desired. Impetus was given this sentiment by Col. Theodore Roosevelt's request that the body of his son, Lt. Quentin Roosevelt, should remain where it fell, this request being contained in his expression, "Where the tree falls, let it lie," which has become so well known. The War Department then circularized the next of kin of deceased soldiers as to their choice in the matter, and the results showed that nearly 35 percent desired their soldier dead to remain in their original places of burial. (See press release, War Department News Bureau, July 29, 1919.) Available records are not clear as to exactly when this modification of policy was effected.

Organizations had been burying their dead in selected burial plots whenever practicable to avoid isolated graves or small groups of graves. Every precaution was taken to preserve identities and valuable personal effects. Burials were promptly reported to the Graves Registration Service, an organization of the United States Army established to supervise and coordinate field work, establish cemeteries, and concentrate remains therein from scattered burial places. At the cessation of hostilities, on November 11, 1918, there were about 2,400 American burial places in England, France, Belgium, Italy, Russia, and Germany, in which some 77,000 bodies were interred. As it was obviously impracticable to maintain so large a number of cemeteries, it was decided to concentrate the remains, pending final decision as to their disposition, in a smaller number of carefully selected cemeteries in localities where proper care could be given the graves. The number was thus reduced to about 700.

After sentiment had crystallized as a result of the circularization of next of kin, in November 1919, the task was undertaken of returning to the United States the remains of the soldier dead whose return had been requested and providing for the permanent burial of those that were to remain in foreign soil. An organization was accordingly formed, known as the War Memorials Council, for the purpose of selecting suitable sites for permanent American cemeteries abroad. As a result of several trips abroad, and arrangements with foreign government authorities, it was finally decided to provide 6 cemeteries in France, 1 in Belgium, and 1 in England, as follows:

Brookwood American Cemetery, near London, England.
Flanders Field American Cemetery, near Waereghem, Belgium.
Aisne-Marne American Cemetery, Belleau, Aisne, France.
Meuse-Argonne American Cemetery, Romagne-sous-Montfaucon, Meuse, France.
St. Mihiel American Cemetery, Thiaucourt, N-et-M, France.
Suresnes American Cemetery, near Paris, France.
Oise-Aisne American Cemetery, Seringes-et-Nesles, France.
Somme American Cemetery, Bony, France.

The cemeteries of Meuse-Argonne and Suresnes (with the exception of a small parcel of ground for the entrance of the latter) were purchased by the French Government, which granted burial rights therein to the United States in accordance with an agreement between the French Minister of War and the War Department, free of cost to the United States.

The Somme, Oise-Aisne, St. Mihiel, Aisne-Marne, and ground for the entrance of Suresnes Cemetery were established under an agreement between the United States and the French Government which granted perpetual use of the grounds for burial purposes to the United States, for which the United States paid a stipulated price.

The Flanders Field American Cemetery was established in accordance with an agreement between the United States and Belgium whereby the Belgian Government acquired the ground and granted the United States burial rights therein for its soldier dead, free of cost.

The Brookwood American Cemetery, London, England, was established under an agreement between the London Mecropolis Co. and the United States by which the United States was granted burial rights in perpetuity for a stipulated price.

The above agreements were final, and no additional payments from the United States Government are required for the perpetual use of these cemeteries.

The graves-registration service is no longer functioning, and the American cemeteries abroad are maintained, in a similar condition to the national cemeteries in the United States, by the American Battle Monuments Commission, Washington, D. C., which is under the direction of General Pershing, and has a European office in Paris, France. These cemeteries were turned over to the jurisdiction of the Commission by Executive Order No. 6614, dated February 26, 1934, as amended by Executive Order No. 6690, dated April 25, 1934.

There are some isolated graves in various parts of Europe, containing remains left there at the request of the next of kin, referred to as "Do not disturb graves," which are governed by the rules of the cemeteries in which they are located, and over which the War Department has no jurisdiction.

While it would be practicable to remove the remains of soldier dead now interred in Europe and bring them back to the United States, it is not desirable, especially in view of the fact that they were left to rest where they fell at the special request of relatives. The War Department would therefore oppose any agitation leading toward such a move.

A War Boom Won't Help Anybody

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JERRY VOORHIS
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, October 20, 1939

ARTICLE BY LES FINNEGAN

Mr. VOORHIS of California. Mr. Speaker, the time to prevent the growth of a war-trade boom is now. To delay too long may mean that we will lose our chance to prevent the same series of events as took place between 1914 and 1917. Some people object that "there are no war-trade profits now" or that "profits in munitions will be small." If so, then an excess-profits-tax measure would certainly do no harm. But I submit the following article by Les Finnegan appearing in the Washington News for October 13 to recall the inexcusable profiteering that took place during the last war and to point out that nothing has been done as yet to prevent a recurrence of precisely those same conditions.

[From the Washington Daily News of October 13, 1939]

UNITED STATES ECONOMISTS FEAR RUNAWAY WAR BOOM

(By Les Finnegan)

War profiteering, despite fervent hopes expressed recently by President Roosevelt and Attorney General Murphy against its recurrence, would be almost impossible to check now as it was prior to and during the last war, Government and business economists contend.

Surveys of existing profit-control legislation show that there is little to prevent a return of the exorbitant profits which were revealed by congressional investigation after the last war and which disillusioned thousands of Americans in the patriotism of many large corporations.

Government economists, who have long argued that the huge industrial returns of 50 to 150 percent were as potent in effecting American entry into the war as American foreign investments, find practically no prospect of new legislation to reduce the attractiveness of war-boom prices to domestic industry.

Only Representative JERRY VOORHIS (D.), California, they point out, has announced his intention of introducing such a bill, and his, calling for an 80-percent tax on excessive profits, has virtually no chance of passage.

A recent confidential report issued by a nationally known tax-research bureau said: "One of the important observations that the Army and Navy Munitions Board has made in its study of price control is that prices cannot be controlled except where there exists physical control over the goods or services. The problem of enforcement is the one greatest obstacle to the imposition of a ceiling over all prices. The board concedes that there probably never can be established a sufficiently powerful body to control all prices, even if it were desired."

The Government's inability to curb profiteering is pointed out in an analysis of the economic shifts caused by a war economy. "Certain conditions in war, particularly in the early stages, disturb the price structure," the report continues. "Among the things which contribute to this are unusual Government demands, diminished available supply for civilian use, reckless Government buying, high-cost production because of the employment of unskilled workers, increased insurance, interest and tax rates, restriction of essential imports, and inflation of currency."

Another report circulated "privately" to businessmen from a Washington bureau has reinforced the conviction of many Government economists that industry's inevitable interest lies in a war boom as the means of recovering from its 10-year depression.

"Further business gains for 1940 depend largely on the size of war orders, and on continuation of the war itself," the report declares. "If war goes on, as is expected, most estimates are that United States production for 1940 will be the highest of any year since 1929."

JOBS AND ORDERS

Business effect of the cash-and-carry amendment "is bound to be stimulating," the report says. "It means orders and jobs. And that's an influence for repeal of the embargo, despite pious talk about 'blood money.' Of course materialistic motives will be denied and deplored."

The recently recorded 10-year high in industrial activity actuated by a flood of foreign orders is seen as verification of industry's interest in the continuation of the European war, even in America's involvement. And this opinion is held in spite of the warnings of the United States Chamber of Commerce and private industrialists that a war boom, whether the United States were involved or not, would be disastrous because of the post-war depression which would follow war inflation.

Producers of materials essential to military operations have by far the greatest stake in a war boom, it is argued. Despite the fact that Army and Navy experts have testified at congressional hearings that the Government could produce the materials at a fraction of the cost it had to pay to private manufacturers almost nothing has been done toward the establishment of federally owned munitions plants.

STEEL PROFITS

Profits made by several steel producers on Government orders since 1920 were said by the Nye Senate Munitions Committee to have been justified by little less than sheer greed.

In one instance when three major steel firms bid $454 a ton for armor plate, Navy officials estimated that it could be produced at $262 a ton. In 1937 Navy Secretary Swanson denounced bids of $21,000,000 for a floating drydock at Pearl Harbor which the Navy estimated it could build for $12,000,000. In 1931 a gunpowder company's own figures showed a 39-percent profit on Government orders.

The imperative need of immediate legislation to discourage industry from building hopes on war orders is seen by this group of economists in figures revealed a few years ago, which showed 139-percent profits made by one United States steel company just before we entered the World War. Two other steel firms, it was disclosed, made profits of 112 percent and 90 percent.

One Government statistician recalled that one of the records for war inflation was made by an airplane firm, which, starting with a $1,000 investment, listed a $11,437,250 income at the end of the war.

During the war, the argument goes, it may have been necessary for the Government, in its extraordinary need, to pay more than 20 percent of production costs, but there was little justification for it in the post-war years.

PEACETIME PROFITS

Only 3 years ago, it is pointed out, one of the three major steel producers admitted that its bid on Navy armor plate gave it a profit of 58 percent. In the same bidding another producer asked a price that would have given it a 91-percent profit. In 1933, investigation showed, the former firm made 42-percent profit on a Navy contract for turret armor, and then increased its prices $40 and $50 the next 2 years.

Profits on flight indicators for the air forces in recent years averaged 54 percent of cost. One company showed a 93-percent profit on each 14-inch shell; another a 65-percent profit on 12-inch guns and 63 percent on 16-inch guns. The same company, testimony revealed, sold pig iron to the Government on the basis of a $75-a-ton production cost, when the actual cost amounted to $51.

Practically nothing has been done to remedy the profiteering record which the Nye committee characterized as "disgraceful," the advocates of profit control assert.

The committee, these experts recall, after noting that Treasury audits showed profits of 90 percent, declared in its report that it could find no assurance that the companies "would suddenly change their spots in the case of another war."

The spots can be changed, it is argued, only by enactment of strong profit-control legislation similar to that advocated by Representative VOORHIS.

Reciprocal-Trade Agreement With Argentina

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FRED L. CRAWFORD

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, October 19, 1939

STATEMENT OF HON. FRED L. CRAWFORD, OF MICHIGAN, BEFORE THE COMMITTEE FOR RECIPROCITY INFORMATION OCTOBER 17, 1939, OPPOSING THE RECIPROCAL-TRADE AGREEMENT WITH ARGENTINA

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include my statement delivered before the Committee for Reciprocity Information, at a hearing on the proposed reciprocal-trade agreement with Argentina, as follows:

Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, it is with regret I open my remarks with the statement that, insofar as I have been able to observe, men who have been in Congress for many years, those who have been here for only a few years, and those who have been here for only 2 or 3 years, carry an inward feeling that little good does it do for them to appear before this committee. The internal organization of the reciprocal trade agreement making machinery, the baffling problems which the whole program presents, the maze of statistics which one runs into when he attempts to obtain a running review of what has transpired since the approval of the original act, the general upsets to international as well as national trade which have occurred since the inception of the program, the favorable and unfavorable factors which have operated in connection with our trade with both agreement and nonagreement countries, and the bold manner in which the State Department marches forward with the execution of the programs, are, I believe, contributing factors to the general feeling and attitude of the Members of the Congress as well as many others. Let me hasten to remind you, however, that I speak only for one Member of that body—myself. If the general situation was not so grave, I certainly would not appear here and absorb your time. But this, Mr. Chairman, is the only manner in which I can make a direct protest, and through the kindness of your committee I am here.

I am mindful of the fact that these hearings are not conducted primarily for the purpose of discussing policies of Government. The Congress saw fit to enact the law. It is now the law of the land. You are part of the administrative machinery. I sympathize with you in your predicament. As I understand the situation, we are here by invitation to discuss the Argentina trade-agreement proposal. At the same time, Mr. Chairman, I do not know of any machinery whereby we, as Members of Congress and directly responsible to the people, while you are not, can get you up to attend sessions of the House and to hear us talk about the program in its generalities. And having in mind some of the statements made before your committee within the last 48 hours, probably it is just as well for us to take a few minutes to point out in a general way to you, as part of the administrative machinery, our attitude; for if in the minds of the people and the Congress the program does fall, the legislative body may, in response to the people involved, repeal the law, irrespective of its benefits or injuries.

COOPERATION IS LACKING

If the program is to prevail or succeed, it is my frank opinion there will have to be more cooperation between the administrators of the act, the Congress, and the people involved, both in agriculture and manufacturing, than there has been evident in the short period the act has been in operation. From statements which have been made by the Secretary of State, I think we can assume that he feels at times there is great effort being made toward scuttling his program.

Mr. Chairman, with interest and concern I read the State Department press release of August 23, 1939 (No. 339A). I particularly direct your attention to the language which I now quote:

"I believe that a conclusion of the proposed trade agreement with Argentina would represent one of the most outstanding accomplishments under the authority of the Trade Agreement Act, coming particularly at this time, and, indeed, one of the most important accomplishments of this administration in the field of international relations."

Acting Secretary Welles further observed:

"I can think of no better way to promote the good-neighbor policy and the type of relations which it represents than through instruments designed to bring about a mutually profitable increase in trade."

MUST WE PENALIZE OUR FARMERS TO BE A GOOD NEIGHBOR?

Just what did the Secretary mean when he said "coming particularly at this time"? Did the State Department at that moment feel certain war would be declared in Europe? Did the State Department at that hour have in mind that in the event of war generally along the present lines in western Europe, and with the Neutrality Act as it was then in operation, that all of our interests would lie more to the south than they have heretofore? Did the Secretary feel that with Germany at war with England and France, and on account of that situation Germany would not be able to make deliveries of her goods to Argentina and could not operate her ships in the sea lanes to Argentine ports, the hour had arrived for us to strike, and strike hard, and thereby recover some of the trade which we had since 1929 lost to Germany and other European countries who have been more aggressive in consummating with Argentina trade agreements and exchange benefits, giving favors we did not extend?

Just exactly what did the Secretary mean when he said, "I can think of no better way to promote the good-neighbor policy"? What is the circumference of the good-neighbor policy? Where can I, the Representative of the Eighth District of Michigan, with its highly diversified farming and manufacturing, with its farmers generally opposed to the trade-agreement program, and with many of the manufacturers in favor of the program, find an answer to my question? Has the State Department defined the good-neighbor policy in categorical language? If so, will you please inform me where I can find the definition? Does the good-neighbor policy mean that the farmers in my district are to be penalized, specifically so, on sugar, beans, milk products, beef, hides, wool, vegetables, and vegetable and animal oils, fruits, poultry, and poultry products, and furs, and all for the purpose of promoting what—the good-neighbor policy? If they are to be penalized, to what extent? Where is the yardstick for measuring the penalty? If they are to be penalized, who is to be the beneficiary? You propose to go further. Just what attention has the State Department given to the proposition of working out and asking Congress to enact a proposal which will spread the penalties commensurate with the benefits obtained? Exactly what did the Secretary mean when he said "through instruments designed to bring about mutually profitable increase in trade"?

AGREEMENTS HAVEN'T RAISED FARMERS' LIVING STANDARD

The farm people in my district grow the crops I have mentioned. For years these crops have been grown under a protective tariff. The farmers have observed that as one trade agreement after another is consummated the tariff tends to move downward, and we move in the direction of quotas, which are quickly taken advantage of by those countries on the other end of the trade agreement. The farmers in my district are also aware (although they may not be as well technically informed as some) of the great influence on trade which flows from exchange arrangements, blocked currencies, standstill agreements, and the far-reaching arm of government and its policies in influencing consumption requirements along with the means of supplying them. We recognize that countries can retaliate against another country in matters having to do with tariffs imposed. We also recognize that the State Department can, and that it does, as in this case, recommend and proceed to try and undo through a trade agreement something some other country has accomplished by "inside" agreements which it made, for example, with Argentina. Quoting from the press release we find:

"The trade of certain European countries with Argentina has been developing at our expense."

No doubt that is a truthful statement. Now what do we propose to do, offer Argentina a proposition just as attractive, or more so, in a different form perhaps, but sufficiently strong to "pull" their orders back to our factories? And if so, what country will lose the business to us, and just what group of our people will be burdened with the benefits which we extend to Argentina?

Insofar as the labor of these farmers, when measured by the dollar value of the products they sell, is concerned, they do not notice that their standard of living is materially increasing. Naturally these farmers question the finality of the trade-agreement program. They look for the mutuality of benefits. They ask questions. But, Congress having given the State Department a blank check, the representatives of the people can give no clear indication of what the State Department has in mind, to what extent it will go, or what the economic consequences are to be to American agriculture whether in the Eighth District of Michigan or some other area. Such a procedure quite naturally raises grave questions—questions which go directly to the matter of conferring or delegating power, the repeal of that power conferred, the degree of burden that is to be placed on agriculture, and the benefits to manufacturing.

BLIND-FLYING METHOD OF INTERNATIONAL HORSE TRADING

This blind-flying method of arranging international horse trades is unsatisfactory to the victim as well as the legislator. As has been pointed out by Secretary Hull, it may be that the legislator has little opportunity for log rolling, but, the fact remains, as has been so vividly enunciated here the past 48 hours, the Legislature can, if it deems advisable politically, repeal the act and then the particular method of horse trading will have to cease. This will, no doubt, depend very largely on the attitude of the agricultural victim. If the latter is satisfied with results and is willing to suffer the blind-flying method of arriving at those results, probably the legislator will be contented to go along with the satisfied farmer. But, it may be well to take more care in seeing that the farmer is satisfied, with trade agreement results, not just more benefit payments with more foodstuffs being imported.

Mr. Chairman, I am further interested in the statement of the Secretary, where, in the same release, he says:

"The concessions" (referring to the ones we are to give to Argentina) "* * * should, of course, permit an increase in Argentina's exports to this country, but will not have injurious effect upon American production."

That, of course, is the opinion of the Secretary. The important question is: Does the man involved in the transaction—the farmer—agree with that conclusion? I do not think so. It would also appear that the legislative branch of the Government is not in full accord with the conclusions reached by the Secretary.

Further, the Secretary takes the position the trade of certain European countries with Argentina has developed at our expense. To what countries does the Secretary refer? Is Germany included? Does the proposed trade agreement go as far as did Germany in building her trade in peacetimes? Has the outbreak of the war fundamentally changed the situation in the direction of making it unnecessary for the Argentine agreement to be consummated, and this by reason of the disappearance of the keen competition furnished by Germany or England or France or Italy? Can the exact countries to which the Secretary refers now hold the trade which they have taken away from the United States in recent years and at the same time carry out their obligations which war has imposed upon them? When did the United States lose that trade? Why the long delay in proposing the trade agreement with Argentina if the loss of trade was the primary incentive for its making? Specifically, so long as Germany could proceed on her course with Argentina, just what chance did we have of getting the trade through reciprocity? With Germany out of the running, it is now proposed to reach an agreement and claim the credit.

Referring specifically to the table of imports and exports stated on page 167 of the August 26, 1939, bulletin of the State Department, is it not reasonable for us to assume, for all practical purposes, that under the changed conditions due to the war, we may now expect to move rapidly back toward the 1929 import and export volume? We can well understand the conditions that governed from 1929 up to September 1939. But with the greatly changed situation throughout the world, and particularly as it affects Argentina-American relations, why suddenly plunge into the agreement now proposed, and at the specific cost of the American farmer?

The Department may take the position that in the absence of a trade agreement with Argentina at this time, her goods will flow in increasing volume to Europe in the nature of foodstuffs and raw materials to be consumed primarily by warring nations. If Europe supplies the demand for Argentina's goods and can provide the exchange in payment therefor, or, under the stress of war, pay for their imports through shipping back to Argentina the necessary manufactured goods to set off the foodstuffs and raw material imported, then, in that event, how much trade can we pick up with Argentina with the trade agreement in operation, unless we are willing to accept the competitive goods and thus impose the resulting burden, whatever it may be, on our agriculture? If the European countries accept from Argentina her production and pay cash therefor, Argentina could, of course, if she desired to do so, purchase from us and, no doubt, would, to a great extent, if the manufactured goods desired were not forthcoming from Europe or, let us say, Japan. Of course, if we gear our industrial operations to European war demand, sell the goods for cash (gold), or buy back our securities held by Europeans, and let Europe continue the production of peacetime goods for export to Argentina in payment of the imports to Europe from Argentina, that will in no way, as I view the matter, guarantee to us a greatly increased flow of trade with Argentina, although the trade agreement is in operation.

LET US FIRST LOOK AT OUR OWN INTERNAL ECONOMY

It may be out of order technically, to discuss another phase of the program at this particular moment. However, I do wish to submit this observation: While the reciprocal trade agreement program may be the most constructive that has been recommended by anyone during the past few years to bring the international situation back into mesh, we are, I feel, duty bound to first look at its affect upon our internal economy. If we had a sound domestic economy perhaps we would not be so completely entranced by or engulfed in such a trade-agreement program. Will the trade-agreement program largely contribute to a sound domestic economy? If so, how can we best demonstrate the fact it will? Personally, I do not think so. I personally feel that the original philosophy of the trade-agreement program was founded on the fallacious assumption that tariffs are the cause of, and not the effect of unsound economy. I also feel that in this modern world of trade, bilateral trade agreements are not the answer but that we must very largely, if not completely, depend upon multilateral trade relations.

Mr. Chairman, if the committee will bear with me, I desire to quote from a statement recently made by Dr. A. A. Berle, Jr., Under Secretary of State, before Temporary National Economic Committee. His keen observation coming at this time is one, which I personally feel the Committee for Reciprocity Information can well afford to consider. From Dr. Berle's statement I feel one would come to the definite conclusion that the answer to our internal economic troubles does not rest upon the consummation of additional trade agreements as much as they may appeal to those in charge of the administrative procedure. I briefly quote Dr. Berle:

"Beneath the highly technical title of 'capital credit' there is really concealed a tremendous issue. It serves no useful purpose not to state that issue with some bluntness, in spite of the fact that to so state it tends to antagonize a good many interests. Briefly, the private financial system as at present constituted does not work. It has, accordingly, to be supplemented by vast amounts of Federal credit which make up in some measure, but inadequately, for the difficulties in the existing system of private finance. Use of Federal credit by providing relief and by taking care of certain necessary social requirements through public works in a limited field does keep the economic machinery of the country running; but it is not a permanent solution. There is always the danger that the time may come when an economy so organized will reach the end of its tether. We should be getting about the process of reorganization now, instead of leaving it for the more violent processes which always occur when the country is in great stress.

"Most of the sequences of figures with which I am familiar indicate that we will—unless fundamental remedies are adopted—reach a period of stress in any case within a short period of years. Unless there is some distortion such as that which might be caused by a general war, I should think that the next major downturn of the business cycle—due in any case within 4 or 5 years—might present all the factors for an explosive situation. We may, of course, navigate safely through that period, leaving the final reckoning to be made at some later downturn of the business cycle. In any event the next decade will, I think, probably force a show-down.

"Since the United States has at its command all necessary productivity, all necessary technical skill, all necessary energy and labor, and substantially all necessary raw materials, any failure of the economic system must be directly due to malorganization.

"In a democratic economy, the processes of finance are in a large measure relied upon to make it possible for the individuals to organize their energy, the materials obtainable, and other necessary elements to produce and distribute whatever the country may, in reason, desire. I suppose the test of a financial system is whether it approximately accomplishes that purpose. The present system apparently does not, and, a major difficulty appears to be in the system of handling capital finance and capital credit. Conceivably, by solving this question, we may be able to take care of much of the difficulty."

Further, in the same statement, Mr. Berle said:

"There is one other lack in our financial machinery. It is crucial. We have not, anywhere in the banking world, that process of development which has been the lifeblood of the technical development of American industry. There is no one looking for new financial methods, new theories of credit, new means of attacking financial and economic difficulties with the same persistence, freedom to explore ideas, and to state results which the chemical or technical research bureaus in any large industry continuously use in looking for new processes, new products, new developments, and new methods."

We know that Great Britain has long been Argentina's leading export market. This is very natural for two reasons: England's investment in Argentina and her dependence upon foreign areas for foodstuffs and other raw material. However, in 1935, 1936, and 1937 the United States absorbed about 12 percent of the total value of exports for the period as compared to an average of 7.5 percent during the previous decade. We know what happened in 1938 with the great production of foodstuffs in this country, and this obviated the need for imported grain, meats, and fats. And, too, the economic recession caused a decline in the purchase of industrial raw materials. We also observe that in the past Germany has contributed largely toward supplying the iron and steel products of Argentina, but can she continue to do so now? If not, who is to take that market? England or the United States?

The exchange situation which has prevailed, largely due to England being not only Argentina's principal customer, but, in addition, as I have pointed out, being a great investor in Argentina's development, gave England the whip hand over the United States. We can appreciate that there are trade agreements and then there are still other trade agreements. Insofar as Argentina is concerned, the other countries have probably just outtraded us because they occupied a more strategic geographical and investment position. So I seriously question the advisability of this agreement at this moment. If it is consummated, after having first somewhat induced or forced Argentina to remove the exchange differentials which have operated adversely against us, then what guaranty, if any, can be obtained that other countries will not later slip under us, through exchange operations or otherwise, and cut from under us the support our trade was to have through the mechanics of the trade agreements?

Is this trade agreement, like so many others, as I understand, to extend the most-favored-nation clause to all other countries, possibly excepting Germany? If so, by what reasoning do we call it an Argentina trade agreement? Have you, as the administrators of this act, been able to determine exactly just what arrangements have been in operation as between Germany and Argentina, and to what extent the flow of trade in the form of orders from the latter country was controlled by those secret arrangements? Is the administration now in a position to proceed, supplementary to this proposed trade agreement, with a lending or investing policy whereby dollars are to be furnished to the Argentineans with which to make purchases in the United States? If it is the policy of the United States to so furnish dollars for their use, will the increased volume of trade not be due to the dollar arrangement rather than a result of the consummation of the agreement with its concessions? Did England, in addition to her financial transactions with Argentina and England's investing policy, operate under a form of reciprocal-trade agreement on the goods flowing between the two countries? These are questions in which the farmers of my district are interested, and the Congress should be more fully informed on some of the details of this proposed trade before it is concluded, and, therefore, Mr. Chairman, I am here protesting against putting the agreement into operation at this time.

International Affairs

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. SANTIAGO IGLESIAS

RESIDENT COMMISSIONER FROM PUERTO RICO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, October 18, 1939

Mr. IGLESIAS. Mr. Speaker, when President Gompers over 20 years ago appointed a commission to go to Mexico to confer with the representatives of the workers of the Republic of Mexico, he said:

We must safeguard as far as it is possible the principles of autonomy, independence, and democratic pan-American countries from open or insidious attempts of autocratic forms of government.

The conventions of the American Federation of Labor in recent years unanimously passed resolutions and ample recommendations to give authority to President William Green and its executive council to reorganize the Pan American Federation of Labor in order to unite all the labor movements of the Latin republics with the great labor movement of this Nation, and to instill a true conception of the value of human life, and to make humane relations the chief concern of these international relations.

The last convention of the American Federation of Labor, held this month of October 1939, gave out the following report at Cincinnati:

At this time of world crisis it is inevitable that both movements and nations should look to their own defenses. As the 21 nations which make up the Pan American Union meet in Panama to build a defense in the Western Hemisphere against involvement in the present conflict by closer collaboration, so the labor movements of the Americas should be prompt to recognize the importance of closer cooperation. The Pan American Federation of Labor was the creation of the American Federation of Labor. It grew out of the necessities of the time. For many years Samuel Gompers was its president and moving spirit. Its service to the workers in the Central and South American republics was distinctive and helpful. Every reason that called it into being originally is now reinforced by the events of recent months.

Your committee notes with satisfaction that the executive committee of the Pan American Federation of Labor held a meeting in May of this year; that it explored the effective methods of reorganizing the Pan American Federation of Labor and establishing a closer bond of unity between the workers in the Western Hemisphere. One of the direct results of this exploration was the decision on the part of the executive committee to approve a careful survey of labor conditions in the 20 South American republics to learn more definitely the state of the labor movement in these countries and the best way in which they could be brought into closer collaboration with the Pan American Federation of Labor. It was the further decision of the committee when such a survey had been completed that a congress would convene in Habana or Washington to lay the basis for a vigorous reorganized program of the pan-American movement.

Your committee wishes to underline the general conclusion of the executive committee of the Pan American Federation of Labor and to point out the special urgency of the present crisis. It makes any effort for international cooperation in the Western Hemisphere a matter of pressing importance. We, therefore, express the hope that President Green will take it upon himself to inaugurate such a study of the Central and South American republics and carry forward such a program as will make possible a convening of the Sixth Congress of the Pan American Federation of Labor either in Washington or Habana some time in the near future.

The organized working people of the United States are firmly convinced that cordial and friendly relations can be established and maintained between all countries represented in the Pan American Federation of Labor through the development of a perfect and sincere understanding of all the labor movements of the Western Hemisphere.

The working people in the pan-American countries should be guaranteed the right to organize and to cooperate within their respective countries in the furtherance of their legitimate social, industrial, and economic interests. The right of free speech, free assemblage, and free press should not be abridged. Liberty, democracy, and justice should triumph over autocracy and unfreedom in any form.

In more than a dozen of the Latin American nations we may be sure there are movements which would qualify us for remaining affiliates of a revived Pan American Federation of Labor.

Let me go back to the period of the World War for an illustration of the importance of the revival of this movement, which I am glad is going to take place. When the World War broke out Germany was doing everything within its power to make use of Mexico as a means of striking at the United States. Germany had hoped to be able to have Mexico as a back door through which to strike at our country so as to subtract its attention from the primary theater of war in Europe.

Now I call attention to that historical fact merely for the purpose of showing that what was necessary then may become equally necessary at any time. If an alien power hostile to the United States considered Mexico as its easiest route to the United States, as was the case in 1917, then why may we not expect that similar ideas may be held today in some of the chancelories of Europe? As a matter of fact, we know that such ideas are held and that they are not being allowed to remain idle theories.

Through the Pan American Federation of Labor, the American Federation of Labor called upon the Mexican Federation of Labor to close this back door to our Nation. This was done in a conference held on the United States-Mexican border immediately after the convention of the American Federation of Labor which was held in Portland, Oreg. That pledge was fulfilled.

Had there been no Pan American Federation of Labor, no such protection could have been achieved. The work of this peaceful labor conference was much more effective than could have been the work of all the armies we could have mustered. Labor can play a great statesmanlike role. It can defend as well as attack, and very often defense is much more important than attack because proper defense taken in time makes attack unnecessary.

I do not wish to seem to dwell too long upon the subject, but I believe you will agree with me that freedom through the Western Hemisphere is essential to the protection of freedom in the United States.

I am completely in accord with the observations set forth by the American Federation of Labor Convention at Cincinnati.

One of the tragic outcomes of the march of dictatorships in the world is not only the suppression of free trade unions in many lands, but the means that have been employed to suppress racial and religious minorities in one country after the other. Envy, hatred, malice, and intolerance have been let loose by these tyrannical dictators, and the liberties of people have everywhere been jeopardized.

Religious leaders of various denominations have suffered persecution and privations. In some cases they have become martyrs for the faith. Religious institutions, church and synagogue alike—have been closed, in some cases desecrated—in some cases have even been destroyed. Such conditions do violence to the standards of civilized society and cannot be suffered to continue.

Religious persecution is a matter of deep concern to labor, for it is either a forerunner of the persecution of labor or in some cases it has followed the suppression of labor. Organized labor believes in the right of all men to the enjoyment of these civil liberties; again and again in its long history it has opposed any denial of these rights and has insisted upon these basic rights as the privilege of citizenship.

Today the refugee problem has become one of the heart-rending tragedies. Millions of racial and religious minorities have been compelled to seek new homelands, under the threat of persecution and arrest in their homelands. Jew and Christian alike have experienced the pressure of religious intolerance.

I am in accord with what the convention expresses in deep sympathy for all these victims of religious and racial persecutions and affirm the conviction that such conditions are barbaric.

President Roosevelt has expressed his sympathies to meet this need. The Jewish people sought some years ago to create a Jewish homeland in Palestine. The nations of the world have in the past recognized the just claim of the Jews to reestablish their home in Palestine. The Government and the people of the United States have from the very first shown their deep sympathy with this claim. On June 30, 1922, the House and the Senate went on record in favor of Jewish rights in Palestine. Since that time every President of the United States has reiterated this sympathy of the American people. Americans, on their part, have manifested their sympathy and confidence. Thousands of American Jews have settled in Palestine and Americans have invested over $100,000,000 in that country.

Thomas Brackett Reed

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CLYDE H. SMITH

OF MAINE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, October 18, 1939

Mr. SMITH of Maine. Mr. Speaker, it was extremely disappointing to be unable to attend the memorial so fittingly observed in commemorating the memory of that great statesman, Thomas Brackett Reed, of Maine.

It was, however, my privilege to eulogize his splendid attributes in the Maine Legislature January 28, 1903, little realizing that a similar honor would come to me in the very hall where his courageous and fearless rulings brought fame and distinction to Maine's beloved son.

Unable to add anything to what has already been said on this occasion I will offer my humble words of boyhood days:

Your Excellency and gentlemen of the assembly, it is not my purpose to attempt any extended eulogy on the illustrious life work of this illustrious statesman. It is not for me to seek to penetrate the veil and speak of him in that sphere as husband and father, as neighbor, or townsman. More eloquent lips than mine can tell that which was his noblest calling and highest attainment—his love and affection for family and home. Others are here to tell the story of his kindness and loyalty to friend and kinsman. It is sufficient for me to contribute but a word, to bring a single flower of tender memory, to add my little wreath of affectionate admiration in behalf of his sacred memory. Who of us that have not observed, while scanning the blue heavens above, with her millions of sparkling worlds, scattered sparingly here and there a majestic star pouring forth her richer and more radiant rays, surpassing all others? How true we find this of mankind. The laws of creation, having heir to us now and then a great and natural leader, towering far above his fellow beings, conspicuous among the distinguished sons reared from the rugged hills of the old Pine Tree State is one whose name is not only familiar to the children of our every village, hamlet, and town, but of the South beneath her sunny skies, in distant California amid her fields of golden rocks, and, yea, in far-away New Zealand, the name of Thomas Brackett Reed is written there.

A soldier has fallen. A hero is dead. Not while on the battlefield, amid the rush of contending parties, nor while in gallant leadership, leading his party onward and onward in her every charge, with victory ever in hand, for he had laid down the gavel and ceased to participate in the great political arena of his life. But we can never forget how we have known of him in this very hall, a leader of leaders, champion of champions. How we have known of him at Washington, confronted with the fiery blasts of jealousy and a divided house; how we have known of him as emancipating his people from the shackles of a filibustering contingent in the National House of Representatives; how we have known of him when our very hearts were beating that he might be selected as our standard bearer and Chief Magistrate over the grandest Nation ever visited by mankind. But he had met his final conquerer and sank beneath his icy breath. Though silent is the grave, death can claim no victory. For that master mind, the handiwork of the eternal God, will shine brighter day by day, while others may grow dim with the space of time. His works are ended. No man can tell the results of his labors. But from memory's shrine his name can never be effaced. The dreams of childhood and visions of old age vanish. Flowers bloom, blush, and fade away. Stars fall from heaven and leave no trace behind them. But a life like Thomas Brackett Reed can never run its course and be forgotten, and when the fettered fangs of eternity were bearing his soul away, his life was just beginning.

Old Liberties and New

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JERRY VOORHIS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, October 20, 1939

ADDRESS OF J. WARREN MADDEN, CHAIRMAN, NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD, BEFORE THE NATIONAL CONFERENCE ON CIVIL LIBERTIES, NEW YORK CITY, OCTOBER 13, 1939

Mr. VOORHIS of California. Mr. Speaker, because I believe it places the right of collective bargaining in its proper place along with other rights of American citizenship and because I consider it a very stimulating address, I am pleased to ask to have printed in the RECORD the following address by Hon. J. Warren Madden, Chairman of the National Labor Relations Board:

This is the year of the one hundred and fiftieth anniversary of the proposal by Congress of our Bill of Rights, the guaranty of certain of our important civil liberties. In this year the condition of civil liberties in the world around us provides a desolate and alarming setting for our study of our own liberties.

Our forefathers had learned by experience and observation that the gravest impairments of the liberties of citizens may come from governments themselves. Many of them or their ancestors had come to this new land to escape such oppression. In setting up the new government their problem was to endow it with necessary powers for preserving internal order and safety from without, and at the same time make it impossible for it to abuse the liberties of its citizens, as European governments had done.

The willingness of a newly created sovereign government, whether that government be embodied in an individual, or in a combination of an elected president and two-house legislature and life-tenure judiciary, to put in writing its agreement that it would not overreach its granted powers, even as against minorities and individuals, is an interesting gesture. But is it more significant than preelection promise by a candidate for elective office? We have learned much in recent years and months about the worthlessness of the solemn promises of sovereigns. If some governments will not keep their promises for even a few months, what reason was there to hope, 150 years ago, that the promises of our new government would be fulfilled? Yet in the year 1939 our people can say to their President and their Congressmen and their judges, "You and those who have occupied your high positions before you have kept the faith. When we consented that they and you should rule over us, you promised us freedom of worship, freedom of speech and press, the right to assemble and to be free in our persons and houses from unreasonable searches and seizures, the right not to be proceeded against except by due process of law, and the equal protection of the law. On the whole, you have done what you agreed. You have thereby made a record unmatched in human history."

It is no accident that this record has been made. The fathers of the Constitution set up the best devices which occurred to their learned and imaginative minds to police these promises. The separation of the executive, the legislative, and the judicial functions, each with some power to checkmate the others, each with the natural human tendency to call attention to any attempt on the part of the others to overreach their functions; this device has been a powerful safeguard. The vigilance of the people, an intelligent and vital interest in civil liberties on the part of many of them, has been a potent force. Organizations through which public-spirited citizens maintain their vigilant watch for violations of civil liberties have had great effect.

I said that, on the whole, the Government had kept its promise. I did not mean that there had not been, during 150 years, lively differences of opinion as to whether or not certain actions of the President or the Congress or the judges or other agents of Government have not infringed upon the civil liberties of the people. Safeguards have been relaxed in times of war and of serious domestic strife. Whether the relaxation or the extent of it was justifiable has been the subject of controversy. Then, too, some of the language in the Bill of Rights is vague, such as "unreasonable searches and seizures," and "due process of law," and leaves much room for argument. Other phrases such as "freedom of speech and of the press," though they look definite enough, are far from certain in their constitutional meaning. I shall say something about some aspects of their meaning later in these remarks.

These civil liberties whose anniversary we are celebrating are, as I have said, promises given by the National Government to the States and the people at the time that Government was created. The necessity of a National Government to provide for the common defense, to remove burdensome restrictions upon trade between the States, to set up a uniform monetary system, and the other advantages offered by the new proposed National Government were hardly sufficient to persuade the Original States and their people to submit themselves to the new Government by ratifying the Constitution, and they were promised that their civil and individual liberties would be preserved by the early adoption of necessary amendments. Thus, the Constitution was ratified in 1788 and the civil-liberties amendments were proposed by Congress in 1789.

Though the National Government guaranteed that it would not by its laws and acts impair civil liberties, yet the citizen was subject not only to the National Government but also, and in more of the affairs of his life, to the government of his State and its subdivisions, such as cities and counties. How was he to be protected in his fundamental liberties against those governments? Most of the States have either before or since the adoption of the National Constitution inserted guaranties similar to the Federal Bill of Rights in their State constitutions, denying to the States the power to infringe civil liberties. In addition, amendments to the Federal Constitution were adopted shortly after the Civil War, in which the National Government guaranteed to individuals that they would not be denied due process of law nor the equal protection of the laws by the States or their subdivisions. The Supreme Court of the United States has held that a State which, by its constitution as interpreted by its courts, denies fundamental civil liberties to individuals, does so in violation of the fourteenth amendment to the National Constitution.

I have said that the National Government, on the whole, kept well its promise not to infringe upon civil liberties. As for the States and their subdivisions, of course, a hundred occasions when civil liberties may be violated arise in the course of State action, to one in the course of Federal action. All the State laws, city and county ordinances, police regulations, and even the actions of policemen, individually and in groups, injunctions, and other decisions of State and local judges, and actions of State and local administrative bodies, each of these actions, of which there are tens of thousands every year, has in it the possibility of a collision between governmental action and civil liberties. In the aggregate there are many violations, but the vigilance of individual victims, lawyers, public-spirited citizens, and public organizations prevent or correct many of them.

For 4 years it has been my privilege to work with a subject matter which is closely related to the traditional civil liberties, and I should like to say something here about that relation. The chief obstacles to the freedom of working people to organize unions and to bargain collectively have not been erected by governments. Judges have, to be sure, upon occasion granted injunctions which have destroyed unions; police and constabulary have prevented or dispersed legitimate union meetings; union leaders have been illegally arrested and imprisoned; the distribution of leaflets has been prevented. All these add up to a large and shameful total of violations of law by agents of governments, most of the violations relating to civil liberties. Yet the most effective opposition to the organization of working people has been not that of governments and their agents but that of private interests. The power to discharge or demote, or threaten to do so, for union activities; the employment of spies; the use of blacklists; the refusal to recognize and deal with unions even if they were organized; these were the real obstacles to the growth of unions. When governments did illegally intervene in the ways that I have indicated, it was usually upon the incitation of private interests. It was they who sought and obtained the injunction, caused the arrest of the union leaders, urged the police to break up the meeting, or prevent the distribution of literature. By the time that the Government intervened, there was usually an economic and frequently a physical conflict going on, and the proper role of government in that conflict was by no means clear. Its action had to be taken in the midst of a battle, and if it did the thing that seemed immediately necessary, rather than the far-sighted thing, or even the thing that was consistent with civil liberties, it could hardly be criticized. What could be criticized was that government should have stood by and allowed the affairs of employers and their employees to get into such unnecessary and impossible confusion that the action of government, when it did get around to act, was often worse than useless.

This evil was attacked at the source, so far as concerned industries coming within the jurisdiction of the Federal Government, in 1935. The act which popularly bears the name of Senator WAGNER gave to employees the right to organize and took away the legal privilege of employers to destroy their organization. What shall we call the new right which working people have so recently acquired? It is guaranteed by a statute which restrains the private interests which formerly could and did prevent unionization, rather than by an act of self-denial on the part of the Government itself, pledged in the text of the Constitution. Is it, for that reason, inaccurate to call it a civil liberty?

I should suppose that the year 1935 was as propitious a year for the birth of a civil liberty as the year 1789. Indeed, it was a most distinguished year for the birth of a liberty, for it was a year when in the rest of the world old liberties were dying, but no new liberties were being born. In each of those years 1789 and 1935 the Federal Government placed in the body of its law the guaranty of the aspirations of multitudes of its citizens, for which they had struggled for decades.

But let us not quibble about names. However it may be classified, it is a new right which millions of Americans are exercising who never did so before. They have joined A. F. of L. unions, C. I. O. unions, and unaffiliated unions. No one longer denies that they have a moral right to do so. And no one can successfully deny that they needed the protection of the Government in order to be free to exercise this moral right. Suppose that under one of the totalitarian governments of Europe, employers were free to discharge or discriminate against those who attempted to worship in a certain kind of church, and did so discriminate, and only a small number of people attended those churches. Suppose then the Government changed its policy and forbade such discrimination, and thereafter with other conditions remaining the same, large numbers of people attended those churches. No one would deny either the necessity or the effect of the change in the law. That situation would be quite exactly comparable to what has happened in this country under this law. And I may say in passing that, if these rights of working people are not interfered with, the Government, under this law, has no concern whatever with whether or not they join this or that union, or any union. It is not the union, but the liberty, that the Government is interested in. The result may be, and sometimes is, "Liberty and nonunion" in contradiction of Daniel Webster.

As employers have come to concede the rights of their employees under this law, other troublesome problems concerning civil liberties have been eliminated or simplified in many communities. In the past many of the asserted violations of civil liberties have occurred in industrial towns. In those towns the question of freedom of assembly, speech, or publication nearly always arose in connection with the attempted organization or activity of a labor union. When the principal employers in such communities have begun to obey the National Labor Relations Act and to keep their hands out of the union question the other civil-liberties problems largely disappear. The police do not interfere with assembly, speech, or publication, because no one is asking them to interfere. Magistrates do not jail union organizers under "disorderly conduct" or "suspicious person" statutes or ordinances, because there is no pressure upon them to do so. And if the town is "open" for labor-union meetings there is little likelihood of any interference with speech, press, or assembly for other purposes.

If the law which we administer has had the effect of raising the general level of observance of civil liberties, we are glad. If it will permit such organizations as the one under whose auspices this gathering is held to devote more of their always too limited resources to other situations where their vigilance is needed, we are glad.

It now becomes my duty to tell this gathering of friends of civil liberty whether I myself and the organization with which I am associated have not been more than a little careless with the civil liberties of some of those whose cases have been before us. The charge has been made with much vehemence by many litigants and by some editors and other publicists. Pointed questions have been asked by the American Civil Liberties Union itself. I come before you, then, to answer the charge that, in the administration of a law designed to creat a new civil liberty for employees, I participate in the violation of the civil liberties of employers.

"If it were so, it were a grievious fault."

The charges, so far as I am aware of them, have been with relation to freedom of speech and of the press.

The pertinent language of the first amendment to the Constitution is: "Congress shall make no law * * * abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press; * * *." That means also, of course, that no administrative body or court shall so interpret and enforce any law of Congress as to give it the effect of abridging the freedom of speech or of the press. But what does "freedom of speech or of the press" mean, as the words are used in the Constitution?

If our Board had been the first tribunal to which that question had ever been presented, we would have had the responsibility for determining whether the constitutional fathers meant that persons could go about saying or publishing what they pleased, when they pleased, where they pleased, regardless of circumstances and of consequences; or meant that persons could so speak or publish, being liable for the damage caused by their doing so, if they had resources out of which damages could be collected; or meant that persons could so speak or publish if what they said was true or was believed to be true; or meant that they could so speak or publish if the persons to whom their language was addressed were not subject to their physical or economic or social domination and would not be deprived of some legitimate interest by being so addressed.

Such a difficult and unenviable task never fell to the Board. The problem of interpretation had already come before the Supreme Court of the United States in a considerable number and variety of cases. That Court had decided the question as it arose in each case without attempting to spell out a formula for the decision of all cases of all sorts.

The problem for the Board in the cases so far decided by it has been whether it should order an employer who has spoken or distributed literature to his employees for the purpose of keeping them from joining a union to cease and desist from so speaking or publishing. The Supreme Court precedents have seemed to us to be exactly in point. In Duplex Printing Press Co. v. Deering (254 U. S. 443 (1921)), the Court held that:

"There should be an injunction against * * * using any force, threats, commands, directions, or even persuasion, with the object or having the effect of causing any * * * persons to decline employment * * * or cease working under any person * * * being a purchaser or prospective purchaser of any printing presses from complainant * * *" (at p. 478).

In Bedford Cut Stone Co. v. Journeymen Stone Cutters' Association (274 U. S. 37 (1927)), the United States District Court for the District of Indiana, pursuant to the opinion and mandate of the Supreme Court, entered an injunction restraining the defendants from, inter alia, "publishing, circulating, or otherwise communicating, either directly or indirectly, in writing or orally, to each other, or to any other person * * * any statement or notice of any kind whatsoever, intimating * * * that the complainants are, or were, or have been, unfair * * *." (The injunction is not reported in the Supreme Court report, but is reprinted in hearings before a subcommittee of the Senate Committee on the Judiciary on S. 1472, 70th Cong., 1st sess. (1928), p. 49.)

The cases of Gompers v. Buck Stove and Range Co. (221 U. S. 418 (1911)), Hitchman Coal and Coke Co. v. Mitchell (245 U. S. 229 (1917)), and Tri-City Central Trade Council v. American Steel Foundries (257 U. S. 184 (1921)), are also in point.

In these cases the order made by the Government, through the judicial branch, restrained union leaders or members from speaking and publishing, when the object of their speech or publication was to impair the interest of the employer in getting customers or employees. That being the law of the Constitution as it is applied when employers invoke legal processes against unions, would it be tolerable for the Board to find that the constitutional guaranties mean something different when unions invoke legal processes against employers? If such class distinctions are to become a part of our Bill of Rights, they should be expressly written into the Constitution by an amendment submitted for ratification in the regular way, and not slipped surreptitiously into it by judicial or quasi-judicial interpretation. And if ever the American people are willing to write such a class distinction into what has been the charter of their liberties, the rest of the charter will hardly be worth saving.

I am glad to be with you on this occasion. I am happy to report that, in the field in which I work, the enjoyment of the old and the new liberties bring order and mutual respect and civic decency. All who are interested in liberty are indebted to the American Civil Liberties Union. May it never relax its vigilance.

"That These Shall Not Perish"

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EDWARD H. REES

OF KANSAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, October 20, 1939

EDITORIAL FROM THE COUNTRY GENTLEMAN

Mr. REES of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I have asked for unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD, in order to direct the attention of the membership of Congress to a very fine and timely editorial that appears in the November issue of the great national journal, the Country

Gentleman. The editorial is entitled "That These Shall Not Perish," and reads as follows:

The American people have the world's greatest task of conservation. Theirs is now the task of conserving, of keeping alive those hard-won values which make life worth the living.

Elsewhere over the earth these values are swiftly being blacked out. Kindness and mercy, decency and tolerance have been trampled under in one new war after another. Honor, integrity, and truth have been brushed aside by the rulers of great nations, and deceit, force, and brutality exalted in their place. The blood-bought rights of freedom of speech and conscience, the right of a fair trial by jury have been extinguished for millions of people. In their stead have been substituted the spies and informers, the secret trial and the firing squads.

Untold numbers of men and women have died to win these humanities that are now disappearing from the earth. All that gives the individual self-respect and worth as a human being, all that holds hope for our children are embodied in them. Someone must hold fast to them. No matter what happens, a stronghold must be maintained for them here. That is the obligation now resting upon the American people—upon each one of us. These rights and graces of life must be kept enduring realities until the rest of mankind is ready for them again. That time will come.

We have read of periods in history when men and women and youth had something to which they could consecrate themselves. Such, and nothing less, is upon us now. The spirit that it calls for is sounded in those dauntless words of I Corinthians xvi, 13:

"Watch ye, stand fast in the faith, quit you like men, be strong."

Thomas Brackett Reed

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JAMES C. OLIVER
OF MAINE
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, October 18, 1939

IN COMMEMORATION OF THE ONE HUNDREDTH ANNIVERSARY OF THE BIRTH OF THOMAS BRACKETT REED

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. Speaker, I regret that it was impossible for me to be present personally on the floor of the House last Wednesday because, representing as I do the First Congressional District of Maine, it certainly would have been most appropriate for me to have participated along with the other Members of this body in the activity commemorating the one hundredth anniversary of the birth of Thomas Brackett Reed, who was for a period of 22 years a Representative from my congressional district. However, I felt that duty called me back to Maine, where I cooperated in formulating a memorial service in his memory at the chapel of Bowdoin College in Brunswick, Maine.

At this point, under leave granted by the House, I am pleased to incorporate in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD the remarks which I made on the program which was carried out at Bowdoin College:

President Sills, undergraduates of Bowdoin, and ladies and gentlemen, with extreme humility and with a deep sense of the complete inadequacy of words to express in any worthy manner a fitting tribute to the memory of Thomas Brackett Reed, I approach the responsibility of participating even in a small way in this program today. A man who was a great patriot, an unexcelled statesman, and an American of the highest possible type really needs no extended verbiage to extol his works or his memory. But it is especially worthy for us today in the light of world and domestic conditions to pause and in the passing flight of time record again the character and genius of this noted man.

Today all over the world parliamentary and legislative processes and principles of government are on trial. Man is denying to man the fundamental and basic rights of liberty, freedom, and justice. Nations are denying to nations similar rights. As we look back upon the life of Thomas Brackett Reed we realize that his example shines for us like a star. We realize that his integrity, his honesty of purpose, his morality, and his strength of conviction indicate for us a true illustration of the path which men and nations today must travel if the destiny of mankind is to develop into that type of Christian civilization in which the greatest good is to be the order for the greatest number. Tom Reed was honest and upright in all his dealings with his fellowman. Never was his strong position nor his great power as Speaker of the House of Representatives used for his personal gain. Never did he strike a single, mighty blow on any side but the right. When he did strike he was always felt. In Reed the cause of right had a champion of champions. Maine, America, and the entire world will find in the life of this man the ultimate of those qualities and those characteristics so sadly needed in the public life of this modern civilization. Today we need leaders—leaders who in thought and action will make sincerity of purpose their beacon light. This man whose birth we commemorate here today based every act on the fundamental truth that lack of sincerity is the basest and most reprehensible of all failings of mankind.

At the time when memorial services were being held for him in the hall of representatives in Augusta on Wednesday, January 28, 1903, Hon. Harold M. Sewall, then Representative to the State legislature from Bath, said, "Reed hastened the coming of another day, a day when public service shall be emancipated from the stigma too often attaching to it, the stigma of selfishness, of unworthy motives, and corrupt methods. * * * It shall be a day of intrepidity of intellect." Then, again, at these same services we find these words of Hon. Forrest Goodwin, senator from Somerset County: "Mr. Reed was a kind and lovable man; genial and generous, sympathetic and loyal. * * * He was intensely independent, absolutely self-reliant. Brave and courageous, he never weakened in the face of opposition. He was honest and he was incorruptible."

Having scanned with some care the record of Reed's character and his life, it is my considered judgment that a Reed of today would deprecate in the strongest language applicable the injustices now existing in the family of nations; that he would call a spade a spade in the most forceful words at his command, in connection with our domestic problems; that he would be partisan but would temper that partisanship with the sense of justice which was so inherently a part of his make-up.

To me a study of Reed's life indicated a complete abhorrence for that type of status quo which entailed a stoppage of justice, fairness, and equal opportunity for the large majority of the people of this Nation of ours. Certainly he would not tolerate parliamentary status quo and by the same token I cannot conceive of him enduring a type of economic status quo which entails a continuing unemployment paradox in a land where there is such great need for work. Is it conceivable that such a man believing in the extension of right and justice to all, would long endure without strong protest the continuing existence of a financial status quo which hangs a burden of debt and a load of economic uncertainty and insecurity over millions of our people? Most assuredly his disdain for party pressure toward a course against his better judgment would impel him to a position of leadership against that status quo rather than an abject continuing along the road of the past, just because it was the past. Tom Reeds are needed today as never before in the history of this country. New problems require new answers, and men who merely approach the type of Reed must not and will not long endure these continuing conditions which deny—I repeat—which deny the fundamental and basic rights of liberty, freedom, and justice, both civil and economic.

As long as parliamentary and legislative assemblies convene in this country may we never let the life and memory of Thomas Brackett Reed become in the least forgotten or tarnished. Let the youth of today and tomorrow read and study the character and the works of this great man, a true Christian and a great American.

Relief for Farmers

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ROY O. WOODRUFF
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, October 13, 1939

Mr. WOODRUFF of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, although the present session of the Congress was called to consider one subject, neutrality, I felt when the session was called and I still feel that such a limitation was unwise, because, important as neutrality is, it still remains a fact we have a number of vitally grave domestic problems unsolved by this administration, problems which are becoming aggravated day by day by the delay incident to the neutrality problem, and there is grave danger these problems may become so aggravated by the delay and neglect on the part of this administration that they may be vastly more difficult to solve than they would have been had we devoted more attention to them.

One of these problems is unemployment, or, rather, permanent employment for our people. Another is the plight of the American farmers, including those of Michigan.

This week I introduced a bill in the House of Representatives to provide a real degree of relief for the farmer. I believe this Congress ought not to end this session after the question of the embargo is finally disposed of, but that it ought to stay in session and take up immediately these domestic problems, which must be solved whether there is a war in Europe or whether there is not.

As regards the farm problem, the continuation of subparity farm prices of all, or nearly all, commodities and the resulting lowered farm income are phenomena with which we are all familiar.

Foreign farm products are being admitted to the United States in increasingly large quantities. Their importation is being encouraged at a time when American farm prices are least capable of withstanding this competition. This increase of importations are a direct result of the reciprocal trade agreements program. With half the world now in war, the administration still insists that its reciprocal-trade policy is designed to "soften the mind of the world toward peace."

Right now the administration is considering trade agreements with Argentina, Venezuela, Cuba—supplemental—Belgium, Chile, and Uruguay, all agricultural competitors, under which new tariff concessions are contemplated, and presumably will be made in the agreement, on many products competitive with those of American farms.

Many Members of the House on both sides of the aisle have properly protested this procedure, but it is my view that the American farmer is entitled to something more than mere protests. Not only is he entitled to action to prevent the price-depressing effect of these competitive farm imports on an already glutted domestic market but he must have it.

American farmers are entitled to a protection which will insulate the domestic prices at which they are compelled to sell their products against destructive price influences from abroad, including South and Central America. We might just as well take our stand on the basis that American farmers are entitled to the full benefits of the American market to the extent of their capacity to develop and supply it.

As a modest start toward securing this protection for American agriculture, I introduced the bill which provides, in essence, that when the domestic price of any American-grown farm product falls below parity, further importations of that commodity from abroad shall be prohibited until the American price has risen again to parity.

This proposed embargo on the importation of farm products, the prices of which are below parity in the United States, would not affect present tariff rates as established by the Tariff Act of 1930. Neither would the embargo affect the technical structure of the existing trade agreements. Foreign farm products would continue to be admitted at the reduced rates provided in those agreements so long as farm prices of those commodities in the United States were at or above parity.

However, if farm prices fell below parity, under the embargo to be established by this bill, all imports of commodities affected would cease until such time as prices rose to parity.

Thus it will be readily seen the purpose of the bill is to give the American farmer the full benefit of the American market, and protection against these destructive influences arising out of these unneeded imports.

This is an act of legitimate economic self-protection which no foreign nation could properly criticize. It is also a vitally necessary act of economic justice to our own people which it will be dangerous to delay any longer.

Legislative Program of the Regular Veterans' Association

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. MON C. WALLGREN

OF WASHINGTON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, October 20, 1939

Mr. WALLGREN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include herein the educational program of the Regular Veterans' Association. The Regular Veterans' Association, headed by Carl Gardner, former officer in the United States Marine Corps and for the past several years editor of Our Army, was founded in 1934. It is composed of men who have served honorably for at least 1 year in the armed forces of the United States Army, Navy, Marine Corps, or Coast Guard. It is founded upon the same patriotic principles as are our war veterans' organizations and has for its major aim the promotion of an adequate national defense in all of its ramifications, true allegiance to the Constitution, protection of the personnel of the armed forces, and complete eradication of all subversive activities which threaten the existence of our American form of government.

The program adopted at the third annual convention of the R. V. A. held in New York City last month, is as follows:

1. Promotion of an adequate and efficient national defense, with a Navy second to none and with an Army of at least 280,000 officers and men.
2. Privileges of hospitalization at all United States Veterans' Administration facilities for former Regulars of the military and naval service.
3. Increase in pensions for widows and dependents of deceased Regulars who have died of service-connected disabilities.
4. Amendment of Public Law, No. 2, Seventy-third Congress, so as to permit any person having an honorable discharge from any of the Regular services to be eligible for admission to the various Veterans' Administration homes.
5. Elimination of regulations which prevent members of the United States Soldiers' Home and of the United States Naval Home from receiving their full pensions while residing in these homes.
6. Amending of present pension laws to cover men who were disabled in the Regular service prior to 1898.
7. Increase in the quarters and rental allowance for all retired personnel to $30 per month.
8. Provisions for retirement privileges for enlisted personnel of the Regular Army after 25 years of service.
9. Upward revision of the present pay scale throughout the Regular Establishments.
10. Opposition to any law that will permit States or other local political subdivisions to apply sales taxes to sales made in post exchanges or similar stores on military and naval reservations, ships, or stations.
11. Retention of the reenlistment allowance until it can be replaced by satisfactory pay schedules.
12. Good-conduct medal for all honorably discharged Army Regulars.
13. Increase of 100 percent in the number of appointments to the Military and Naval Academies from the ranks of the enlisted men of the Regular Establishments each year and increase in the age limit on such appointments.
14. Continued preference to all honorably discharged veterans of the Regular Establishments under all rules and regulations promulgated by the United States Civil Service Commission, and a law that will require this Commission to publish all eligible lists and to make all appointments from the list in the order of merit, with no eligible passed over without legal and adequate reason therefor.
15. Preference to all honorably discharged Regulars in admission to C. C. C. camps and on W. P. A. jobs.
16. Governmental aid for disabled Regulars seeking educational advantages, and a more adequate educational program for Regulars in active service.
17. Uniform law in all States granting full rights of citizenship including the right to vote by absentee ballot, if necessary, to all members of the armed forces of the United States in peace or in war.
18. Elimination of the so-called "green ticket" in the United States Coast Guard.
19. Adoption of a uniform salute to the flag for civilian and soldier alike.
20. Require State soldiers' and sailors' homes that receive Federal funds to admit Regulars on the same basis as other veterans.
21. Grant full citizenship upon request to every alien who holds an honorable discharge from any of the Regular Establishments, provided there is no crime or other blot upon the character of said alien.
22. Formation of a National Armistic Day Association.
23. Creation of the grade of commissioned warrant officer in those branches of the Regular Establishments which have no such grade at present that all advancements to that grade be from the enlisted personnel.
24. Equalization of charges to all veterans residing in the United States Soldiers' Home and the United States Naval Home.
25. Increase of $10 per month in amount now being paid hospitalized Regulars.
26. Burial at Government expense of any veteran who died from disability incurred in line of duty.
27. Retirement privileges for all enlisted personnel of the Regular Establishments after 25 years of service at three-fourths base pay in grade or rating.

In addition to these resolutions, the Regular Veterans' Association will continue to work for several measures that have been on its program for the past year. Among these are:

1. Equalization of pay and allowances among all of the services.
2. First pay, grade, pay, allowances, and rank for first sergeants of the Army and Marine Corps.
3. Brigadier general rank for our Army chief of chaplains.
4. Permanent non-commissioned-officer warrants for noncommissioned officers of the Army, with promotions based on merit as evidenced by tests, record, and examination.
5. Removal of legislative restrictions on Army post exchange.
6. Placing the fixing of Army non-commissioned-officer strength in the hands of the Secretary of War.
7. Making the purchase of Government life insurance by military and naval officers and enlisted personnel possible at any time during active service, instead of 120 days after acceptance of rank or enlistment, as at present.
8. Advancement of one grade in rank upon retirement by officers who served in the Spanish-American War.
9. Outlawing of all foreign-controlled or directed organizations, societies, or parties that adopt un-American programs or tactics which endanger the democratic institutions of our country.
10. Educational institutes for the Army and Navy whereby correspondence, educational, and vocational courses may be made available to personnel of the Army and Navy similar to those available to marines and Coast Guard men through their Marine Corps and Coast Guard institutes.

Profits Versus Peace

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. RAYMOND S. SPRINGER

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, October 20, 1939

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Speaker, the irresistible lure of profits and gold has manifested itself again. The debate on the question of our foreign policy in this very critical period in our Nation's history has produced that oft-repeated story of "business and profits" as a point in favor of the repeal of the arms and ammunition embargo provisions of existing law. Throughout the various discussions on the subject of our neutrality under the pending bill I have listened patiently for some expression upon the estimate of business enhancement if and when the arms and ammunition embargo is repealed, and a full cash-and-carry policy enacted, but no positive expression has been offered. Therefore, we are led to the most natural question: How much would the unlimited sale of arms and ammunition to belligerents increase business in this country? Who knows? And, too, how many industries, other than the Peters Arms & Ammunition Co. and the Du Ponts, would such unlimited sale of arms and ammunition to belligerents affect? No one has made any suggestion, with any degree of certainty, which approaches these vital questions. I am confident the people of this Nation would like to know, with some certainty, what the result will be in the event a full cash-and-carry policy is adopted.

Mr. Speaker, we do know from our past experience during the World War that the sale of arms and ammunition by this Nation to belligerent nations was negligible. We conducted our warfare in that great struggle in very large part with foreign-made guns and ammunition, and our Air Corps flew the airplanes made by foreign countries. Those countries, our Allies in that great war, made all the guns and ammunition and manufactured all the airplanes required for their own great armies, and in addition thereto they made largely the guns, ammunition, and airplanes which our own great Army required. The dismal story of our attempt to place flying planes upon the front in that crisis is appalling at this late day. They did not get there. However, the argument produced by those who advocate the adoption of a "full cash-and-carry policy in arms and ammunition" will greatly enhance the business in our Nation falls by its own weight, because we know that England and France produced all of the war materials used by them in the last war, which included arms, ammunition, and airplanes, and in addition they produced in quantity an amount sufficient to largely equip our own Army and Air Corps. It is admitted by those who present the "profit argument" that England and France would be the nations now engaged in the present war which would purchase these war supplies from us. These same nations now have their own supplies and their own source of supplies; they are providing for all of their own needs, and they are not required at this time to provide such war supplies to any other country. Therefore their supplies, their guns, and their ammunition are ample. Then, if that be true, so long as that condition obtains, those nations would not become purchasers from us. And we must remember France and England continued the World War for a period of 4 years, and throughout that long period of time they provided their own war supplies and equipment.

May I suggest at this point that we as a nation do not forget that France and England owe to this Nation approximately $11,000,000,000 from the last war? More than 20 years have passed since the World War ended, but those nations have failed to pay that debt. They are debtor nations who owe vast sums of money to our country; they do not pay, and they do not pay the interest, but continue to remain debtor nations. These are the nations who, according to those who argue that vast profits would come to our country if the arms and ammunition embargo should be lifted, would be our customers and purchasers. And any prospective purchaser or customer who has all of the goods and supplies required for its needs of the same type and kind we are selling would not buy more. That is the inevitable conclusion to which we are driven. I am firm in my conviction that a full cash-and-carry plan, such as is proposed, which would embrace the unlimited sale of arms and ammunition to belligerents, that the sales made thereunder would be entirely negligible and in such meager proportions that business in our country would not be appreciably enhanced.

Mr. Speaker, when we weigh the two positions in the balance—the war profits, on the one hand, and human life and bloodshed, on the other hand—can there be any real and comprehensible comparison? I propound that question for the reason that I am convinced that the unlimited and unrestrained sale of arms and ammunition to belligerents in time of war, which embraces the sale of destructive and death-dealing instrumentalities and devices, will create a deep feeling of hostility against our Nation, and the very act of selling implements of war to one side of the controversy would undoubtedly be construed as an unneutral act, and the same might well be our first step into this European war. This must not be. We must keep the United States of America out of this war. We must remember that we cannot weigh profits against human life, because the blood of men is far more sacred than a few paltry dollars, and the calmness of peace is more honorable than the glory of war.

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to incorporate in and as a part of my remarks a very illuminating editorial which appeared in the Evening Star of date October 18, 1939, on the subject of war and trade, which has a very close application here, and I sincerely hope each Member of the House will read this editorial, which follows:

WAR AND TRADE

Another warning to American business against overestimating the possibilities of war trade has come from Dr. Harold G. Moulton, president of the Brookings Institution, who sees danger in the expanding production schedules and mounting inventories that are being nourished by a speculative urge rather than consumption needs.

While noting the present slackening in commodity prices, Dr. Moulton emphasizes that the groundwork already has been laid in industry for the familiar distortion of cost factors, with the inevitable threat of a new collapse and another painful period of readjustment.

The Brookings Institution head points out that European purchases may well be much more restricted than is generally assumed, because prospective demand is being viewed in the light of that developed by the World War, although conditions are much different than they were 25 years ago.

In the first place, he explains, the capacity of the principal European nations to buy American goods is much less than it was then, because their ability to borrow has been impaired, and their resources are not as great.

Also, the price advance in 1915 was enhanced by spirited competition among European buyers, private as well as government, that has disappeared now under rigorous price controls.

Further, France and England are better supplied with munitions now, and, in addition, the dominions and other neutrals also may be expected to get a share of the business, offering another reason, Dr. Moulton adds, why this country will not occupy such a dominating position as a source of supply.

Dr. Moulton's views, expressed before a group of industrialists and financiers at the New York automobile show, coincide with those voiced last month by the Chamber of Commerce of the United States, which pointed out that too much optimism over the foreign-trade outlook was not warranted because the war, while undoubtedly spurring demand, also would create obstacles, financial and otherwise, to militate against the American market.

That business leaders in this country realize the dangers of a boom has been made clear also by other spokesmen and in the end these continued admonitions may have effect. But the lure of profit is a powerful incentive to disregard caution signs and continued vigilance is necessary if this country is to escape the evils of an unwarranted industrial expansion, with its inevitable aftermath of depression.

Mr. Speaker, may I caution the Members of the House that we are dealing with a most serious subject. We must not err. Any mistake on the part of this body, in this most serious deliberation, might wreck the lives of millions of people and it might destroy our Government. The ghastly thought that our Nation, for which men have fought and died, would be lost—that our freedom and liberty might be forever destroyed—is too sordid to contemplate. Let us approach this solemn subject with the seriousness of life itself, and let us think of our country first.

Our Expensive Government

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. OSCAR YOUNGDAHL

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, October 20, 1939

EDITORIAL FROM THE MINNEAPOLIS (MINN.) STAR-JOURNAL

Mr. YOUNGDAHL. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial relative to the cost of government.

[From the Minneapolis Star-Journal of October 16, 1939]

OUR EXPENSIVE GOVERNMENT

Speaking of the cost of government, here's an interesting if rather depressing trend:

On November 11, 1918, at the close of the World War, the United States Government had marshaled the greatest number of Federal employees in the history of the country. In the months and years that followed, the number was gradually decreased, but the downtrend eventually stopped, the hiring started over again, until today there are 2,550 more persons on the Federal pay roll than there were at the World War peak.

The total figure as of June 30 this year was 920,310. We shudder to think how long the Federal pay roll would grow if Uncle Sam took up arms again.

Neutrality

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES M. SLATTERY

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Saturday, October 21 (legislative day of Wednesday, October 4), 1939

ARTICLE BY JAMES MORGAN

Mr. SLATTERY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an article by James Morgan, published in the Boston Sunday Globe of October 15, 1939, entitled "One Sure Way to Keep Us Out of War."

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Boston Sunday Globe of October 15, 1939]

ONE SURE WAY TO KEEP US OUT OF WAR—MERE NEUTRALITY FAILED IN THE PAST BECAUSE A GREAT PEOPLE IN A TIME OF CRISIS MUST HAVE A POSITIVE POLICY, WHICH SHOULD MOBILIZE THEM TODAY IN A FIGHT TO SAVE DEMOCRACY AT HOME

(By James Morgan)

The Congressman who wanted to know "who we are neutral against" was not as innocent as he sounded. We of this oldest neutral nation are and ever have been the most unneutral neutrals in the world. In the century and a half of our national existence there have been two periods of general warfare in Europe and neutrality laws did not succeed in keeping us neutral in either instance.

By the time of Washington's second inauguration the European powers were in a coalition to stamp out the French Revolution, and he issued the first neutrality proclamation in history.

The weakness of that system was and still is that it proposes a policy too pale for our citizenry while the world is in tumult. When Washington proclaimed neutrality in the wars of the French Revolution, which plunged Europe into a 20-year struggle, our people already were arrayed along the lines of cleavage in the Old World and tagging one another with imported partisan names, Jacobins and aristocrats and all manner of alien epithets. Ultimately Washington himself quit his retirement at Mt. Vernon to organize an army against France in 1798 and was "dumbfounded," as he said, when his successor, President John Adams, returned to neutrality by making peace with the new French Government under Napoleon Bonaparte.

WHEN AN EMBARGO FAILED

When President Jefferson took over the task of maintaining our neutrality he sounded off in his inaugural with the watchwords: "Peace, commerce, and friendship with all nations, entangling alliances with none." He coined a lasting national slogan against entangling alliances, but the only neutral nation in Christendom found itself friendless among the belligerents, with its trade caught between the British sea blockade and Napoleon's continental blockade.

As a last desperate means for keeping ourselves out of the war we resorted to an embargo, not on arms alone, as our present neutrality law provides, but on all commercial intercourse with the embattled continent. That biting off of our nose to spite our face so infuriated the mercantile and shipping interests in our idle ports that we repealed the embargo and let our ships take their chances. When Napoleon had seized 500 of them and Great Britain 900 our patriotic indignation boiled over, and we rushed, divided and unprepared, into the inglorious War of 1812.

THE BURNT CHILD

After a century inflammable Europe burst into flames again in 1914, but it is not necessary to retell here the familiar story of how our policy of neutrality met with the same remorseless fate as before. Now, once more, we are facing this old problem. We are, it is true, fortified with the psychology of the burnt child. We are still under the great disillusionment of the World War, the mock peace, and the defaulted debts. Although we are far more "neutral against" Hitler and Stalin than we were against the Kaiser we are not so "neutral for" the Allies this time. Our crusading spirit, when we went forth to make the world safe for democracy, is a rueful memory.

The change in the national mood is reflected in what is going on in Washington. To save ourselves from fighting for the neutral rights which we unavailingly fought two wars to uphold we are ready this time to surrender them in advance. Whether our shipping interests, just as we have built up our merchant marine until it is second only to the British, will endure this embargo any more patiently than their forerunners bore Jefferson's embargo we shall presently see.

I am not debating the pending neutrality plans. I am only arguing that these do not meet the central question and that Washington is staging what is more or less a sham battle. This is the favorite sport of politics, which ever delights to sidetrack the stern realities of a main issue.

